Appellants contend that under the circumstances above stated the bank could not legally, by a suit to foreclose, prevent the delivery of the wine to Chevalier & Co. pursuant to said contract which it had consented to and induced the parties to make. The contention of respondent is, briefly: First, that what the cashier did does not bind the bank; and, second, that what he did was of no legal consequence whatever, even if his acts in the premises be considered as the acts of the bank. As to the first of said positions, we think that it is clearly untenable. It is in proof without contradiction that, to the knowledge and with the consent and tacit approval of the directors of the bank, this same cashier had for many years been having with others and with appellants the same kind of transactions as the one here under consideration; that is, the bank had been in the habit of taking mortgages from various persons on wine, and the cashier, with the knowledge and consent of the directors as aforesaid, had permitted wine thus mortgaged to be sold to third parties under contracts similar to the one here involved. This was proven at the trial by the president of the bank and four of its other directors, by the said cashier himself, by several witnesses who had similar transactions with the bank, and by the appellant Arthur B. C. Dowdell, who, prior to this contract, had several similar transactions with said cashier. We have said that this was proven without contradiction, by which we mean that the facts above stated were so proven, although some of the witnesses testified that there had not been any resolution upon the subject passed by the board of directors in corporate body assembled, and that they did not understand that the cashier had been given any power to release a mortgage. Under these circumstances it is not necessary to determine what powers the cashier had merely by virtue of his position as cashier; for when a corporation, by a long course of acquiescence, holds out an officer or agent as having authority to do certain things, it cannot, after he has acted, repudiate his acts. This principle is decided by many authorities, but it is sufficient here to cite Morse, Banks (3d Ed.) § 171g, and cases there cited; Martin v. Webb, 110 U. S. 7, 3 Sup. Ct. 428; Merchants' Nat. Bank of Boston v. State Nat. Bank, 10 Wall. 604; Bank v. McCarthy, 7 Mo. App. 318; Carey v. Petroleum Co., 33 Cal. 694. In Morse on Banks & Banking, supra, it is said,—and the cases cited fully warrant the text,—as follows: "Evidence of powers habitually exercised by a cashier with the knowledge and acquiescence of the bank defines his powers as to the public, if they are such as the directors have authority to confer on him. A bank for several years permitted its cashier to cancel trust deeds given to secure money loaned, and was thereby estopped to deny his power to cancel." It is also there declared that, where the conduct of a cashier has been open and long continued, "it must have come to the knowledge of any ordinarily vigilant directory"; citing Bank v. McCarthy, supra, which fully sustains the text. Martin v. Webb, supra, is a case in which the principle under discussion was directly involved and clearly stated. Mr. Justice Harlan, in delivering the opinion of the court, said, among other things, as follows: "While these propositions are recognized in the adjudged cases as sound, it is clear that a banking corporation may be represented by its cashier—at least where its charter does not otherwise provide—in transactions outside of his ordinary duties, without his authority to do so being in writing, or appearing upon the record of the proceedings of the directors. His authority may be by parol, and collected from circumstances. It may be inferred from the general manner in which, for a period sufficiently long to establish a settled course of business, he has been allowed without interference to conduct the affairs of the bank. It may be implied from the conduct or acquiescence of the corporation, as represented by the board of directors. When, during a series of years, or in numerous business transactions, he has been permitted, without objection, in his official capacity, to pursue a particular course of conduct, it may be presumed, as between the bank and those who in good faith deal with it upon the basis of his authority to represent the corporation, that he has acted in conformity with instructions received from those who have the right to control its operations. Directors cannot, in justice to those who deal with the bank, shut their eyes to what is going on around them. It is their duty to use ordinary diligence in ascertaining the condition of its business, and to exercise reasonable control and supervision of its officers. They have something more to do than, from time to time, elect the officers of the bank, and to make declarations of dividends. That which they ought by proper diligence to have known as to the general course of business in the bank they may be presumed to have known in any contest between the corporation and those who are justified by the circumstances in dealing with its officers upon the basis of that course of business." It is clear, therefore, that the acts of the cashier in the premises were the acts of the bank.

But it is contended by respondent, substantially, that the conduct of the cashier, even if considered as binding the bank, amounted in law to absolutely nothing; that, notwithstanding this conduct, the bank, although having consented to and encouraged the sale, and being in effect a party to it, could interfere with and put an end to it at any time, and without any reason, and merely at its own whim. This would be violative of the principles of fair dealing, and unwarranted, we think, by the law. We do not think it necessary to determine here that the consent of a mortgagee of chattels to the sale of the mortgaged property and its removal from the county amounts to an absolute release of the entire mortgage, and as against all parties who may choose afterwards to deal with it,—although there are many authorities to that effect, some of which have hereinbefore been noted. We think, however, that upon sound principles the bank was estopped, at least, from interfering with the sale by appellants to Chevalier while its terms were being complied with, and from the attempt to disregard and practically annul such sale by the proceedings in foreclosure. There is no pretense that anything whatever took place after the sale and before the bringing of the action to foreclose that changed the position of any of the parties, or in any manner whatever affected injuriously the rights of the bank. It is admitted that Chevalier was perfectly able to comply with the terms of the sale, and was willing and ready to do so. It is apparent that the money to be paid by him for the amount of wine purchased would have been more than sufficient to satisfy the demands of the bank against appellants. A large part of the wine had been delivered, and there is no justifiable reason apparent why the bank should have then sought to repudiate its acts by which it consented to and induced the sale. Of course, Chevalier would not have purchased without the consent of the bank, and the appellants could have made no effectual effort to sell without such consent. That consent is clearly established, for not only does it appear from the circumstances under which the sale was made, but the cashier testified: "I was satisfied with the responsibility of Chevalier & Co., of course, or I would not have consented to the sale; and if the notes and mortgages had not been assigned, we would not have objected to Chevalier & Co. taking the wine so long as they continued to make payments to the bank as required by the contract." The bank having thus consented to the sale, and shaped the same to suit itself, and induced the parties to enter into the transaction, and encouraged the appellants to make a contract by which they incurred great pecuniary responsibilities, and to forego other attempts to dispose of the wine, and to go to the expense of delivering a large part of it,—upon what principle of fair dealing or legal right can it now, without any apparent reason or worthy motive, abandon the parties in the positions in which it induced them to take? We think that the bank is clearly estopped to deny the validity of the sale and to defeat it by means of the action to foreclose. The principle of equitable estoppel is aptly and concisely stated by the supreme court of the United States in the opinion of Mr. Justice Clifford in Swain v. Seamens, 9 Wall. 254, in language that has since been frequently quoted and approved, as follows: "Where a person tacitly encourages an act to be done, he cannot afterwards exercise his legal right in opposition to such consent, if his conduct or acts of encouragement induced the party to change his position, so that he will be pecuniarily prejudiced by the assertion of such adversary claim." And the case at bar is not only within that principle, but is a much stronger case than one where a party only "tacitly encourages" an act to be done. In Dickerson v. Colgrove, 100 U. S. 580, the United States supreme court states the principle as follows: "The vital principle is that he who, by his language or conduct, leads another to do what he would not otherwise have done, shall not subject such person to loss or injury by disappointing the expectations upon which he acted. Such a change of position is sternly forbidden. It involves fraud and falsehood, and the law abhors both." And in the opinion in that case many cases are cited and approved, in some of which the principle was applied to the extent of destroying a chattel mortgage. See, also, Van Syckel v. O'Hearn, 50 N. J. Eq. 175, 24 Atl. 1024; Daniels v. Tearney, 102 U. S. 420; Faxton v. Faxon, 28 Mich. 159, and cases there cited. In California the principle has been frequently so declared as to embrace the case at bar. Scott v. Jackson, 89 Cal. 262, 26 Pac. 898; Dolbeer v. Livingston, 100 Cal. 621, 35 Pac. 328; Hostler v. Hays, 3 Cal. 303; Mitchell v. Reed, 9 Cal. 204.

It is contended that there was no consideration for the said acts of the bank; but, in the first place, there was a consideration, for the bank was to receive all the money due it from appellants instead of relying on a forced sale of the wine; and, in the second place, the principle of equitable estoppel does not rest upon a consideration moving to the party estopped. Van Syckel v. O'Hearn, 50 N. J. Eq. 175, 24 Atl. 1024, and cases there cited. Our conclusion is that the bank and its assignee were, under the facts above stated, estopped from maintaining this action.

Respondent makes some contention, in a part of his brief which seems to be supplementary, that estoppel cannot be relied on by appellants, because it was not pleaded in the answer. There is some conflict of authorities as to whether the rule requiring estoppels to be pleaded is not confined to technical estoppels by deed or record. Hostler v. Hays, 3 Cal. 308; Caldwell v. Auger, 77 Am. Dec. 515, and notes; Clarke v. Huber, 25 Cal. 594; Davis v. Davis, 26 Cal. 823. But, assuming that the rule applies to equitable estoppels in pais, it is sufficient if "the matter"—the facts—upon which the estoppel rests be pleaded so that the opposite party may know its nature. The reason of the rule is given by the court in Davis v. Davis, supra, where it is said that "it is but just, and is in accordance with the rules of pleading in equity cases, that the party relying upon an equitable estoppel in pais should inform the adverse party of the nature of the cause of action or defense which he will be obliged to meet." This was done in the answer in the case at bar, in which the facts above stated are fully set forth. Moreover, there was no objection at the trial to evidence of the facts on the score of defective pleading; and the rule is well established that such a course is a waiver of a defect in pleading.

We have followed the course of the arguments of counsel who have discussed the real and ultimate merits of the case without particular references to the form in which the questions involved arise. With respect to the findings, it is sufficient to say that the following part of finding 7 is not supported by the evidence, viz.: "Said agreement * * * was not approved by said corporation, and said corporation did not agree to its terms, and did not consent that the defendants might deliver said wine to said Chevalier & Co., or that said wine might be removed from the county of Napa, nor was the consent or permission of said corporation to the making of said sale asked or given;" and that there is not sufficient evidence to support the findings in finding 3 that "a removal of said mortgaged property from the county of Napa would have resulted in damage and injury to the plaintiff," and that plaintiff "would have suffered irreparable injury therefrom" had it not been for the appointment of a receiver. It is unnecessary to discuss the other findings. There are quite a number of exceptions to the rulings of the court as to the admissibility of the evidence; but, under the views above expressed, it is not necessary to discuss said exceptions. It can be sufficiently gathered from this opinion what evidence should have been admitted or excluded. The order appealed from is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

KAHN et al. v. MATTHAI. (S. F. 490.)

SERVICE OF SUMMONS—SUFFICIENCY OF SHOWING IN JUDGMENT ROLL—AFFIDAVIT FOR PUBLICATION—SUFFICIENCY.

1. Since the affidavit of service of summons and the affidavit for publication and the order of publication are part of the judgment roll (Code Civ. Proc. § 670, as amended by St. 1895, p. 45), a prima facie showing of jurisdiction over defendant, sufficient to sustain a judgment on appeal, is made where the judgment roll, though it does not contain the original summons, contains an affidavit for an order of publication which shows that a summons was issued, an affidavit of the printer containing a copy of the summons, an affidavit showing that affiant had mailed a copy of the summons to defendant, and a decree containing a recital that summons had been regularly served.

2. An affidavit for service of summons by publication, stating that plaintiff's attorney placed the summons and complaint in the hands of five different persons (naming them) for service, and that they returned them, with the information that they could not find defendant, and that she could not be found in the city or county, is insufficient, without showing what diligence was used to procure service on her.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. Murphy, Judge.

Action by Sophie Kahn and another against Mary Elizabeth Matthai to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. Brooks Palmer, for appellant. Jos. Rothschild, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, foreclosing a mortgage executed by the defendant upon certain real estate in said city and county, to secure the payment of a promissory note made by defendant January 17, 1891, for $2,000, payable to the plaintiff Sophie Kahn, with interest as specified, one year after date. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and brings the cause up on the judgment roll, without any bill of exceptions. The complaint was filed January 3, 1894, and a summons issued, which not being personally served, on February 20, 1894, an order for publication of summons was made, upon due proof of publication of which, and upon proof that a copy of said summons and copy of the complaint had been forwarded to defendant by United States mail, prepaid, etc., the default of defendant for failure to answer was entered May 27, 1895; and thereafter, and on January 6, 1896, judgment was entered by the court in the usual form for foreclosure of the mortgage. The original summons is not found in the judgment roll.

Two points are urged in favor of reversal: (1) That the judgment and clerk's entry of default are void, for want of return of summons; (2) that the judgment is void, because not supported by a sufficient affidavit for publication of summons.

Upon the first point made, it may be remarked that this appeal is a direct attack upon the judgment. To say that a judgment is void for want of return of the summons must be tantamount to saying that the judgment roll fails to show that the court obtained jurisdiction of the defendant, and hence that the judgment is void. The evidence on the subject of jurisdiction of the person of the defendant in the present case, as disclosed by the roll, is as follows: (1) The affidavit for publication of summons shows that a summons issued. (2) The order of publication shows the same thing. (3) The affidavit of the printer showing publication contains a copy of the summons. (4) The affidavit of Isadore Harris shows that he mailed a copy of the summons and copy of the complaint, etc., to defendant at her place of residence. (5) The decree states, among other things, "that the court having heard all the evidence and proofs, * * * and it appearing therefrom to the satisfaction of the court—First, that Mary E. Matthai, the above-named defendant, has been duly and regularly summoned to answer under the plaintiffs' complaint herein, and had made default in that behalf, and that the default of the defendant * * * has been duly and regularly entered," etc. Do these facts afford sufficient proof of service to make out a prima facie case, which will support the judgment upon a direct attack until rebutted? Under our Code as it formerly existed, the affidavit for publication of summons and the order for such publication formed no part of the judgment roll, but now, under section 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1895 (St. 1895, p. 45), the affidavit or proof of service of the summons, "and, in case where the service so made be by publication, the affidavit for publication of summons, and the order directing the publication of summons, must also be included" in the judgment roll. The facts necessary to be stated therein are equally evidence of the steps by which jurisdiction of the person of the defendant is obtained as the original summons itself. It is true, the Code requires the summons to be embodied in the judgment roll, but if absent therefrom, and it appears that a summons in fact issued, with evidence of its contents, showing it to be regular and sufficient in form, and that it was duly served, such a prima facie case is made as to jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, even in the absence of the original summons, as will support the judgment upon a direct attack by appeal. If there was no original summons, the fact could easily be made to appear by a bill of exceptions. The main difference between collateral and direct attacks upon judgment and its recitals is that upon collateral attack the record alone can be inspected, and it is conclusively presumed to be correct, while on direct attack the true facts may be shown in contradiction of the record, and thus the judgment itself on appeal may be reversed or modified. But the judgment and its recitals will be presumed to be correct upon appeal, unless the contrary is made to appear. Lyons v. Roach, 84 Cal. 27, 23 Pac. 1026; Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 606, 29 Pac. 220; Norton v. Railroad Co., 97 Cal. 396, 30 Pac. 585, and 32 Pac. 452; Lick v. Stockdale, 18 Cal. 219.

As to the point of the insufficiency of the affidavit for publication of summons, we are of opinion the contention of appellant must be upheld. The affidavit is full and explicit as to the cause of action, its nature, the parties, etc., but is fatally defective in failing to show with accuracy the efforts made to serve defendant with summons. It states, in substance, that plaintiff's attorney placed the summons and complaint in the hands of five different persons (naming them) for service, and that they returned them with the information that they could not find defendant or see her, and that she cannot be found in the city and county. This statement is but hearsay, and may be wholly untrue, in fact, without any impeachment of the truthfulness of the affiant. Where service of process upon a defendant within the county is attempted to be made by a person other than the sheriff, his affidavit should, as a rule, be required, showing the nature of the effort made to serve the party, and, where practicable, the reasons why such service cannot be had. The affidavit then proceeds to state that the affiant believes and is certain the defendant is in the city and county of San Francisco, and that, to the best of affiant's knowledge, defendant resides at 912 Seventeenth street, and that said defendant has evaded the service of summons; that affiant and her attorney have both spoken to the "two daughters of the defendant, requesting them to allow the said defendant to be served with the said copy of summons and complaint; and that said daughters, and each of them, both being of legal age, refuse to allow the defendant herein to be served with said papers, and are using every endeavor in their power to prevent said service." From this rather singular statement it cannot be determined that any duty devolves upon the daughters of defendant to permit or to aid in the service of process upon defendant, or in what manner they have thwarted such service, or that they are colluding with the defendant to evade the service of summons. We are of opinion the affidavit was insufficient to uphold the order of publication of summons, and hence that the court below failed to obtain jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. The judgment should therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BRITT, C.

In re PAINTER'S ESTATE. (S. F. 326.)

PROBATE COURTS — HEARING OF APPLICATION FOR PARTIAL DISTRIBUTION—PROCEDURE.

On a hearing by the probate court of an application by the widow of a testator for a partial distribution of his estate, where the right of the applicant to one-half the estate, as community property, and also to take under the will, is claimed and contested, the court should act only on a full showing as to all matters pertinent, and should determine the extent of the applicant's interest in the estate, or direct suit to be brought for that purpose, as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 1664.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Application by the widow of J. B. Painter, deceased, for a partial distribution of his estate, which was contested by J. Milton Painter and Theodore P. Painter. The petition was denied, and the petitioner appeals. Reversed.

R. S. Gray, for petitioner. Edward J. Pringle, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. This is an application for a partial distribution, made by the widow and children of deceased. J. B. Painter died testate, having by his will made many bequests and devises. Among other things he gave to his brothers, J. Milton Painter and Theodore P. Painter, his interest in the partnership of Painter & Co., of which firm he had been a member; and also devised to them a certain building, in which the business of the firm had been conducted. There were several minor children, one of whom was born after the execution of the will. The widow and the children then in being received bequests and devises by the will, as did also several other persons. The widow claims that all the property of the estate is community property, and that she is entitled to one-half thereof as surviving wife, and also to the bequests made to her in the will. Naturally, J. M. Painter and Theodore P. Painter deny that the widow is entitled to one-half the property, and claim that she cannot take under the will and still claim her rights as survivor because the testator evidently attempted, by his will, to dispose of his entire estate. The widow states in her petition that, to properly express her interest in the estate, it must be divided into 504 parts; that she is entitled to 252 parts of it for her interest in the community property, 114 parts as devisee under the will, and to 19 parts as assignee of Arthur Painter, a devisee under the will,—making 385 of said 504 parts constituting the estate. J. Milton Painter and Theodore P. Painter oppose the application. They were brothers of the testator, and to them is given, in terms, in the will, the interest of the testator in the partnership property, and also a specific piece of real estate. They are, therefore, interested in the question raised by the application. They set up, in substance, first, that the right of the widow to one-half the property as community property is not beyond question, and that an action had been brought, and was then pending, to determine the claim of the widow to take both under the will and one-half of the community property as survivor; and, second, that an action is also pending between the surviving partners of the firm of Painter & Co. and the estate to settle the accounts of the co-partnership, and to close up its business. In that suit the surviving partners contend that the deceased was indebted to the co-partnership in a large sum. At the hearing the petitioner offered no evidence whatever, but counsel agreed that the parties who appeared in opposition might first offer evidence showing the pendency of the legal proceedings alluded to in their written opposition, and submit to the court the sufficiency of such evidence to cause a denial of the petition and application for partial distribution. Thereupon counsel put in evidence the transcript of an appeal to this court in the case of J. Milton Painter against Theodore P. Painter, R. B. Dallam, and others, and it was admitted that the case is still pending. It was also stipulated that the suit brought to settle the accounts of the partnership was then pending. Thereupon the court denied the application.

The application was made under section 1663, Code Civ. Proc., which permits the application to be made at any time after the lapse of one year from the issuance of letters of administration. It is provided that notice shall be given by posting, which may be but for one or two days, and that the distribution shall be made if at the hearing it appears that the estate was but little indebted, and that the share of the party applying may be allowed to him without loss to the creditors of the estate. Under section 1658 a similar application may be made at any time after the lapse of four months from the issuance of letters. It is evident that persons interested in the estate have very little protection in this proceeding, except in the discretion of the probate judge, and he should, therefore, proceed with the greatest caution. Although all parties interested are brought before the court by the notice given, no default can be taken against them, and a plenary showing must be made by the applicant at the hearing. If opposition is made, and the grounds of the opposition stated in writing, that cannot limit the inquiry, nor can the court take the admission of contestants, unless it clearly appears that the admission is made by all parties interested in the proceeding. There is very little in the proceeding which resembles a suit at law. There could be no plea of abatement. One question naturally presented by the application is whether the distribution should be then made. A showing that the distribution cannot be then made is a complete answer to the application. It is also obvious that the court may be called upon to determine other questions than those pertaining to the interests of creditors; as, for instance, whether the applicant is entitled to a share of the estate, and if so what share, is necessarily involved. So, too, it may be that the costs of administration may be so great that there will be no estate to distribute. There are all sorts and conditions of estates. Probably in not one in a hundred would the court be justified in ordering a distribution within four months after the issuance of letters. Yet there are estates in which it would be quite obvious that there would be no danger in so doing. Very much must, therefore, be left to the discretion of the probate judge, and, when he decides that the condition of the estate is such that the distribution cannot safely be made, his conclusion would not often be reversed here. If the distribution were denied because of some doubt upon a question of law, such as, for instance, the construction of a will, such questions could be conveniently determined in such a case. But we cannot well reverse a decision based upon the judgment of the court as to whether the condition of the estate is such as to justify the distribution, especially when the application is denied by the probate judge. The practice pursued in the probate court in this case is anomalous. Naturally, the laboring oar is always with the applicant. Whether there be opposition or not, or whatever the opposition may be, the petitioner must show that the estate is but little indebted, that he is entitled to the share he asks, and what, when the expenses of administration are paid, his share will amount to. The only office of an opposition is to rebut this showing. If, in this case, the probate judge had concluded that the facts shown by the contestants did not warrant the denial of the application, still the showing made at the hearing by the petitioner would have to be considered with the evidence offered by the contestants. Whether the widow was entitled to one-half the community property and to take under the will also could have been determined upon this application, although, if the judge saw fit, he could have deferred the distribution, and directed suit to be brought under section 1664, Code Civ. Proc., to determine the extent of her interest.

Whether the claim of the surviving partners to recover from the estate any balance which upon an accounting may be found to be due from the deceased partner to the partnership, after applying all his interest in the co-partnership to such payment, was a claim which should have been presented for allowance, has not been very fully argued, and need not be now decided. Even if it be recognized as a valid claim against the estate, still, whether it should prevent a distribution would depend upon the value of the assets of the estate, and upon that subject I find no evidence. It is averred in the petition that there is a large amount of assets over and above the property of which distribution is asked, and that the property of which distribution is asked is an inconsiderable portion of the estate. But there is no admission of the truth of these allegations, and the showing as to the condition of the estate must be made at the hearing. Upon that subject, therefore, we are in the dark. It is well to observe here that the creditors are not to be deprived of their lien upon the assets of the estate, and given a bond in lieu thereof. The court should see that sufficient assets are left after the partial distribution, to pay them without recourse to the bond. The requirement of a bond is only additional security to provide against unforeseen liabilities and against errors in judgment. The court did not elect to suspend proceedings and direct petitioner to proceed under section 1664 to ascertain the extent of the ownership of the surviving wife in the property, and, upon the showing made, it could not determine whether the distribution could then have been safely made. I think, therefore, the court should proceed with the hearing of the application, notwithstanding the opposition, and, upon the evidence then produced and that submitted by the contestants, determine whether the application should be granted or denied. The order is therefore reversed and case remanded, with directions to proceed in accordance with this opinion.

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 3, 1897.)

BURGLARY—DESCRIPTION OF PREMISES—VARIANCE —ATTEMPT TO COMMIT—DISCRETION.

1. Where the indictment charged a burglarious entry of a house described by number, etc., "belonging to John Doe, whose real name is unknown," proof that the house belonged to a woman was not fatally variant.

2. An objection that the court erred in failing to give sufficient instructions will not be considered where defendant neglected to ask fuller instructions at the time.

3. On trial for burglary, it was within the discretion of the court to refuse to take the jury to examine the premises.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Edward A. Belcher, Judge.

William White was convicted of an attempt to commit burglary, and appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. Hoff Cook, for appellant. Atty. Gen. W. F. Fitzgerald and Charles H. Jackson, for the People.

BEATTY, C. J. The defendant was convicted of an attempt to commit burglary in the first degree, and appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. His first point is that there was a variance between the proof and the indictment.

1. The indictment charged a burglarious entry of a house situate at No. 45 South Park, San Francisco, belonging to John Doe, whose real name is unknown, etc. The evidence showed—or was sufficient, at least, to sustain a verdict—that defendant attempted, in the nighttime, to enter burglariously a vacant dwelling at No. 45 South Park, but that the house was the property of Letitia Bagnall, a woman, and the precise point is that, while the indictment charges that the house belonged to some unknown man (John Doe being the name of a man), the proof shows that it belonged to a woman. The mere statement of this point is, we think, a sufficient answer to it.

2. The court denied the request of the defendant to send the jury to view the premises. Whether a view of the premises is proper in any case is a matter resting in the sound discretion of the trial judge, and we do not find in this case the slightest ground for holding that there was any abuse of discretion.

3. It is objected that the court failed to give a sufficient instruction as to attempt to commit burglary. The court instructed the jury generally that a person who attempts to commit a crime, but is prevented or interrupted or otherwise fails to accomplish it, may be punished for the attempt, and that they might convict the defendant of an attempt to commit burglary if they were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that he made such attempt. If the defendant thought that these instructions were not full enough, he should have requested one more specific.

4. The court, in defining a reasonable doubt, gave the same instruction commented on in People v. Paulsell (Cal.) 46 Pac. 734; and, on the authority of that case, it is contended that this judgment must be reversed. But the judgment in the Paulsell Case was not reversed on account of the instruction that was given, but because an instruction often approved by this court was refused. In this case no instruction on the subject of reasonable doubt was refused; and the one given, though perhaps not so full and clear as the oft-approved definition of Chief Justice Shaw, is, nevertheless, free from error, as was held in People v. Shaughnessy, 110 Cal. 604, 43 Pac. 2. We find no error in the record, and the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

APPEAL BOND—LIABILITY OF SURETIES—WASTE—DEFICIENCY.

1. Sureties in an appeal bond against waste on certain described land cannot be held for waste on other land, on parol evidence of a misdescription.

2. Recital in an appeal bond that the penal sum named was the amount fixed by the judge of the court is conclusive of an order fixing the amount, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 945; so that it need not be averred or proved in an action on the bond.

3. The penalty in an appeal bond binding the sureties "in the sum of $2,000 (being the amount for that purpose fixed by the judge of this court) that, during the possession of such property by the appellant, he will not commit * * * waste thereon, and that, if said judgment * * * be affirmed, * * * they will pay the amount of any deficiency upon said sale," applies to the deficiency, as well as to waste.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Riverside county; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Action by Matthew B. Ogden against E. J. Davis and another. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Purington & Adair and Collier & Evans, for appellant. W. J. McIntyre, E. B. Stanton, and Caldwell & Duncan, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff had obtained a judgment in the superior court against one C. E. Packard in an action to foreclose a mortgage. Packard prosecuted an appeal to this court, and gave an undertaking for damages and costs and to stay execution, with defendants for sureties. The judgment was affirmed upon appeal (35 Pac. 642), and this action is prosecuted against the sureties upon the undertaking. Plaintiff suffered nonsuit, and appeals from the judgment.

The complaint charged in two causes of action,—the one, for damages in the sum of $2,000 for waste suffered upon the land and premises; the other, for a deficiency in the sum of $8,584.05, remaining after sale of the mortgaged premises. So much of the undertaking as is pertinent to this consideration is in the following language: "Whereas, C. E. Packard, the defendant in the above-entitled action, has appealed to the supreme court of the state of California from a final judgment made and entered against him in the said action in the said superior court, in favor of the plaintiff in said action, on the 2d day of May, 1893, for the foreclosure of a mortgage on certain lands and premises therein described, for the sum of $17,079.40, including costs of this suit, with personal judgment against the defendant for any deficiency upon sale under said judgment; * * * and whereas the appellant is desirous of staying the execution of the said judgment so appealed from in so far as relates to the sale of the lands and premises: We do further, in consideration thereof, and of the premises, jointly and severally undertake and promise, and do acknowledge ourselves, further, jointly and severally bound in the further sum of two thousand dollars (being the amount for that purpose fixed by the judge of this court), that during the possession of such property by the appellant he will not commit, or suffer to be committed, any waste thereon, and that if said judgment appealed from be affirmed, or the appeal be dismissed, they will pay the amount of any deficiency upon said sale." This undertaking, for a description of the mortgaged premises, refers to the complaint. The complaint followed the mortgage, and described the land as "lot 264 of the lands of the Riverside Land & Irrigation Company, as surveyed by Goldsworthy & Higbie, according to the plat of said survey of record in the county recorder's office of the county of San Bernardino." Upon the trial it was made to appear that the description was erroneous, and that there was no lot 264 of the lands of the Riverside Land & Irrigation Company, but that there was a lot 264 of the lands of the Southern California Colony Association. The description, however, had never been reformed, and was followed throughout in the decree and foreclosure sale.

The defendants' grounds of motion for a nonsuit were that waste was not shown to have been committed upon the lands described in the bond; that no order of the court fixing the penalty for deficiency was shown to have been made; that the penalty therein mentioned is confined to waste; that, as to deficiency, the bond is not such as is required by the Code of Civil Procedure; and that the bond was without consideration, and void, in that it did not, in effect, stay execution upon the judgment during the pendency of the appeal.

The first ground of nonsuit urged, namely, that the waste was not shown to have been committed upon the lands described in the bond, was well taken. Sureties upon such an obligation, it is well settled, are entitled to stand upon the express terms of their agreement, and are never implicated beyond those terms. It is not permitted, as against them, to suffer anything to be done which will change or vary the known and definite risk which they assumed in entering upon their contract. It is frequently said that they are favorites of the law, and have a right to stand upon the strict terms of their obligation when such terms are ascertained. Pierce v. Whiting, 63 Cal. 538; People v. Breyfogle, 17 Cal. 508; People v. Buster, 11 Cal. 215; Civ. Code, § 2836; Carter v. Mulrein, 82 Cal. 169, 22 Pac. 1086; Elder v. Kutner, 97 Cal. 490, 32 Pac. 563; McMicken v. Webb, 6 How. 299. These particular defendants were sureties against waste that might be committed upon lot 264 of the lands of the Riverside Land & Irrigation Company. The effort to prove by parol evidence that a parcel of land not answering the description called for in the undertaking had suffered waste at the hands of defendants' principal was not permissible, and the evidence to that effect was properly excluded by the court. It follows, therefore, that plaintiff failed to establish a cause of action for waste under the first cause of action of his complaint, and as to that cause of action the nonsuit was properly granted.

The other grounds of nonsuit urged may be considered together. They relate more particularly to the second cause of action, by which a judgment for deficiency is sought. It is contended on behalf of respondents that, under section 945 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the penal amount of the bond to cover a deficiency should have been fixed by order of court, and that the proofs in the case fail to disclose that any such order was made. The objection is untenable. The bond names the penal sum of $2,000, and recites that this sum is the amount fixed by the judge of the court. The sureties, equally with the principal, are bound by such recital. It may be taken as true against them, and need not be averred in the complaint or proved upon the trial. McMillan v. Dana, 18 Cal. 339; Irwin v. Backus, 25 Cal. 214; Hathaway v. Davis, 33 Cal. 161; Murdock v. Brooks, 38 Cal. 596; Smith v. Fargo, 57 Cal. 157; Herm. Estop. § 162. In its form the undertaking strictly complies with the provisions of section 945 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as interpreted in Boob v. Hall, 105 Cal. 413, 38 Pac. 977. The sureties upon the undertaking bound themselves in the penal sum of $2,000 to make good, not only any damage which might arise from waste, but any deficiency judgment which might remain after sale of the mortgaged premises. If the $2,000 were consumed by a judgment against the sureties for waste, no recovery could be had against them for deficiency If, upon the other hand, no damages for waste were recovered, the full amount of $2,000 was available to make good any deficiency. Upon the trial it was shown that there was a deficiency in a sum exceeding $8,000. It was a deficiency that arose strictly within the terms and provisions of the undertaking. The land sold under foreclosure was the land described in the complaint and mortgage, whatever piece or parcel that may have been. Upon the sale of that land this deficiency resulted. For that deficiency these sureties are responsible to the extent of $2,000. The fact that plaintiff, by his action, asks judgment for the whole amount of the deficiency, does not deprive him of his right to recover that sum, which the sureties bound themselves to make good. The nonsuit upon the second cause of action was therefore improperly granted; and the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to sustain the motion for nonsuit upon the cause of action for waste, and to deny the motion for a nonsuit upon the cause of action for deficiency.

MATTHEWS v. BULL. (S. F. 504.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 1, 1897.)

INJURY TO EMPLOYE — PLEADING — INCOMPETENT FOREMAN—RETENTION—MASTER'S LIABILITY.

1. In an action for personal injuries, plaintiff need not allege that he was not negligent.

2. A verdict will not be disturbed where the evidence is conflicting.

3. Under Civ. Code, § 1971, providing that "an employer must in all cases indemnify his employé for losses caused by the former's want of ordinary care," the employer is responsible for an injury caused to one employé by the negligence of another, whom he has retained with knowledge of his incompetence.

4. A master cannot divest himself of responsibility for the selection and retention of competent servants by delegating the duty to another.

5. Where an employé is injured by the dropping of a hammer of a pile driver, at a signal by the foreman, before he was signaled by the employé putting a ring on the pile, the employer is liable, if the foreman negligently gave the signal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by William H. Matthews against John C. Bull, Jr. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and an order refusing a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. M. Bock and F. A. Cutler, for appellant. L. F. Porter and J. N. Gillett, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to recover damages for an injury sustained by the plaintiff while he was in the employ of the defendant. By the verdict and judgment plaintiff was awarded damages in the sum of $1,500; from which judgment, and an order refusing a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

In 1895 the defendant was engaged in constructing jetties at the entrance to Humboldt Bay. A portion of the work to be done was the driving of piles. R. T. Stone was the superintendent of the work on the south jetty, with authority to hire and discharge all the men employed on that jetty. In April he hired the plaintiff as a common laborer, and also hired Robert Astleford to act as foreman of the pile-driver crew. Plaintiff commenced at once, and thereafter continued to perform the work assigned to him, until May 7th, when he was injured. Astleford commenced at once to act as foreman of the crew, and continued to so act until May 15th, when he was discharged. On May 7th, a large pile having been put in place to be driven, Astleford directed the plaintiff to go up the driver and put a ring on the top of the pile. Plaintiff thereupon climbed up the ladder to the third staging, about 24 feet above the base, and then pulled the ring up by a rope attached to it. The ring was about 16 inches in diameter, and weighed from 40 to 45 pounds. Astleford was standing at the foot of the driver, close up to the pile, where he could not see the plaintiff, and from that point he hallooed to the plaintiff to put on the ring. Plaintiff started to put the ring on the pile, was just shoving it over with his right hand, when Astleford, having waited only from a quarter to a half of a minute after hallooing, signaled to the engineer to let the hammer fall, and he did so. The hammer struck on plaintiff's hand, and crushed it so that it had to be amputated, and this is the injury complained of. It was the custom, when a man went aloft to put the ring on a pile, for him, as soon as he had it in place, to signal to the foreman, and he then signaled to the engineer to let the hammer fall. But on this occasion the plaintiff, as he testified, gave no signal whatever. And if Astleford had stepped aside a few feet, to the place where he usually stood when such work was being done, he could have seen the plaintiff, and seen when the ring was in place. It is alleged in the complaint that Astleford was the foreman of the pile-driver crew of which plaintiff was a member; that the work of constructing said jetty was of a dangerous character, and required skill, prudence, knowledge, and carefulness on the part of those in charge thereof, and that it was the duty of defendant to provide men possessing all these qualifications; that the said Astleford, by reason of his habitual carelessness and negligence, was incompetent to have charge of such work, of which fact defendant had due notice; that he was constantly exposing those under him to unnecessary dangers and risks, which fact defendant well knew, having almost daily notice thereof; that the defendant, well knowing said Astleford to be an incompetent, careless, and negligent man in the work in which he was employed, carelessly and negligently retained him in such employment as foreman of said crew; and that the said Astleford, on the 7th day of May, 1895, carelessly and negligently caused the hammer of the pile driver to drop upon plaintiff's right hand, crushing and bruising it to such an extent that it had to be amputated. The answer denies all the averments of the complaint as to carelessness and incompetency of Astleford, and alleges that the injury to plaintiff was wholly caused by his own fault and carelessness, and was not caused by any carelessness or negligence of said Astleford.

1. The first point made for a reversal is that the complaint was fatally defective because it contained no allegation that plaintiff did not know of the incompetency of Astleford. This point cannot be sustained. In this state the law seems to be settled that in this class of cases it is not necessary to allege in the complaint that the injury was done without fault or negligence on the part of the plaintiff. When such a defense is relied upon, the burden is on the defendant to establish it. Robinson v. Railroad Co., 48 Cal. 409; Magee v. Railroad Co., 78 Cal. 430, 21 Pac. 114; Smith v. Steamship Co., 99 Cal. 462, 34 Pac. 84.

2. Under the issues raised by the pleadings, the principal questions to be determined were: (1) Was Robert Astleford a careless and negligent man, constantly exposing those under him to danger? (2) Did defendant have knowledge of Astleford's carelessness, and, having such knowledge, retain him in his employ? (3) Was the injury sustained by plaintiff caused by Astleford's carelessness or negligence? (4) Was the injury sustained by plaintiff caused by his own carelessness or negligence? These were all questions of fact for the jury, and were answered, as shown by the verdict, in favor of the plaintiff. Appellant contends that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, but in our opinion this contention cannot be sustained. The evidence in the case covers more than 100 pages of the printed transcript, and is largely quoted by counsel in their briefs. But to set it out, even in substance, would extend this opinion to great length, and subserve no useful purpose. It is true that in many respects the evidence is squarely conflicting, and some of it must have been untrue; but what part of it was true and what false was a matter for the jury to determine, and the settled rule in such cases, that the verdict will not be disturbed for want of evidence to justify it, must be followed.

3. The duties which an employer owes to his employés are said to be "to furnish suitable machinery and appliances by which the service is to be performed, and to keep them in repair and order; to exercise ordinary care in the selection and retention of sufficient and competent servants to properly conduct the business in which the servant is employed, and to make such provisions for the safety of employés as will reasonably protect them against the dangers incident to their employment. The performance of these duties cannot be shifted by it to a servant, so as to avoid responsibility for injury caused to another servant by its omission; nor is their negligent performance one of the ordinary risks of the service impliedly assumed by the employé by his contract of employment." Daves v. Pacific Co., 98 Cal. 19, 32 Pac. 708. The Civil Code provides that "an employer must in all cases indemnify his employé for losses caused by the former's want of ordinary care." Section 1971. And, speaking of this section, the court, in Gier v. Railway Co., 108 Cal. 133, 41 Pac. 23, said, "Such lack of ordinary care as may well be shown by the retention of an unfit employé after knowledge of the fact, as by a failure to use due diligence at the time of his selection, and in either case the liability of the employer attaches." And see 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 848, where the general rule upon the subject is stated as follows: "Although an employer may have used due care and diligence in selecting his servants, if subsequently he obtains knowledge of a servant's incompetence or unfitness for his position, and retains him in his employment, he is liable to a fellow servant for any injury resulting from such unfitness," except in cases where the injured servant "knew of such incompetence, and made no complaint about it to his employer." Under the law as thus declared, and the facts as found by the jury, the plaintiff was clearly entitled to recover damages for his injuries.

4. Appellant claims that the court committed numerous errors of law in the admission and rejection of evidence. But, without taking time to discuss the several rulings complained of separately, we deem it enough to say that they all seem to have been authorized and proper; and, at any rate, we can see in them no such prejudicial error as would call for and justify a reversal of the judgment.

5. Appellant complains of some of the instructions given by the court to the jury, and particularly of the first one, which reads as follows: "I charge you, as law, that it is the duty of a master to exercise ordinary care in the selection and retention of sufficient and competent servants to properly conduct the business in which the servant is employed. And, in this connection, I further charge you that the master cannot divest himself of liability by intrusting the performance of this duty to any other person. This duty the law imposes upon the master personally, for the safety and protection of his servants. If, therefore, the master delegates this duty to any other person, no matter what his rank may be, the person so selected becomes the representative of the master. If, therefore, you find from the evidence that defendant, John C. Bull, Jr., did not personally undertake to perform this duty, but that he delegated the same to one R. T. Stone, his superintendent at the south jetty, then I charge you that, as to such duty, the said Stone stood in the place of defendant, and any negligence or failure on the part of said Stone in relation to said duty would be the negligence or failure of defendant." This instruction stated the law correctly, as has been many times held by this court. And the instructions, as a whole, stated all the law applicable to the case with a commendable clearness and precision. Among other things, the court told the jury that "the act complained of here as being negligent was the giving of the signal to the engineer by Astleford to let the hammer fall before the proper signal had been communicated to Astleford," and that, "unless Astleford carelessly and negligently gave the signal to the engineer to drop the hammer, your verdict must be for defendant." There was no error in the giving or refusing instructions. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BYRNE v. HOAG et al. (L. A. 203.)

JUDGMENT—AMENDMENT.

In foreclosure on default in payment of the first of several installments of interest contracted to be paid, a decree directing a sale to satisfy said installment alone, which was signed by the judge, and entered by the clerk, could not be amended on motion of plaintiff, so as to provide for further sales on subsequent defaults.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Riverside county; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Action by Olive Byrne against Abraham Hoag and another, in which there was a judgment for plaintiff. An amended judgment was subsequently entered, from which defendants appeal. Reversed.

Chas. R. Gray, for appellants. Purington & Adair, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment against them, entered on the 28th day of November, 1895. The facts of the case, as they appear upon the record, are as follows: In 1893 the plaintiff commenced this action against the defendants to foreclose a mortgage given by the latter to the former to secure a promissory note for $2,000, dated April 27, 1892, payable in three years from date, with interest at 12 per cent. per annum, payable annually. At the time of the commencement of the suit the first installment of interest was due, and it was alleged in the complaint "that no sum either on the account of the principal or interest on the said note has been paid"; and the prayer is for judgment for the said sum of $2,000 and interest, and that the usual decree be made for the sale of the mortgaged premises, the application of the proceeds thereof to the satisfaction of the whole amount of the note, and for a deficiency judgment. In the answer the defendant denied that there was anything more due than the one year's interest, and prayed that the plaintiff have no greater relief than a decree with respect to said interest. The court rendered a judgment for the sum of $240, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 27th day of April, 1893, and for an attorney's fee of $100 and costs, and decreed that the mortgaged premises be sold to satisfy that amount. This was all that the judgment embraced. The decree was signed by the judge of the superior court in which the action was pending, and was entered on the 27th day of November, 1893. Findings were waived. On the 15th day of August, 1895, more than a year and a half after the entry of said judgment, plaintiff's attorneys served upon defendants and their attorneys a notice that on the 30th day of September, 1895, or as soon thereafter as a hearing could be had, they would move the court, "on all the papers on file in this action, and the records of said case," for leave to amend the said judgment, entered on the 28th of November, 1893, so that it should read in accordance with the form of judgment annexed to said notice, and marked "Exhibit A." This notice was accompanied by an affidavit of one of plaintiff's attorneys, the substantial part of which is as follows: "That judgment in said action was inadvertently entered, failing to comply with the decision of the court in this action in this: That said decree did not provide for the payment of the principal or interest thereafter to become due on the note sued upon in this action; that, by inadvertence, the clerk was allowed to enter said defective judgment; that the defect in said judgment was not noticed by the plaintiff's attorneys until May, 1895"; and that the pressure of business, etc., had prevented the discovery of the defect of the judgment. This motion was opposed by the defendant; and on the hearing of the motion, against the objection of defendants, there was introduced a paper indorsed "Opinion," signed by the said judge of the court, in which it is said: "In this action plaintiff is entitled to judgment only for the interest on the mortgage note now due and unpaid. I am satisfied that under the wording of the note and mortgage, which are to be construed together, that section 728 [Code Civ. Proc.] should govern the foreclosure proceedings, and that the rule as laid down in the cases of Bank v. Johnson, 53 Cal. 99, and Yoakam v. White, 97 Cal. 286, 32 Pac. 238, should apply. Attorney's fee, $100." This paper was not marked "Filed," and there was no evidence that it ever was in the possession of the clerk of the court, and no evidence as to where it was obtained. After the hearing of the motion, the court made an order as follows: "It is ordered that the judgment entered in this action on the 28th day of November, 1893, be amended to read as set forth in said notice of motion, and that the same be entered as of date the 28th day of November, 1893." This order was dated December 17, 1895, and the judgment prepared by counsel for plaintiff, and annexed to his said notice of motion, was then entered. This judgment then so entered differed slightly from the first judgment in the amount found due, and then proceeded at length to provide that when, at any time thereafter, any installment of interest secured by the note should become due, and also whenever the principal should become due, an order be made for the sale of the residue of the mortgaged premises not theretofore sold, etc.

It is quite clear that the court had no jurisdiction to enter this second judgment. The failure to enter such a judgment as the plaintiff desired in the first instance, in 1893, was not the result of any inadvertence, or the misprision of the clerk. The case does not come within any of the authorities cited, which hold that where the clerk has failed to enter the judgment ordered by the court, or has failed to enter any judgment after a decision rendered by the court, and the record shows what judgment should have been entered, then such a judgment may be entered as will conform to the actual decision of the court. In the case at bar it is not necessary to inquire whether the paper marked "Opinion" was properly allowed in evidence, or what the meaning of that paper is. The decree, as entered in 1893, was signed by the judge; and, under any view, it was his last direction to the clerk, and was the decision of the case. It has been held that it is unnecessary for a judge to sign a judgment, although it has been the almost invariable custom in this state for decrees in equity to be so signed; but, where the judge does sign the decree, his signature, as was said in Re Cook's Estate, 77 Cal. 227, 17 Pac. 923, and 19 Pac. 431, is intended "to give the clerk a surer means of correctly entering what has been adjudged." In this case, therefore, the judgment was entered by the clerk exactly as the court ordered it to be entered, in the surest way in which the judge could express his intention. There was, therefore, no mistake or misprision of the clerk; and, if there was any error committed in rendering the judgment, it was a judicial error, which could be remedied only by appeal or motion for a new trial. To allow a judgment to be radically changed on mere motion, a year and a half after it had been entered, for no other reason than that contended for in the case at bar, would be to destroy that certainty and stability which are the main characteristics of final judgments. The judgment appealed from is reversed.

McFADDEN v. DIETZ. (L. A. 219.)

APPEAL.

Where an uncontradicted affidavit shows that the appeal was taken for delay, on dismissing the appeal damages will be allowed respondent. Duncan v. Grady, 34 Pac. 112, 99 Cal. 552, and Koelling v. Rutz, 41 Pac. 781, 108 Cal. 664, followed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; B. T. Williams, Judge.

Action by A. W. McFadden against A. C. Dietz. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss. Granted.

Shepherd & Eastin, for appellant. Thos. O. Toland, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This case is now before us on a motion of the respondent to dismiss the appeal for failure of the appellant to file his points and authorities within the time specified by the rules of this court, and also upon a motion that respondent be allowed damages upon the dismissal of the appeal, upon the ground that the same was taken merely for delay, etc. The motion to dismiss the appeal must clearly be granted, for the transcript was filed on the 23d day of April, 1896, and at the time the motion was submitted, which was several months afterwards, no points and authorities had been filed by the appellant. When the respondent served his notice to dismiss the appeal and for damages, he made and served upon the appellant an affidavit which showed that appellant, according to his own statements and declarations, had taken the appeal for delay, and the statements of this affidavit have in no way been denied by the appellant. It has been held here that, upon a motion to dismiss the appeal and for damages, this court will not, in considering said motion, look into the record to see if the appeal be frivolous, and that damages would not be awarded upon that ground until the final disposition of the appeal; but it has also been held that, where an uncontradicted affidavit shows that the appeal was taken for delay, damages will be allowed on the dismissal of the appeal. This was expressly held in Duncan v. Grady, 99 Cal. 552, 34 Pac. 112, and in Koelling v. Rutz, 108 Cal. 664, 41 Pac. 781. The same ruling seems to have been made in Buckley v. Stebbins, 2 Cal. 149, and in Pacheco v. Bemal, Id. 150. It is not necessary to determine here how far we would look into conflicting evidence as to the delay, if there had been such evidence; for, as in the cases above cited, the statement in the affidavit filed by the respondent is not controverted. The case at bar, we think, clearly calls for the imposition of damages. The appeal is dismissed, with $100 damages as part of his costs of appeal.

N. P. PERINE CONTRACTING & PAVING CO. v. CITY OF PASADENA. (L. A. 195.)

MUNICIPAL IMPROVEMENTS — BIDDER'S CERTIFIED CHECK—FORFEITURE—CONTRACT—ILLEGAL PROCEEDINGS.

1. The street law (St. 1891, p. 199, § 4), which, in reference to competitive bids for public improvements, provides that, if the bidder fails to enter into the contract, "then the certified check accompanying his bid, and the amount therein mentioned, shall be declared to be forfeited," authorizes a forfeiture only where the failure is to enter into a contract based on legal proceedings of the municipal authorities.

2. On the letting of a construction contract, the municipal authorities must determine the extent of the improvement, the items of material and work, ascertain the total expense, and definitely fix the price in the contract. Bolton v. Gilleran, 38 Pac. 881, 105 Cal. 244, followed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Action by the N. P. Perine Contracting & Paving Company against the city of Pasadena. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff submitted to the defendant a bid for the performance of certain street work, and with the bid deposited its certified checks in the sum of $3,000. Plaintiff was awarded the contract, but, becoming convinced that the proceedings were illegal, it refused to proceed, declined to enter into the contract, and made demand for the return of its checks. Defendant refused to comply with the demand, cashed the checks, and retained the money under a claim of forfeiture. This action was instituted for its recovery. From the judgment rendered against it, and from the order denying it a new trial, defendant appeals.

Appellant contends that its demurrer should have been sustained, and its motion for a nonsuit granted, upon the ground that plaintiff, having become a successful bidder, suffered absolute and unconditional forfeiture by its refusal to enter into the contract. The street law in terms declares that if the bidder "fails, neglects or refuses to enter into the contract, * * * then the certified check accompanying his bid, and the amount therein mentioned, shall be declared to be forfeited." St. 1891, p. 199, § 4. It is upon this language that the claim above mentioned is based. The argument is not tenable. Plaintiff averred and proved facts fully establishing the illegality and invalidity of the proceedings which led up to and were to have culminated in a contract. By entering into such a contract it would have received nothing. It could have looked neither to the city nor to the property owners for recompense for its labor. The street law contemplates a forfeiture for a failure to enter into a contract based upon legal proceedings of the municipal authorities, not for a failure to enter into a contract which, so far as the contractor is concerned, is mere waste paper, and under which he would expend money and labor without the possibility of remuneration. In such a case the promise of the contractor, accompanied by his certified check, is a naked offer, met and supported by no consideration. There is no estoppel. The contractor has received no benefit. The city has sustained no injury. Upon such a total failure of consideration, a promise resting upon expected benefits which can never be received is no longer binding, and a deposit of money accompanying such a promise is recoverable at law. Hayes v. Los Angeles Co., 99 Cal. 74, 33 Pac. 766; 1 Pars. Cont. (7th Ed.) p. 462.

The court in its findings specified certain particulars in which the street law had not been complied with, and concluded therefrom that the proceedings were invalid. These findings are attacked. It is not necessary to consider all or many of the points raised. One of the findings is unquestioned, and its facts are decisive of the case. The specifications contain the following: "But the contractor shall put in such extra concrete as the superintendent of streets and the city engineer may require, and in such places and in such form as they may designate. For all such extra concrete the contractor shall be paid at a pro rata of contract price for the actual quantity laid." Here there is left to the superintendent of streets and the city engineer power to increase the cost of work to an indefinite extent. A discretion lodged in the board alone is sought to be devolved upon these officers, and all means are withheld from the property owner of determining what may to him be the ultimate cost of the finished work. The case comes squarely within the principle enunciated in Bolton v. Gilleran, 105 Cal. 244, 38 Pac. 881. The judgment and order are affirmed.

TRIAL—SUFFICIENCY OF FINDING.

A general finding by the jury that "all the allegations of the complaint are true," and that "none of the denials contained in the answer is true," is sufficient as a finding of facts.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by John Gale against W. B. Bradbury. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Darwin C. Allen, for appellant. Reinstein & Eisner, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a money judgment, in favor of plaintiff, in the sum of $523.82, with interest, etc. The only point made by appellant for a reversal of the judgment is that the findings are insufficient, because they merely find generally "that each and all of the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint are true, and are sustained by the evidence," and "that none of the denials contained in defendant's answer herein is true, or is sustained by the evidence." The answer contained only denials. Such findings have been held to be sufficient by this court by a long line of decisions upon the subject, commencing with McEwen v. Johnson, 7 Cal. 260. In Johnson v. Klein, 70 Cal. 186, 11 Pac. 606, the court said: "It has been so often held here that a finding that all the averments of the complaint are true is a sufficient finding of facts that an appeal grounded on its alleged insufficiency must be held to have been taken for delay;" and in that case the judgment was affirmed, with damages. Since then the same rule has been frequently restated. Gwinn v. Hamilton, 75 Cal. 266, 17 Pac. 212; Williams v. Hall, 79 Cal. 607, 21 Pac. 965; San Diego Co. v. Seifert, 97 Cal. 594, 32 Pac. 644. In the cases cited by appellant, the finding was held to be defective, because it did not clearly state that all the averments of the complaint were true, and all of the denials in the answer untrue, but left the matter in uncertainty, as, for instance, by a finding that the "material" averments were true, or that certain allegations were untrue "except only so far as the same accord with the foregoing facts." But in the case at bar the findings are the same as those heretofore frequently held to be good. The judgment is affirmed, with $50 damages, to be entered by the court below as part of the costs of this appeal.

McHENRY et al. v. DOWNER, Tax Collector.

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 3, 1897.)

TAXATION OF NATIONAL BANK SHARES—STATUTES CONSTRUED—INEQUALITY IN TAXATION.

1. Shares of stock in national banks are proper subjects of state taxation, subject to the restrictions imposed by Rev. St. U. S. § 5219.

2. Const. Cal. art. 13, § 1, providing that all property not exempt "shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law," is not self-executing, but leaves the machinery for ascertaining the value of all property for the purposes of taxation to be provided by the legislature.

3. A shareholder in a national bank is not taxable on his stock under Pol. Code Cal. § 3608, prescribing the method for taxing corporate property, which provides that "all property belonging to corporations shall be assessed and taxed, but no assessment shall be made of shares of stock, nor shall any holder thereof be taxed therefor."

4. Under the restriction contained in Rev. St. U. S. § 5219, that the shares of stock in national banks shall not be taxed by a state at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such state, such shares are not taxable under the statute for the taxation of personal property generally; the owner of "other moneyed capital" invested in credits, whether by a corporation in which he is a stockholder, and which is assessed under Pol. Code Cal. § 3608, or by himself individually, being entitled by Id. § 3629, to a deduction from his assessment for debts due to bona fide residents of the state, while the owner of bank stock, which is property, and not a credit, cannot obtain such deduction.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; William O. Minor, Judge.

Controversy, submitted on agreed statement, between O. McHenry and others and W. A. Downer, tax collector, to determine the validity of a tax levied on plaintiffs, as the owners of shares of stock in a national bank. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Lloyd & Wood, for appellants. L. W. Fulkerth, Dist. Atty., and P. H. Griffin, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is a controversy without action, submitted upon an agreed statement to the superior court in and for the county of Stanislaus, under the provisions of section 1138 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to determine the legality of a tax imposed upon the plaintiffs, and the right of the defendant as tax collector to enforce payment thereof. By the judgment in the case, the validity of the tax, and the right of the defendant to collect the same, were upheld. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment, and the cause comes up on the judgment roll.

It appears from the agreed statement: (1) The First National Bank of Modesto is a banking corporation, created under and pursuant to the laws of the United States in relation to the creation and organization of national banks, with a paid-up capital stock of $100,000, divided into 1,000 shares of $100 each, and located and having its place of business at Modesto, in the county of Stanislaus, state of California. (2) The plaintiffs, and each of them, were at the several dates herein mentioned the holders and owners of certain of the shares of stock in said national bank. The number of shares owned and held by each of the plaintiffs is stated in the agreed statement, but is unimportant here. (3) For the years 1894 and 1895, or for either of said years, said plaintiffs, or any of them, or the corporation or its officers, did not furnish to the assessor of the county a statement showing the respective interests or property of said plaintiffs, or any of them, in or to the paid-up capital stock of said First National Bank, or in or to any of its personal property or the shares of the capital stock owned by them in said corporation, and did not furnish any statement showing the amount of any debt or debts due from them, or any of them, or from the corporation to bona fide residents of this state, or to firms or corporations doing business in this state. (4) For the years 1894 and 1895 the assessors of said Stanislaus county assessed the said First National Bank, upon its real estate and mortgage interests in real estate, and upon the furniture and fixtures of its banking office only, at the full cash value of such real estate, mortgage interests, furniture, and fixtures, said bank claiming that its other property was not subject to taxation under state authority. For the years 1894 and 1895 all the several banking corporations and other corporations located in said county, other than national banking corporations, were assessed upon all their real and personal property at its full cash value; but the shareholders in state banks and state corporations were not assessed upon their shares of stock therein, such shares of stock being treated as exempt from assessment under the provisions of section 3608 of the Political Code of the state of California. (5) J. F. Campbell, county assessor for said Stanislaus county for the year 1895, assessed to each of the plaintiffs herein the shares of stock by them severally held in said First National Bank of Modesto. He ascertained that said shares were of the cash value of $100 per share over and above the real estate, etc., assessed to the bank. The assessor pursued the following course in arriving at the value of the stock, viz.: He ascertained that the paid-up capital stock was $100,000; undivided profits, $4,140; surplus, $20,000,—total value, $124,140. He deducted therefrom, value real estate assessd to bank, $6,305; value mortgage interest to bank, $5,596; value office furniture, etc., to bank, $800,—thus leaving a balance of $111,439. From this sum he deducted 10 per cent. for bad debts. He further ascertained that the capital stock was divided into 1,000 shares of $100 each, and thus determined that they were of the value of $100 each. He also found that said shares had not been assessed for the purposes of taxation for the year 1894, and thereupon doubled the assessment of 1895, and assessed said shares at $200 each. The state board of equalization reduced the value of all property assessed for taxation in said county for the year 1895 10 per cent., and upon the property as so reduced taxes were levied. Plaintiffs have tendered to the tax collector all sums due from them for taxes for the year 1895, save and except the tax imposed upon said shares of stock so by them held and owned, which said last-mentioned tax they claim is contrary to law, and therefore illegal and void; and said tax collector, the defendant herein, claims that the same is lawful, and therefore a good and valid claim. As before stated, the superior court adjudged that the taxes imposed upon the shares of stock are legal and valid, and that defendant has a right to collect the same. The plaintiffs appeal.

The points made by appellants for reversal are: (1) The taxes in question were not assessed in pursuance of the provisions of section 1 of article 13 of the constitution of this state. (2) The taxes in question are illegal, because the property assessed is not subject to assessment for the purposes of taxation, and is exempt therefrom by the provisions of section 3608 of the Political Code. (3) The taxes in question are illegal, because they were levied in violation of the provisions of the national bank act. For the sake of greater brevity we shall consider the propositions involved in the several contentions of appellants not in the order of their sequence, but together.

Section 1 of article 13 of the constitution of this state is as follows: "All property in the state, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law. The word 'property,' as used in this article and section, is hereby declared to include moneys, credits, bonds, stocks, dues, franchises and all other matters and things, real, personal and mixed, capable of private ownership: provided, that growing crops, property used exclusively for public schools, and such as may belong to the United States, this state, or to any county or municipal corporation within this state, shall be exempt from taxation. The legislature may provide, except in the case of credits secured by mortgage or trust deed, for a deduction from credits of debts due to bona fide residents of this state." It will appear at a glance that the foregoing constitutional provision is not, and does not pretend to be, self-executing. All property not exempt shall be taxed in proportion to its value, but that value is to be "ascertained as provided by law." The constitution fixes the liability of property to taxation, and the standard upon which it is based, viz. in proportion to its value; but the duty of prescribing the machinery by which to ascertain such value is confided to the legislature. "Taxes are the enforced proportional contribution of persons and property, levied by the authority of the state, for the support of the government, and for all public needs." Cooley, Tax'n, p. 1. The power of taxation is lodged with the legislative branch of our government. "The legislature must therefore determine all questions of state necessity, discretion, or policy involved in ordering a tax, and in apportioning it; must make all the necessary rules and regulations which are to be observed in order to produce the desired returns; and must decide upon the agencies by which collections shall be made." Cooley, Tax'n (2d Ed.) p. 43.

The question presented seems to divide itself under two heads: (1) May the legislature of the state tax the stock of national banks? And, if yea, (2) has it provided adequate means for so doing?

The first query is of easy solution. National banks are agencies of the federal government, selected as a necessary or convenient means to the exercise of its functions, and are not, except by its consent, subject to the taxing power of the states. Were it otherwise, it is said a state dissatisfied therewith could tax them out of existence, and thus indirectly hamper and thwart the operations of the general government. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316; Osborn v. Bank, 9 Wheat. 738; Van Allen v. Assessors, 3 Wall. 573; Austin v. Boston, 14 Allen, 359; Flint v. Boston, 99 Mass. 141; State v. Mayor, etc., of Newark, 39 N. J. Law, 380. The general government has, however, consented that, subject to certain restrictions, the states may tax the stock or shares of national banks. By the act of congress of June 3, 1864, as amended February 10, 1868 (Rev. St. U. S. § 5219), it is provided as follows: "Nothing herein shall prevent all the shares in any association from being included in the valuation of the personal property of the owner or holder of such shares in assessing taxes imposed by authority of the state within which the association is located; but the legislature of each state may determine and direct the manner and place of taxing all the shares of national banking associations located within the state, subject only to the two restrictions, that the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such state, and that the shares of any national banking association owned by nonresidents of any state shall be taxed in the city or town where the bank is located and not elsewhere. Nothing herein shall be construed to exempt the real property of associations from either state, county or municipal taxes, to the same extent, according to its value, as other real property is taxed." It will thus be seen that, subject to the two restrictions enumerated in the act of congress, shares of stock in national banks are proper subjects of state taxation. In the present instance the shares were taxed in the county and city or town where the bank is located, and, as none of the shareholders appear to be nonresidents of the state, no violation of the restriction as to the place of taxation appears.

This brings us to a consideration of the second question, viz.: Has the legislature of this state provided the means for the taxation of the stock in harmony with the requirement of the act of congress, which requires that the rate of taxation shall not be in excess of that imposed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of citizens of the state? Prior to 1881, section 3640 of our Political Code read as follows: "Each person, firm or corporation owning or having in his or its possession any of the shares of the capital stock of any corporation, association or joint stock company shall be assessed therefor. If the corporation, association or joint stock company has its principal place of business in this state, the assessable value of each share of its stock shall be ascertained by taking from the market value of its entire capital stock the value of all property assessed to it, and dividing the remainder by the entire number of shares into which its capital stock is divided. The owner or holder of capital stock in corporations, associations and joint stock companies whose principal place of business is not within the state must be individually assessed for such stock," etc. The section provided, further, that shareholders, in their statements to the assessor, should designate the number of shares held by them, and the name of the corporation, and that they should present a certificate as to the amount or value of property assessed to the corporation in order to secure a deduction on account thereof. Under the law as it then stood, the shares of stock held by Nancy Miller in the National Gold Bank of D. O. Mills & Co. were assessed to her for the purposes of taxation, in the same manner substantially as in the case at bar. An agreed statement was made, involving the same facts substantially as here. The case came before this court in Miller v. Heilbron, 58 Cal. 133, whereupon it was held that the attempted taxation of the shares in the national bank was in violation of the permission and limitations contained in section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and therefore void. It was held in that case that the fact that shares in the national bank were assessed the same as shares in state banks was not sufficient; that the clause in the United States statute that "the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital," etc., "means something more than that there should be no discrimination with respect to the percentage or any valuation which might be made; but that, taking the assessment, rate of assessment, and valuation together, the taxation on shares of national banks should not be greater than on other moneyed capital." Then, as now, under our constitution and laws, "other moneyed capital" invested in credits entitled the holder thereof to deduct therefrom all debts due by the party assessed to bona fide residents of the state. As national bank shares are property, and not credits, the assessor is not authorized to deduct from the value thereof debts due by the owner to others; hence it was held that there was a clear discrimination in favor of other moneyed capital, and against the holders of such bank shares. People v. Weaver, 100 U. S. 543, is referred to and relied upon in support of the conclusion reached, and, we think, supports such conclusion. So in Van Allen v. Assessors, 3 Wall. 573, where a statute of the state of New York provided for the taxation of national bank shares at the same rate as was imposed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of the other individuals of the state, but did not impose a tax upon the shares of state banks, although a tax was levied upon the capital of such state banks, it was held under the act of congress of 1864, which contained a provision, in addition to the present restrictions, that the rate of taxation imposed upon such shares should not exceed that imposed upon state banks; that a tax upon the capital of state banks was not the equivalent of a tax upon the shares of national banks, not exceeding their par value, for the reason that the capital of state banks may consist of the bonds of the United States which are exempt from state taxation, etc.; and that the tax was hence invalid.

After the transaction arose out of which Miller v. Heilbron, supra, grew, and in 1881, section 3608 of the Political Code was amended so as to read as follows: "Shares of stock in corporations possess no intrinsic value over and above the actual value of the property of the corporation which they stand for and represent, and the assessment and taxation of such shares and also of the corporate property would be double taxation. Therefore all property belonging to corporations shall be assessed and taxed, but no assessment shall be made of shares of stock, nor shall any holder thereof be taxed therefor." The constitutionality of this section was drawn in question in the case of People v. Badlam, 57 Cal. 594, which was an application for a writ of mandate to compel Badlam, as assessor, to assess to various holders certificates of stock by them held in corporations, etc. The court upheld the section of the Code, placing its opinion upon the ground that, where all of the property of a corporation was assessed to the corporation, to again assess the shares of stock to the shareholders would be double taxation, which is inhibited by our constitution. Assuming then, as we must, that section 3608 of the Political Code is constitutional, this difference is presented in the method of valuation for the purposes of taxation between state banks and the shareholders of national banks: The shares of stock in the former are not assessed. In lieu thereof, all the property of the corporation is assessed. But this does not include government bonds or other nonassessable property, and all solvent creditors unsecured by deed of trust, mortgage, or other lien on real or personal property due or owing are to be assessed subject to a deduction for all debts (not secured as above) due and owing by the corporation to bona fide residents of the state. Pol. Code, § 3629. In the latter—that is to say, in the case of shares of national banks—the stock is assessed at its value after deducting only the property actually assessed to the corporation; that is to say, its real estate and debts secured by mortgage, trust deed, etc. As before stated, the assessor is not authorized to deduct debts owing by the owner of the shares, for the reason that shares of stock are property, and not credits, from which, under the law, debts can be deducted. The disparity in the mode of valuation becomes more apparent when we consider that one-third of the paid-up capital stock of every national bank must be invested in nonassessable property, viz. in the registered bonds of the government of the United States, which are required to be deposited with the treasurer of the United States as security for its notes, before it can be authorized to do business. No method is provided in our statute for deducting from the value of the shares anything on this account, and in the case at bar it was not done.

Waiving, then, the fact that shares in state banks are not assessed at all, and assuming that the assessment of all the property of a state bank may be the equivalent of the assessment of the shares of stock in a national bank, and the stubborn fact still remains that under our law it is not such equivalent, but militates most grievously against the owners of stock in the national banks. Exact equality, from a mathematical standpoint, may not be attainable in the matter of taxation; but a system which of necessity, and not from accident or error of judgment, discriminates against the owners in national banks to a large extent, is in violation of the restriction imposed by congress upon the privilege granted to the states to tax shares in national banks. In other words, as was said in Boyer v. Boyer, 113 U. S. 689, 5 Sup. Ct. 706, the expression used in the United States statute, "that the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital," etc., refers not simply to the rate of taxation, but to the whole process of assessment and valuation, and that a state law which "establishes a mode of assessment by which such shares are valued higher in proportion to their real value than is other moneyed capital," etc., is in violation of the restriction contained in the act of congress. The paramount object of the restriction by the act of congress upon the taxation of shares in the national banks by the several states is aptly stated by Mr. Justice Mathews in Mercantile Bank v. New York, 121 U. S. 138, 7 Sup. Ct. 826, in which case, after stating the doctrine of previous cases, he added: "The main purpose, therefore, of congress, in fixing limits to state taxation on investments on shares of national banks, was to render it impossible for the state, in levying such a tax, to create and foster an unequal and unfriendly competition, by favoring institutions or individuals carrying on a similar business and operations and investments of a like character. The language of the act of congress is to be read in the light of this policy."

Keeping steadily in view this policy and purpose, many of the cases which at first blush seem irreconcilable become plain, and are referable to patent sources of distinction. It is contended by counsel for respondent that the cases of Miller v. Heilbron and Van Allen v. Assessors, supra, have been virtually overruled by the later cases in the supreme court of the United States. We have examined such later cases with some care, and while it must be conceded that some of them restrict the broad reasoning of those cases, and point out numerous exceptions to the general rules therein enunciated, we see no expression of dissent from the principles decided. It has been held that savings banks and trust associations are not within the reason of the rule provided by congress, and hence that the restriction does not apply to them (Mercantile Bank v. New York, 121 U. S. 138, 7 Sup. Ct. 826); also, that "it could not have been the intention of congress to exempt bank shares from taxation because some moneyed capital was exempt" (Hepburn v. School Directors, 23 Wall. 480; Bank v. Ayers, 160 U. S. 660, 16 Sup. Ct. 412); also, that "the act of congress was not intended to curtail the state power on the subject of taxation." It simply required that capital invested in national banks should not be taxed at a greater rate than like property similarly invested. It was not intended to cut off the power to exempt particular kinds of property if the legislature chose so to do. Adams v. Nashville, 95 U. S. 19. We think the spirit breathed in all the later cases is this: The several states may exempt certain personal property from taxation; may provide a different mode of taxation for property, the use of which produces no competition with capital invested in national banks. These exceptions, however, must not operate as an unfriendly discrimination against investments in national bank shares. In view of this doctrine and of the condition of our law, we are of opinion: (1) That, under section 3608 of our Political Code, shares of stock in national banks are not subject to assessment for the purposes of taxation. (2) If it be conceded that this section has no application to the shares of stock in national banks, and that they may be assessed as other personal property, then the machinery provided therefor works such a discrimination in favor of state banks, and against shares of national banks, that it is violative of the restrictions of the act of congress, and that the assessment and tax in the case at bar are null and void. We recommend that the judgment of the court below be reversed, and the court directed to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiffs.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment of the court below is reversed, and the court directed to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiffs.

WILLIAMS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LASSEN COUNTY. (S. F. 297.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—NOTICE OF APPEAL—EVIDENCE OF FILING.

The marking of the filing of a notice of appeal by a justice is not the only competent evidence of the filing of the paper, and the absence of an entry in the justice's docket is not conclusive proof of the fact that it had not been filed.

Department 1. Petition by one Williams for a writ of certiorari to the superior court of Lassen county. Writ dismissed.

Spencer & Raker and F. C. Spencer, for petitioner. Shinn & Shinn, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The court is unanimously of the opinion that the writ ought to be dismissed. The fact, impliedly found by the court in exercising jurisdiction, that the notice of appeal had been filed, was, under the circumstances, entirely justified. The marking of the filing is not the exclusively competent evidence of the filing of the paper, and the absence of an entry in the justice's docket is not conclusive proof of the fact that it had not been filed. Writ dismissed.

BANK OF BRITISH COLUMBIA v. FRESE et al. (S. F. 377.)

RIGHTS OF PLEDGEE—EXPENSES—EVIDENCE.

1. A bank authorized drafts on it to pay for goods bought by a certain firm, provided they were accompanied by invoices and bills of lading. It paid the drafts, and held the invoices, etc., as security. After the sale by the firm or part of the goods, which the bank delivered, and failure of the firm, the bank disposed of the balance through brokers. Held, that the bank was entitled to add to the amount paid on the drafts the reasonable charges for storage, insurance, cartage, brokerage, etc.

2. The bank was also entitled to an allowance of discounts for cash on sales made by it, where the discounts were not more than the interest on time sales, or unusual, or more than equaled the risk of loss if the sales had been on credit.

3. It was entitled to any sum paid for "customhouse drayage to warehouse."

4. The bank, as against a surety of the firm, was not entitled to commissions which the firm agreed to pay on the amount of the drafts.

5. Where an account of one party is put in evidence by the adverse party, the latter must call for any required explanation of an item of the account, and the item will not be disallowed because it does not indicate what it was for.

6. Where an objection was sustained to a question asking a witness if he had learned a certain fact, and no offer was made to show that the witness had learned it, prejudicial error did not appear.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by the Bank of British Columbia against William Frese and others on a promissory note. From a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Sidney V. Smith, for appellant. Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman and Page, Eells & Wheeler, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. On November 3, 1891, the plaintiff made and delivered to William Frese & Co., a co-partnership doing business at San Francisco, a letter of credit directed to Bullock Bros. & Co., of Rangoon, authorizing them to draw on plaintiff, at London, drafts at six months' sight, for any sum or sums not exceeding in the aggregate £13,000 sterling, for the invoice cost of merchandise to be shipped from Rangoon to San Francisco on account of said Frese & Co., and agreed to pay said drafts at maturity, provided they were accompanied by invoices and bills of lading purporting to be of the required value and shipped as above stated. Under said letter of credit, Bullock Bros. & Co. drew drafts upon the plaintiff at London amounting in all to $61,892.91, and the same were accompanied by invoices and bills of lading as required by the letter of credit. On March 28, 1892, none of said drafts having matured or been paid, the defendants Roth, Blum & Co., at the request of William Frese & Co., executed with said last-named firm a promissory note of that date, at one day, for the sum of $10,000, and delivered the same to the plaintiff as collateral security for the payment of drafts to be drawn under said letter of credit, said note to be canceled and returned to Roth, Blum & Co. as soon as the drafts under said letter of credit should be paid. The cargo of rice purchased under said letter of credit arrived at San Francisco September 17, 1892. Frese & Co. failed in business some time between June 20th and August 21, 1893. Up to the time of their failure they made sales of portions of the rice, and the bank delivered the rice so sold. After their failure the bank disposed of the rice through brokers. Plaintiff's account, as rendered, shows a balance due the bank of $7,981.85. This action is upon said promissory note. Frese & Co. pleaded their discharge in insolvency. Roth, Blum & Co. set out in their answer the circumstances under which the note was made, and alleged that the aggregate amount of drafts drawn was $61,892.91; that plaintiff held, as security for the payment of said drafts, the invoices and bills of lading of said merchandise, and had received on account of said drafts a sum largely in excess of their aggregate amount. The court found that plaintiff had received the proceeds of said cargo, and that "said cargo realized a sum in excess of the aggregate amount of all the drafts drawn under said letter of credit, to wit, in excess of the sum of $61,892.91." Judgment was entered for the defendants, and the plaintiff appeals therefrom, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

Appellant contends that said finding is not justified by the evidence. Upon the trial the discharge in insolvency of Frese & Co. was admitted by the plaintiff, and Roth & Blum admitted the incorporation of the plaintiff, and the making and delivery of the note set out in the complaint, and then put in evidence said letter of credit, and plaintiff's acknowledgment in writing that said note was held by it as collateral security for the payment of said drafts. It was also admitted by all parties that drafts were drawn under said letter of credit to the amount of $61,892.91, all of which were paid by the plaintiff. Defendants then called as a witness Walter Powell, manager of the Bank of British Columbia, in San Francisco, by whom said letter of credit was issued, who testified that the total amount received by the bank for the rice was $74,689. Two accounts were made by the bank,—the first from the arrival of the cargo down to the failure of Frese & Co., during which time the sales were made by them and the deliveries by the bank, and the second covered the remainder of the sales, which were made by the bank through brokers; and these accounts were put in evidence by the defendants, from the face of which it appears that the sales were closed July 31, 1894, and at that date there was a balance due the bank of $7,981.85. The sole controversy is as to whether the bank was entitled to charge against the proceeds of sales freight, insurance, customs duties, drayage, broker's commissions, discounts, interest, etc. Of course it was only necessary for the defendants in the court below to establish improper debit items, in the account as rendered, to equal the balance shown by the account to be due to the bank, in order to defeat the plaintiff. It is said by counsel for appellant, in his brief, that the court below adopted the defendants' view, that the expenses of the cargo, consisting of freight, duty, weigher's fees, drayage, and storage, amounting to $15,602.79, could not be charged by the bank, and deducted from the proceeds, as against Roth, Blum & Co., who are sureties to the extent of $10,000, the amount of their note. If such holding is correct, the judgment must be affirmed, as a matter of course, though if it be wrong, and it be shown that other items appearing on the debit side of the account, equaling the balance claimed by the bank, were improper, an affirmance must follow, notwithstanding the error.

It should first be observed that the burden of proof to establish their defense that the bank had been repaid by the proceeds of the cargo rested upon the defendants. A full and detailed account had been rendered by the bank to the defendants Roth, Blum & Co., and they called as their witness the manager of the bank, and examined him as to various items of the account, and put the entire account in evidence without reservation or qualification, except such as may be inferred from his examination as to particular items; and therefore all other items, unless they appear on the face of the account to be improper, should be allowed. Their answer alleged, and the court found, that plaintiff held, as security for the payment of said drafts, the invoices and bills of lading of the cargo; and if the plaintiff had refused or neglected to obtain possession of the cargo, so that its proceeds were lost to the bank, there can be no question that Roth, Blum & Co. would have been released from liability as sureties, unless upon the clearest showing that the cargo, if received and properly disposed of by the bank, would have been insufficient to reimburse it. It is not shown that the bank could have obtained possession of the cargo, and thus availed itself of that security, without the payment of the freight and other charges above mentioned. It held the invoices and bills of lading, and was the apparent owner, holding the legal title, and prima facie liable for these charges. It is true, the manager of the bank, upon his examination by the defendants, testified that Frese & Co. drew checks payable to John Livingston for freight charges amounting to $11,603.40, and which, when presented, were paid by the bank, and charged in the books to the ordinary account of Frese & Co., but the error was discovered the next morning, and corrected by charging them to the rice account. He further testified, however, that prior to that time Frese & Co. had an account at the bank, but that they did not at the date of the arrival of the cargo, or at any time afterwards, have any moneys to their credit in said bank. The correction of the charge was therefore proper. The first item of the account is a charge of $1,573 for marine insurance upon the cargo, paid by plaintiff upon the arrival of the vessel, September 17, 1892; and this charge, appellant concedes, is improper, and should be deducted from the balance of $7,891.85. It may be further said, without entering into details, that reasonable charges for storage, insurance upon the rice while stored, cartage, brokerage, etc., properly incurred in caring for, preserving, and selling the rice, are properly deducted from the gross receipts. No question is made as to the necessity or propriety of any of these acts, or as to the prices for which the rice was sold, or the manner of sale; but some special objections are made to particular items, which remain to be noticed.

It is contended by defendants that various charges of interest on overdrafts at different dates from September 30, 1892, to June 19, 1893, are improper. Prior to and including September 30, 1892, plaintiff had paid for freight and customs duties $12,306.40, and on October 11th it had paid on the draft drawn under the letter of credit $35,157.74, and on October 14th, balance of draft, $26,735.17; in all, $74,199.31,—a sum exceeding the receipts by over $24,000. It is not questioned that, as between the bank and Frese & Co., the interest charged had not been earned or properly charged; and, if so, we fail to see upon what ground the defendants Roth, Blum & Co. can object. The account shows, however, that nearly if not the whole of the interest so charged was in fact paid by Frese & Co., and these charges of interest are balanced by the credits of money paid by them; and therefore, so far as the charges and credits balance each other, the account as to Roth, Blum & Co. is not affected, even if it be conceded that they are not liable for the interest so charged.

In the account certain entries appear of a given quantity of rice sold at a price stated, amounting to a given sum, "less discount" of a stated amount, the balance being carried out as the amount received from the sale. These items of discount amount to $226.14, and respondents contend that these should be deducted. It is said that these discounts were made for cash, and that the bank should have waited for its pay. It does not appear, however, that the discounts were more than the interest on time sales, or were unusual, or more than equaled the risk of loss if the sales had been made on credit. Respondents' contention upon this point cannot be sustained.

On the debit side of the account is an item, "To Pac. M. S. S. Co., $758.35"; and this entry, it is said, does not indicate what it was for, and should be disallowed. But it was part of the account put in evidence by defendants, and, if it required explanation, they should have called for it.

It is further objected by respondents that in the sums charged on October 11 and 14, 1892,—which were in payment of the drafts, —there was included a commission of 1 per cent., amounting to $618.92, and that they are not chargeable therefor, and that that amount should be deducted. Said sums so charged were the precise amounts of the drafts drawn at Rangoon by Bullock Bros. & Co., under the letter of credit, "for the invoice cost of merchandise," and did not include any commission. The answer of defendants Roth, Blum & Co. alleged that the drafts were so drawn, and were for the sum of $61,892.91 (and the court so found), and said charges above mentioned only equaled the said sum. The contract between the bank and Frese & Co. did provide that a commission of 1 per cent. should be paid the bank upon the amount of drafts drawn under said letter of credit, but it is not included in said items, nor anywhere in the account. If it did, it should be excluded, as defendants are not liable under their contract for profits made by the bank, but only for the liability it incurred.

On the record before us, we find but two items which should be deducted from the balance claimed by the plaintiff. One of these—the item for marine insurance upon the cargo, $1,573—is conceded by appellant. The other is a charge dated "October 6th. To Popper (customhouse drayage to warehouse), $470.75,"—concerning which Mr. Powell testified that it "was paid by the check of W. Frese & Co. on the bank," from which we infer that it was paid with the funds of Frese & Co., and not out of the proceeds of the rice. If it was not paid by Frese & Co., it should stand.

We have not verified the footing of the accounts, but have taken the balance as stated; and deducting the above charges, which, as the evidence now stands, should be disallowed, there would appear to remain due to the plaintiff from respondents $5,938.10. It follows that the finding that "said cargo realized a sum in excess of the aggregate amount of the drafts drawn under said letter of credit" is not justified by the evidence.

But one exception to ruling upon evidence is specified. Mr. Powell was asked the following question: "Did you ever learn from Mr. Blum whether his firm was interested with Frese & Co. in this cargo of rice?" The objection that the question was incompetent and irrelevant was sustained. No offer was made to show that the witness had been so informed, and hence it does not appear that plaintiff was prejudiced, even if it be conceded that the ruling was erroneous.

We are asked by appellant to enter judgment for the plaintiff for such amount as appears to be due it, the facts being before us. But the findings would not support such a judgment, and this court cannot make findings of fact. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

SUMAN v. ARCHIBALD et al. (No. 19,465.)

APPEAL—SUBSTITUTION OF PARTIES—DISMISSAL—WHO MAY MOVE—FAILURE TO FILE POINTS AND AUTHORITIES.

1. Where judgment is rendered against plaintiff in foreclosure, and one of the defendants, who recovers on a counterclaim, assigns his judgment after appeal, the assignee cannot be substituted as appellee.

2. A corporation which has purchased the interest of one of the appellees in the judgment may join the other appellee in a motion to dismiss the appeal.

3. Appellant's failure to file his points and authorities in time is not excused by the fact that one of the appellees, pending the appeal, was adjudged insolvent, and that no assignee had been appointed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; George E. Otis, Judge.

Action by John V. Suman against Melville Archibald and another to recover on a note, and to foreclose the mortgage security. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Dismissed.

Paris & Allison, for appellant. Curtis, Oster & Curtis, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. There has been submitted in this case a motion on behalf of the Abstract & Title Company, a corporation, for the substitution of said corporation as defendant and respondent in the place of Melville Archibald; and also a motion by said corporation and the defendant and respondent Fannie Archibald to dismiss the appeal herein, upon the ground of a failure of appellant to file his points and authorities within the time prescribed by the rule of this court.

The motion to substitute said corporation as defendant and respondent must be denied. The action was brought to foreclose a mortgage against the defendants Melville and Fannie Archibald, executed to secure a promissory note given by said defendants to plaintiff for $1,000. The Archibalds (defendants) set up a counterclaim; and, after trial, the court denied any judgment for plaintiff upon the note and mortgage, and rendered judgment in favor of Melville Archibald against the plaintiff for $155.44, with interest and costs, and also rendered judgment for both Melville and Fannie Archibald against plaintiff for their costs. It is quite apparent that if the judgment should be reversed, and the cause sent back for a new trial, the said corporation would not be a proper party defendant, and it would be entirely unjust to substitute said corporation for the said Melville Archibald, against whom alone a judgment could be rendered on the said note and mortgage. Therefore the said corporation should not be substituted as such defendant.

But it appears that the said Melville Archibald sold and assigned all his interest in said judgment to the said corporation; and we think that the motion to dismiss the appeal may be considered as a motion made by the respondent Fannie Archibald, and the said corporation, as the successor in interest of the said Melville Archibald. And as the transcript was filed in March, 1894, and no points and authorities have been filed, the motion to dismiss, under the rule, should be granted. There is an affidavit on file on behalf of the appellant that on the 8th day of December, 1894, the said Melville Archibald filed a petition in insolvency, and was adjudged insolvent, and that no assignee in insolvency has been appointed; but this fact did not excuse the appellant for not filing his points and authorities in time. Stewart v. Spaulding, 72 Cal. 264, 13 Pac. 661; Merritt v. Glidden, 39 Cal. 564; O'Neil v. Dougherty, 46 Cal. 576; Hestres v. Brennan, 37 Cal. 388. The motion for substitution is denied; and the motion to dismiss the appeal is granted, and the appeal is dismissed.

TURNER v. KEARNEY. (S. F. 188.)

CONTRACTS—HARVESTING OF GRAIN—USE OF MORE THAN ONE MACHINE—CONSTRUCTION.

Plaintiff contracted to harvest all of defendant's grain during the "current season," of 1893, in a thorough and farmer-like manner, "without waste or unnecessary loss"; to begin harvesting as soon as any of the grain was ripe, and work continuously until the harvest was completed; and to "use one or more eighteen-foot combined harvesters." It was admitted that in that locality weeds began to grow up among the grain at harvest time, and that high winds, which shell out the overripe grain, were then frequent. Held, that plaintiff was bound to use more than one harvester, should the condition of the grain make this necessary for its proper preservation. McFarland, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by R. M. Turner against M. Theodore Kearney. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified.

Chickering, Thomas & Gregory and Gerstle & Sloss, for appellant. Freeman & Bates, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an action to recover balance due on a contract for harvesting grain for the defendant. Judgment was for plaintiff, and defendant contends that there should be a deduction of $800 from the judgment, on the ground that plaintiff did not harvest the grain in a good and farmer-like manner, as he had contracted to do, and the evidence and a stipulation made to serve in lieu of evidence show that there resulted an unnecessary loss to that amount. It was stipulated in the contract that plaintiff "will harvest, thresh, and sack all of the grain now growing on the Fruit Vale estate, in Fresno county, and belonging to the said Kearney, during the current season of 1893; that he will harvest all of said grain in a thorough and farmer-like manner, without waste or unnecessary loss; that he will begin such harvesting as soon as any of said grain is thoroughly ripe and fit for harvest, and will thereafter work continuously until the entire harvest is completed; that, for the purpose of performing said work, he will use one or more eighteen-foot combined harvesters, which shall be, and be maintained, in thoroughly good working condition." A great deal of testimony was taken at the trial on both sides upon the question as to whether the grain ought not to have been sooner harvested, and whether, in consequence of delay, there was not unnecessary loss resulting from the grain being shelled out by the wind or the growth of weeds, which prevented an efficient harvesting thereof. Many of the facts were then agreed upon by a stipulation made at the trial, as follows: "It is hereby stipulated and admitted by the parties hereto, for the purposes of the present action: That the plaintiff entered upon the performance of the contract referred to in his complaint and annexed to defendant's answer, to wit, on or about the 12th day of June, 1893, and as soon as defendant's grain was ripe and fit for harvesting; and that the plaintiff harvested the grain on defendant's land in a thorough and farmer-like manner, without waste or unnecessary loss (except such loss as may have resulted from the delay hereinafter specified); and that the plaintiff worked continuously with an eighteen-foot harvester and its appliances and crew until the work was completed, to wit, August 29, 1893; and that on August 12, 1893, he brought another harvester to work, and both harvesters and their crews and appliances were thereafter continuously engaged in the work until it was completed, and both harvesters were maintained in a thoroughly good and working condition. That, after grain is fully ripe and fit for harvesting in the neighborhood in which defendant's grain was, it is liable to be shelled out by wind and other causes, and thereby lost. The defendant's ground was subirrigated, on which there was a tendency for weeds to grow in and among the grain; and, the longer they were permitted to grow, the greater was the probable loss in harvesting, by reason of such weeds growing as high or higher than the grain, and interfering with the threshing and cleaning of the grain while passing through the harvester. That, by reason of all the grain not being harvested within forty days after it was fit for harvesting, there was a loss through its shelling out and by reason of such weeds interfering with the harvesting and cleaning of the grain, and such loss, the parties agree, amounted to eight hundred dollars, and no more; and if, as a matter of law, under said contract, it was the duty of the plaintiff to have provided sufficient means to have threshed all the defendant's grain without waste or unnecessary loss, then it is agreed that the damages resulting from his not furnishing other machines and appliances than those hereinbefore indicated amounted to eight hundred dollars, and no more; and if, on the other hand, it is found, as a matter of law, that it was not the duty of the plaintiff to avoid waste or unnecessary loss, then that the defendant is not to be allowed any damages in this action."

The contract itself must be construed in view of the surrounding facts as shown in the stipulation. It is there expressly admitted that there were special reasons why the grain should be harvested as soon as possible after it was ripe, and that the grain was not harvested within 40 days after it was fit to be harvested, and that not to so harvest it entailed waste and unnecessary loss to the extent of $800; and it is further stipulated that, if it was the duty of the plaintiff under the contract to harvest the grain so as to avoid waste and unnecessary loss, then defendant is entitled to the said amount as damages, otherwise not. The stipulation cannot, of course, be construed to mean by the phrase "unnecessary loss" any loss which it would be possible to avoid by the greatest possible care and diligence, and by the best possible appliances. Such interpretation would make the stipulation a farce or a trick. One party was contending that the agreement to harvest the grain in a good and farmer-like manner required that it should be harvested in time to avoid unnecessary loss,—that is, such loss as would not be suffered if it had been so harvested in proper time; and the stipulation must be held to mean also that the loss was $800 more than would have occurred if the grain had been so harvested.

I think we may start out with the proposition that no one would be likely to contract for the harvesting of his grain in a manner which would entail unnecessary loss in that sense, and much less would he in such a contract provide that the harvest may be so gathered as to cause such loss. Plaintiff contends that two conditions in the contract do have that effect, and, in substance, he contends that they were put in the contract for the express purpose of saving plaintiff from liability for such loss, provided he commenced the harvest in due time with one harvester, and continued the work without cessation until it was finished, and, while at work, did good work. In other words, the contract provides the test of due diligence, and that, if at least one harvester is used, it shall be deemed enough. The two stipulations in the contract referred to are that plaintiff will harvest all the grain now growing during the current season of 1893, and that he will use one or more harvesters, and keep it or them in good working condition. It is difficult to give any meaning to the phrase "current season" which shall indicate a time within which the work must be done. If it means the time within which that grain should be harvested, it is favorable to defendant. If it alludes to the time of harvest generally, it is very indefinite. We all know that grain ripens at different times on different kinds of soil and in different localities. No practical meaning can be given to it other than the harvesting season for that crop. The necessity for a quick harvest must depend greatly upon the season. The contract covered 2,300 acres of growing grain. In that locality high winds are frequent at that time of the year, and it seems that early harvests are essential to good harvests in a farmer-like manner, not only because of prevailing winds which cause overripe grain to shell, but also because at that time weeds begin to grow, which interfere with harvesting and entail loss. These facts were known to the parties when the contract was made. Now, the parties could not know that the season would not be such that grain would be almost wholly lost unless unusual exertions were made for a quick harvest. On the other hand, they did not know but it would ripen slowly, so that one harvester would suffice. I think it part of the common knowledge that combined harvesters are comparatively a recent improvement. By this stipulation the parties agreed that it should be harvested with a combined harvester, and that one or more should be used as the condition of the grain should indicate, and as would be necessary, that it might be done in a good and farmer-like manner, and without waste and unnecessary loss. If there is any doubt as to the purpose of the clause in regard to the use of one or more harvesters, it must, if possible, be construed so as to effectuate the general intent manifest in the contract. The construction given by the respondent seems unreasonable, and makes the contract such as no one in his senses could have deliberately made. See, on this subject, section 1650, Civ. Code. The case is remanded, with directions to modify the judgment by deducting $800, with interest on that sum from August 29, 1893.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; HENSHAW, J.; VAN FLEET, J.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent. It will be observed that appellant's real contention is that respondent should have finished harvesting within 40 days after the first grain was ripe; that for this purpose he should have used more than one harvester; and that because he did not use more than one harvester, and did not complete the harvesting within the 40 days, therefore he failed to "harvest all said grain in a thorough and farmer-like manner, without waste or unnecessary loss." But respondent did not contract to harvest the grain at any particular time, except that it should be done "during the current season of 1893," and it is clear that it was done within that season. He did not contract that he would use more than one 18-foot combined harvester. He began to harvest, as soon as the grain was ripe and fit for harvest, with an 18-foot combined harvester, and thereafter worked "continuously until the entire harvest was completed." While he was so engaged, he did the work "in a thorough and farmer-like manner, without waste or unnecessary loss." He therefore complied with his contract. No doubt, it would have been to appellant's advantage if respondent had put on two or three or a dozen 18-foot combined harvesters, and had completed the work of harvesting within a week or two. But he did not contract so to do, and appellant did not require or ask any such a covenant. There is no provision in the contract that respondent should finish the work at any particular time other than during the current season; and the only other provision as to "delay" is that respondent should commence as soon as the wheat should be fit to cut, and should continuously prosecute the work until the harvesting was finished. This he did. Therefore, in my opinion, the court below properly construed the contract, and the judgment and order should be affirmed.

CHATTEL MORTGAGES.

When a mortgagor in default as to an installment tenders the amount due before the mortgagee elects to treat as due the entire debt, as the mortgage authorizes him to do on default, the right of election is lost.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. B. Cope, Judge.

Action by Flora Sykes against W. H. Arne. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

B. F. Thomas, for appellant. A. E. Putnam, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. We regard this action as without any foundation in merit in its inception, and as manifestly vexatious and oppressive; and the appeal which is here prosecuted as frivolous. The action was to foreclose a chattel mortgage given to secure eight several promissory notes, amounting in the aggregate to $675, made by defendant to plaintiff, falling due at different dates; and was prosecuted upon the theory that by defendant's default in the payment of the note first due plaintiff was entitled to treat defendant as in default on all, and recover the entire debt, under a clause of the mortgage which provided: "That if the mortgagor shall fail to make any payment as in the said promissory notes provided, then the mortgagee may take possession of said property, using all necessary force so to do, and may immediately proceed to sell in the manner provided by law, and from the proceeds pay the whole amount in said notes specified." The first note, which was for $100, fell due January 1, 1895, but allowed 10 days' grace. At the maturity of this note plaintiff placed it in the hands of an agent for collection, who, on the 10th of January, presented it for payment at defendant's office in Santa Barbara. Defendant at this time paid $80 on the note, and asked for time to collect in some outstanding accounts before paying the balance. This request was granted. The agent called again on January 12th, when defendant paid the interest accrued on the note to that date, but asked further time to pay the balance of $20 due on the principal. Mr. Harsh, the agent, having to return to Los Angeles the following day, told defendant he would leave the note in the hands of Mr. McNulta, a local attorney, and desired defendant to pay the balance by the following Monday. Defendant did not pay the balance on that date, and on January 21st was notified by Mr. McNulta that he must pay the balance on the next day, January 22d. On the latter date defendant went to the office of Mr. McNulta, and handed him the balance due on the note, which the latter received, and was about to receipt for, but, on the objection of one Elliott, who claimed to represent plaintiff, Mr. McNulta refused to receive the money, and, although earnestly solicited by defendant to accept the payment, returned the money to defendant. Thereafter, on January 25th, plaintiff notified defendant of plaintiff's election to declare all of said notes due, and demanded their payment. This was refused by defendant, and on January 31st this action was commenced. Defendant set up these facts in his answer, and therein again tendered, and deposited in court, the balance due on the note for principal and interest, amounting to $21. The court found substantially in accord with the averments of the answer, and gave judgment for plaintiff for $21 without costs.

Plaintiff claims that the evidence does not sustain the findings; that the evidence shows that the agent had no authority to extend time to defendant in which to pay the note; that McNulta's authority to receive payment for plaintiff had been revoked before the tender was made to him on January 22d; that defendant was, therefore, in default, and plaintiff had a right to declare the entire debt due, and proceed to foreclose. None of these contentions find support in the record. The evidence shows that the action of the agent was fully within his authority, and that the tender to McNulta was at a time when he was still authorized to act for plaintiff. The clause in the mortgage gave plaintiff the election, upon defendant's default, to proceed at once for the whole debt, but plaintiff did not see fit so to do. The first default was waived by the failure of plaintiff to take advantage of the right to so proceed, and, before plaintiff elected to proceed, defendant had made a tender of all that was actually due; and plaintiff's right to sue for the unmatured notes was thereby lost. "When the entire debt may be treated as due upon any default in payment of interest or other installment, at the election of the mortgagee or trustee, the whole debt is nevertheless not due until the election has been exercised." 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 192, 193, and cases there cited. There were no errors in the rulings on evidence. The whole case would seem to indicate a disposition on the part of the plaintiff to vex and annoy defendant, as the evidence clearly shows that defendant was ready and anxiously desirous of meeting his obligation before the bringing of the action. We think that such litigation should be discouraged. The judgment and order are affirmed, with $100 damages to defendant.

DIVORCE—SETTING ASIDE DECREE.

1. Where a husband has been granted a decree of divorce, and thereafter is ordered to pay a certain sum to defray costs of transcript on application of his wife for a new trial, and is unable to do so, the court cannot, under Civ. Code, § 140, authorizing it to enforce such an order by any remedy applicable to the case, set aside the decree.

2. Under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 473, the authority of a court to vacate a judgment on motion is limited to six months.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by C. A. Storke against Yda A. Storke for a divorce, in which there was a decree for plaintiff. From an order setting aside the decree, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

B. F. Thomas and A. A. Oglesby, for appellant. Grant Jackson, Thos. McNulta, and S. E. Crow, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The superior court rendered a judgment herein, which was entered January 18, 1895, by which it was decreed "that the marriage between the said plaintiff and the said defendant be dissolved, and the same is hereby dissolved, and the said parties are, and each of them is, freed and absolutely released from the bonds of matrimony, and all obligations thereof; and it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff pay to the defendant the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars alimony, and two hundred and fifty dollars counsel fees." February 12, 1895, the court, upon the application of the defendant, setting forth that she desired to move for a new trial, and to appeal from the order denying the same, if it should be denied by the court, and that it was necessary to have the testimony written out, and that she had no means to pay for the same, ordered that the plaintiff pay to the defendant on or before the 18th day of February, 1895, the sum of $350, to defray the cost of transcribing said testimony. The defendant gave notice of her intention to move for a new trial February 12th, and on March 28th, within the time allowed therefor by the court, presented and served upon the plaintiff her proposed statement on motion for a new trial. Amendments thereto were proposed by the plaintiff, and the judge before whom the cause was tried designated May 8th as the day on which he would settle the statement. On that day the matter came on for settlement, and the judge continued the same until July 8th, reciting in his order of continuance the previous order requiring the plaintiff to deposit with the clerk $350, and that, "through his inability to comply with said order," the plaintiff had not deposited the same. No further proceedings appear to have been taken towards a settlement of the statement, and on November 6th the defendant presented her petition to the superior court, setting forth the foregoing facts, and stating that she has been advised by her counsel that she has substantial grounds upon which to make a motion for a new trial, but that she has not the means to defray the expense thereof, or to procure a transcription of the reporter's notes, and "that plaintiff is now, and at all times since the 18th day of February, 1895, has been, unable to pay her the money necessary to procure the said testimony," and asked that said judgment be vacated and set aside. Notice of this application was given to the plaintiff, and, after hearing the parties thereon, the court made an order that "the said decree and judgment in favor of plaintiff, C. A. Storke, and against defendant, Yda Addis Storke, filed and entered January 18, 1895, decreeing a divorce between said plaintiff and defendant, be, and each of them are, hereby vacated and set aside." From this order the present appeal has been taken. The court, also, at the time of making its order, made certain findings of fact as the basis thereof, in which it found "that the statement on motion for a new trial prepared by defendant's attorney, and presented and served as in the preceding finding mentioned and found, represented as correctly as possible the proceedings had on the trial of said cause," but that the judge was unable to settle the said statement without having the testimony written out, and also "that the plaintiff is now, and at all times since the 18th day of February, 1895, has been, unable to pay defendant the money necessary to procure the said testimony."

The authority of the court to direct the plaintiff to pay to the defendant such money as it might deem necessary to enable her to prosecute her motion for a new trial or for an appeal is well settled. Bohnert v. Bohnert, 91 Cal. 428, 27 Pac. 732. And it may enforce its order by any remedy "applicable to the case." Civ. Code, § 140. After the court had rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff upon the issues presented in the case, and such judgment had been entered in the records of the court, it could not be vacated or set aside except by such proceedings as would authorize a court to vacate or set aside a judgment in any other action. The plaintiff had thereby acquired a right of which he could be divested only in the mode provided by law. When the court had found that, by reason of acts of cruelty on the part of the defendant, the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment of divorce from her, and had caused such judgment to be entered in its records, it had no jurisdiction to vacate or set aside that judgment, unless it should determine that it had been rendered through some error, either of law or fact, or by reason of some inadvertence or excusable neglect. It could not disturb or change the rights of the parties, as thus determined, by reason of any facts or transaction occurring subsequent to the rendition of the judgment. And, while it had authority to direct the plaintiff to pay further alimony pending a motion for a new trial, an order vacating the judgment would not be a remedy "applicable" for the enforcement of such order, for the reason that the rights of the parties as fixed by the judgment could be changed only in the mode prescribed by the statute. The authority of the court to vacate a judgment on mere motion is limited by section 473, Code Civ. Proc., to six months after its entry (Brackett v. Banegas, 99 Cal. 623, 34 Pac. 344), whereas in the present case more than nine months had elapsed before the present motion was made. When the court found that the statement which had been prepared by defendant's counsel represented "as correctly as possible the proceedings had on the trial of said cause," its proper course was to settle the same accordingly. The motion for a new trial could then have been heard, and, if the court should have been of the opinion that its former judgment was incorrect, it could have acted accordingly. The order is reversed.

UNITED STATES v. CROOKS et al. (No. 9,613.)

NEW TRIAL—NOTICE OF MOTION—APPEAL—NOTICE—TIME OF TAKING.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 659, requiring notice of motion for new trial to be served on the "adverse party," a defendant whose land, together with that of his co-defendants, is condemned, must serve the latter with notice of such motion.

2. Where a defendant whose land, together with that of his co-defendants, is condemned, appeals, the latter are "adverse parties," on whom notice of appeal must be served.

3. An appeal taken more than one year after the entry of the judgment will be dismissed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; N. Hamilton, Judge.

Action by the United States against M. Crooks, A. A. Cohen, and others to condemn land for a canal. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant Cohen appeals. Appeal from judgment dismissed, and order affirmed.

Garber, Thornton & Bishop, for appellant. Samuel G. Hilborn, Walter Van Dyke, Wm. Craig, and H. S. Foote, U. S. Dist. Atty., for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The United States brought the present action against the appellant and many other defendants for the condemnation of a strip of land lying between the San Leandro and San Antonio Estuaries, for the purpose of constructing a tidal canal by which to turn the water from San Leandro Bay or Estuary into the head of San Antonio Estuary. The complaint contains a description of the strip of land sought to be condemned, and also separate descriptions of the portions thereof belonging to each of the defendants, of which three are alleged to be claimed by the appellant. The superior court rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the condemnation of the entire strip, and awarding damages to each of the defendants for the value of their respective parcels of land so condemned. The appellant moved for a new trial, and the same was heard upon a statement of the case, and denied. From this order, and also from the judgment, he has appealed.

The appeal from the judgment was taken more than one year after its entry, and must therefore be dismissed.

The appellant's notice of intention to move for a new trial was served upon the plaintiff alone, and his notice of appeal from the order denying a new trial was also served upon the plaintiff alone, and was not served upon any of his co-defendants. In Herriman v. Menzies (Cal.) 44 Pac. 660, it was held that a failure to serve the adverse party with the notice of intention to move for a new trial is attended with the same results before the superior court as attend the failure to serve the adverse party with a notice of appeal when the matter is brought before the supreme court. It was said in that case: "Section 659, Code Civ. Proc., requires that the party intending to move for a new trial shall 'serve upon the adverse party a notice of his intention.' The 'adverse party' upon whom this notice is to be served is determined by the same rules as is the 'adverse party' upon whom a notice of appeal is to be served, viz. every party whose interest in the subject-matter of the motion is adverse to or will be affected by the granting of the motion or changing the former decision of the court; and a failure to serve such adverse party with the notice of an intention to move for the new trial will be attended with the same consequences as a failure to serve an adverse party with a notice of appeal from the judgment. The superior court can have no jurisdiction to re-examine an issue of fact that it has tried, and change its decision thereon, unless all the parties to the issue and former decision are properly before it." The "adverse party" is every party to the action, whether plaintiff or defendant, whose interests may be injuriously affected by a reversal or modification of the judgment or order appealed from.

By the judgment in the present case the lands of each of the several defendants, as well as those of the appellant, were condemned for the use of a tidal canal between the two estuaries, and this judgment has become final as to all the lands condemned, and also as to the amount of damages which each defendant is entitled to receive, except as to the appellant. The effect of a reversal of the order appealed from would be to set aside the judgment against the appellant, but would leave it in force as between the plaintiff and the other defendants. This would result in rendering futile the condemnation of the lands of the other defendants, since, unless the lands of the appellant are also condemned, the public use for which the judgment of condemnation was rendered,—the construction of the tidal canal,—and the defendants' right of passage through the same, could not be made available. The judgment for the condemnation of the strip of land described in the complaint was an entirety, and each defendant is interested in maintaining it as an entirety. A reversal as to a part would impair the rights therein which the other defendants have acquired, since, unless all the lands within this strip can be made available for a tidal canal, the plaintiff would have no right to divest any of the owners of their lands, or the defendants to receive damages therefor. Each of these defendants is therefore an adverse party, who should have been served with the notice of intention to move for a new trial. As they were not before the court at the hearing of this motion, the court had no jurisdiction to grant a new trial, and the motion therefor was properly denied. In Butte Co. v. Boydstun, 68 Cal. 189, 8 Pac. 835, a judgment was given for the condemnation for a public highway of a strip of land belonging to several defendants. Boydstun appealed therefrom, but did not serve his notice of appeal upon his co-defendants. This was held to be fatal to his appeal, since, by a reversal of the judgment, his co-defendants might be injuriously affected, and they were therefore to be considered as adverse parties. The appeal from the judgment is dismissed. The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

DE WITT v. SUPERIOR COURT OF FRESNO COUNTY. (S. F. 556.)

CONTEMPT OF COURT—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

An attorney for defendant, in an action in which judgment is rendered that defendant restore possession of premises, who thereupon notifies the sheriff that he is the owner, and in exclusive possession, of the premises, and that defendant is not in possession, and that he will, by all lawful ways, resist any attempt to take possession from him, is not thereby guilty of contempt, though his notice deters the sheriff from serving the writ.

Department 1. Certiorari by H. G. De Witt to review judgment of the superior court of Fresno county. Judgment annulled.

L. L. Cory, for petitioner. Geo. B. Graham, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is certiorari to review the judgment of the superior court of Fresno county adjudging the petitioner guilty of contempt of court. The affidavit upon which the petitioner was cited was as follows: "[Title, Court, and Cause.] State of California, County of Fresno—ss.: [Affidavit of Graham.] Geo. B. Graham, being duly sworn, deposes and says: That he is now, and at all times since the commencement of the above-entitled action has been, the attorney of the plaintiffs in said action. Affiant now gives this honorable court knowledge and information that said defendant, H. G. De Witt, has committed and is guilty of contempt of this court in the unlawful interference with the process of this court in defying the judgment, process, and officer of this court, and by attempted intimidation of such officer, committed as follows, to wit: On the 18th day of April, 1896, said court rendered its decision in said action, and on the 21st day of April, 1896, in writing, made, signed, and filed its findings and judgment in said action. That, among other things, said court in said action found as follows: 'That on the 23d day of November, 1895, the plaintiff, Sarah I. Foulke (H. A. Foulke, her husband, joining her therein), made a lease, and leased, demised, and let to Stephen Arthur, the said defendant, the premises situate, lying, and being in the county of Fresno, state of California, described as follows, to wit: Lots 15 and 16 in block 21 in the town of Clovis, as the same appears on the map or plat of said town now on file and of record in the office of the county recorder of the said county of Fresno, for the term of one year from the first day of December, 1895, for the total rent or sum of six hundred dollars, payable fifty dollars in advance on the first day of each and every month during said term. That said defendant, Arthur, was let into and took possession of said premises under said lease, and still continues to hold and occupy the same, as tenant thereof, by virtue of said lease.' Also the further finding, to wit: 'That said defendant, Arthur, holds over and continues in possession of said premises after default in the payment of rent, as aforesaid, without plaintiff's permission, and against her will and consent, and after three days' notice in writing to surrender possession of the same.' That thereupon said court ordered and adjudged that the said defendant, Stephen Arthur, restore to plaintiff, Sarah I. Foulke, the possession of said premises within five days from the date thereof, and that a writ of restitution be, and the same was, awarded. That after the rendition of said judgment, and after the making and filing of said findings and judgment, on, to wit, April 22, 1896, said H. G. De Witt served on Jay Scott, sheriff of the said county, whose duty it was to execute any and all writs in said action, a certain written document signed by him, the same being in the words and figures as follows, to wit: 'To Jay Scott, Sheriff of Fresno County: You will please take notice that I, the undersigned, am the owner of, and in the sole and exclusive possession of, all that certain real property, with the improvements thereon, situated in the town of Clovis, in the said county of Fresno, particularly described as follows: Lots 15 and 16 in block 21 in the town of Clovis, according to the map of said town of Clovis on file and of record in the office of the county recorder of said county of Fresno. That Stephen Arthur is not, nor has he been for some time past, in any manner in the occupancy or possession of said property, or any part thereof, and that in the event, in any manner, you attempt to take possession of said property, or any portion thereof, under or in pursuance of any writ in any judgment rendered in the superior court of the county of Fresno, state of California, in an action therein pending by S. I. Foulke and H. A. Foulke against the said Stephen Arthur, that I will resist any such attempt to take possession thereof, and will treat you as a trespasser, and will hold you responsible on your bond for any invasion of my rights, if you attempt to take possession of said property, or any portion thereof, under or in pursuance of such writ, or otherwise. And that I will resist by all lawful ways and means, and by all reasonable force, any attempt on your part to take the possession of said property from me, or any attempt on your part to place the said H. A. Foulke and Sarah I. Foulke, or either of them, in possession of said property, or any part thereof. Dated April 21, 1896. Yours, etc., H. G. De Witt. Due service by a copy of the foregoing notice is hereby admitted this 22nd day of April, 1896. Jay Scott, Sheriff, by L. A. Spencer, Under Sheriff.' That by reason of the false statements and threats contained in said notice, said Jay Scott, sheriff, as aforesaid, has been obstructed, deterred, and intimidated in the execution of said writ of restitution issued upon said judgment in said action by the clerk of said court under his hand and the seal of said court on April 28, 1896, and delivered on the same day to said sheriff to execute, and by reason of said threats said sheriff has not and will not execute the same. Wherefore, affiant prays this honorable court to take cognizance thereof, to the end that said H. G. De Witt may be justly dealt with and adequately punished for said contempt. [Signed] Geo. B. Graham. [Properly subscribed and sworn to.]"

Every court in matters of contempt is a court of special and limited jurisdiction. It has power only to punish those acts which are contempts of its authority, and the question whether the facts alleged amount to a contempt is always jurisdictional.

The facts alleged in the affidavit above quoted do not constitute a contempt of court, and the judgment founded upon it is necessarily void. Said judgment is hereby annulled.

APPEALABLE ORDERS—RECEIVERS—ESTOPPEL.

1. An order substituting parties is not appealable under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 939, 963.

2. An order fixing the compensation of a receiver, and taxing it as costs as against all parties, and directing the receiver to appropriate in payment a fund in his hands as receiver, is appealable, "as a final judgment upon a collateral matter arising out of the action." Grant v. Superior Court, 39 Pac. 604, 106 Cal. 324, followed.

3. A receiver having been appointed by consent of plaintiff creditor and defendant debtor, other creditors intervened, and obtained the appointment of a different receiver. Held, that one who subsequently purchased plaintiff's interest in the action, and was substituted as plaintiff, was not estopped to deny the validity of the latter appointment.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by the California Bank against the Los Angeles & Pacific Railway Company. From an order fixing the compensation of a receiver, and an order refusing to vacate an order substituting L. A. Grant as plaintiff, said Grant appeals. Dismissed as to the order of substitution, and reversed as to the order fixing compensation.

White & Monroe and John S. Chapman, for appellant. A. W. Hutton and Anderson & Anderson, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. The record embraces appeals from two orders of the superior court, —the first, an order fixing the compensation of one Silver as receiver in the action; and the other, an order denying an application of the appellant, Grant, to vacate a former order substituting him as plaintiff in the action in place of the California Bank, the original party plaintiff. Respondents object that the orders are not appealable, and that both appeals should be dismissed, and ask that such disposition be made. As to the order of substitution, this objection is well taken. The statute gives no appeal from such an order, and it is subject to review only on appeal from a final judgment. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 939, 956, 963; Welsh v. Allen, 54 Cal. 211. As to the order fixing the receiver's compensation, while not nominally one from which the statute authorizes a direct appeal, and while it sufficiently appears that it is not a special order made after final judgment, it is, nevertheless, an adjudication from which an appeal will lie. The order not only fixes the compensation of the receiver, but taxes such compensation as costs in the action, as against all the parties, and directs and authorizes the receiver to apply towards its payment the balance of a fund remaining in his hands as such receiver. Such an order, however it may be designated, is, in legal effect, "a final judgment upon a collateral matter arising out of the action," and is "appealable by any party interested in the fund." Grant v. Superior Court, 106 Cal. 324, 39 Pac. 604, and cases there cited. The appellant has such an interest.

Appellant contends that the order appointing the receiver in the action was absolutely void upon its face, for want of jurisdiction in the court to make it; and that the order fixing the compensation of the receiver, being founded thereon, is equally void. That the order appointing the receiver was void is not denied by defendant, and has been so held by this court in two cases in which that particular order was under review (Smith v. Superior Court, 97 Cal. 348, 32 Pac. 322; Smith v. Railroad Co. [Cal.] 34 Pac. 242), where it was held that the action was not one in which a receiver could be competently appointed. Respondents contend, however, that, notwithstanding the absolute nullity of the order appointing the receiver, the appellant is not at liberty to urge that objection, nor to plead the invalidity of the present order; that the receiver was appointed at the request of the California Bank, the original plaintiff in the action, thereby estopping said bank from questioning the regularity of said appointment; and that appellant, having been substituted for said bank as plaintiff, is likewise estopped. But, assuming that the bank would be estopped (which is not to be here determined), we do not think that appellant can be held to rest under any such incapacity. The record discloses that on the commencement of the action, on the application of the then plaintiff, the California Bank, and by the consent of the defendant, the Los Angeles & Pacific Railway Company, one Spillman was appointed receiver. A few days subsequently, certain other creditors of said defendant intervened in the action, and at once interposed objections to the continuance of Spillman as receiver; that thereupon the latter resigned, and the present receiver was appointed at the request of said interveners. Appellant was not then a party to the action, and did not become such until some considerable time thereafter. He had nothing to do with such appointment, and has not, so far as appears, ever done anything looking to an affirmation or ratification of the action of the court in appointing said receiver, other than the mere fact of taking an assignment of the notes sued on by the bank, and thus making himself a party to the action. This of itself is not sufficient to estop or preclude him from making the objection now urged. Smith v. Railroad Co., supra. In that case it appeared that Smith had made himself a party to the present action in the court below, by intervening as a judgment creditor of the defendant, the Los Angeles & Pacific Railway Company, and asking that his claim be allowed and paid, with those of other creditors, from the sale of certain of defendant's property. Subsequently, he moved the superior court to be allowed to issue execution on his judgment against the property in the hands of the receiver, on the ground that the appointment of the receiver was void and of no effect. The application was denied, and Smith appealed. It was objected that making himself a party to the action was a ratification of the appointment of the receiver therein, and estopped him from attacking the order. It was held that his acts did not have such effect, and that he was not thereby estopped. "It is doubtless true," say the court, "that one may so conduct himself as to be estopped from repudiating the action of a receiver, although the order by which the receiver was appointed is void. But in this case mutuality, which is one of the essential elements of estoppel, is wanting. The plaintiff herein could not, by simply intervening in the other case, receive any benefit; and no one, certainly, was prejudiced by his action therein. The receiver was not appointed upon his suggestion. If there be any act tending to validate the order appointing the receiver, such act is the act of the court, and not of this plaintiff; but, as we shall see, the order was void." The same want of mutuality exists here. The appellant did not procure the appointment of the receiver, nor has he reaped any benefit therefrom; while it would seem from the record that his attitude towards said order has been one of hostility from the first.

In purchasing the interest of the bank in the litigation, appellant did not assume the liability of the bank to the receiver, if any such rested upon it, nor can he be presumed to have so intended. The order appointing the receiver being void, the presumption would be that appellant took the assignment of the notes with knowledge and in view of that fact. Indeed, that order had, by the judgment of this court, been declared void more than three months prior to the date when appellant was substituted as a party to the action. That order being void, the present order must, of necessity, be held, as to appellant, likewise void.

It is urged by respondent that the receiver should be paid for his services by some one; but, if so, that obligation should rest upon those who sought and procured his appointment. The appeal from the order of substitution is dismissed. The order fixing the compensation of the receiver is reversed.

PIERCE v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (L. A. 184.)[1]

LIMITATIONS—CARRIERS OF GOODS—NEGLIGENCE—DAMAGES—CONTRACTS—VALIDITY.

1. The burden on a foreign corporation urging the statute of limitations to show the bar (Code Civ. Proc. § 458) is not sustained without proof that it has designated one on whom process against it may be served (St. 1871–72, p. 826), on its doing which the right to avail itself of the statute is made to depend.

2. When from point of shipment to destination there are two customary routes, one through a cold country and one through a warm one, and the latter route becomes obstructed, the carrier is negligent in sending over the cold route, without notice to shipper or consignee, goods which it is bound to know are destructible by frost.

3. A stipulation in a bill of lading releasing the carrier from liability for its negligence is void as against public policy.

4. A stipulation freely entered into, in consideration of a lower freightage, fixing the measure of damages in case of loss at a certain sum, is valid, though loss be caused by the carrier's negligence. Hart v. Railroad Co., 5 Sup. Ct. 151, 112 U. S. 331, approved.

5. Where trees cultivated by the shipper were delivered to the carrier on the agreement that the "actual invoice cost" should be the measure of damages in case of loss, "invoice cost" meant "value."

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by R. W. Pierce against the Southern Pacific Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. B. Hotchkiss, for appellant. Chapman & Hendricks and Curtis, Oster & Curtis, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. Appeal by defendant, the Southern Pacific Company, a corporation, from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for $8,965, interest and costs, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. In February, 1891, the plaintiff, R. W. Pierce, shipped from Apopka, county of Orange, Fla., by the Florida Midland Railway, two car loads of orange trees, consigned to Gulick Bros., Riverside, Cal. The first car load of trees was shipped February 19, 1891, and was received at New Orleans by the Southern Pacific Company February 25, 1891. The other car load was shipped February 24, 1891, and was received by the Southern Pacific Company at New Orleans, March 1, 1891. Each car load was shipped under a bill of lading signed by plaintiff, R. W. Pierce, and by the agent of the Florida Midland Railway. A copy of the bills of lading was given to plaintiff. They were upon printed forms, with blanks, filled in with the names of the consignors, etc., in substance as follows: "Marked and consigned to Gulick Bros., Riverside, California, one car load of orange trees, via Southern Pacific, 20,000 weight, car initialed, N. & L. No. ——," etc. In the printed form it was provided that "the articles and packages" (contents unknown) were in "their nature perishable, fragile, or otherwise susceptible to damage," were shipped at a rate "lower than the regular tariff charges of said railway company and connections," and it was agreed that the shippers should "insure said Florida Midland Railway Company and all lines over which said shipment may pass, between points of shipment and destination, against claims by loss or damage incurred by reason of delay in transportation, or any other cause arising out of responsibility as master over its agents or servants (gross negligence excepted), incident to the shipment, and 'that the actual invoice cost at point of shipment will be taken as measure of damages to govern settlement of any damages for which the carriers may be liable,' and that 'claims for loss, damage, or overcharge arising out of this shipment shall be presented to agents of delivery lines within one week after arrival of the property at its destination.'" The rate of freightage on the trees was $1.97¾ per 100 pounds. The Southern Pacific had a direct through line of railroad, owned or operated by it, and by others in connection with it, from New Orleans, across Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona, via El Paso and Yuma, to Colton, Cal. When the freight reached New Orleans this line was broken by severe storms and washouts in Arizona, and was not likely to be available for the transportation of freight for some time. Under these circumstances, by order of its general agent, the trees in question were sent north through Texas to Denver, Colo., thence to Ogden, Utah, thence over its Central Pacific road, etc., to Colton, Cal., where the cars were delivered to the Southern California Railway, and by it hauled to Riverside, a distance of some six or eight miles, arriving at the latter point March 12 and March 16, respectively, 1891. While in transit by the northern route, the trees were entirely destroyed by freezing.

[1] Rehearing granted.

Plaintiff avers in his complaint, among other things, in substance: (1) That there was no invoice of the cost of the trees; that they had been grown by him in Florida, and were shipped to California for sale. (2) That they were delivered to defendant at New Orleans, to be shipped to Riverside by its direct and usual route. (3) That the defendant violated the contract by shipping through a northern climate, where, at that season of the year, intensely cold weather was common, and hence that defendant was guilty of gross negligence, etc., whereby the trees were frozen and destroyed. These allegations are substantially denied by the answer. Defendant also set up the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure (two years) in bar of the action.

1. The contention of appellant is that the evidence showed without contradiction that more than two years elapsed between the negligence complained of and the bringing of the suit, and hence that the finding of the court against defendant's plea of the statute is contrary to the evidence. We think this contention cannot be maintained. Under our Code of Civil Procedure (section 458) the statute of limitations is sufficiently pleaded by alleging the bar and referring to the section and subdivision thereof (if so divided) relied upon. But the section continues: "If such allegation be controverted, the party pleading must establish, on the trial, the facts showing that the cause of action is so barred." The allegations of the answer are to be deemed controverted. Code Civ. Proc. § 462. It therefore devolved upon the defendant to establish the facts necessary to support the plea. The complaint avers, and the answer admits, that defendant "is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Kentucky, and engaged in the business of operating a railroad as a common carrier of freight and passengers in the state of California and elsewhere, and was so engaged in the said business during all the time hereinafter mentioned." A statute of this state approved April 1, 1872, entitled "An act in relation to foreign corporations" (St. 1871–72, p. 826), requires all corporations created by the laws of any other state to designate some person residing in the county in which its principal place of business in this state is, upon whom process issued by authority of or under any law of this state may be served, and must file such designation in the office of the secretary of state, and a copy of such designation, duly certified, shall be evidence of such appointment. The second section of the act provides that a failure to comply with such requirement shall preclude such corporation from "the benefit of the statutes of this state limiting the time for the commencement of civil actions." Section 3 of the act confers the right of corporations organized under the laws of other states which have complied with the foregoing requirement to avail themselves of the benefits of our statutes of limitation. It being admitted that defendant was a corporation organized under the laws of another state, compliance with the foregoing statute became a necessary fact to be proven as a predicate to its right to avail itself of the benefit of the statute of limitation. This it failed to do, and hence the court did not err in its finding against its defense of the statute of limitations. We may observe that the general rule is that foreign corporations, although having agents and transacting business in a state, come within the provisions of statutes limiting the time for the commencement of actions and making a saving as against absent debtors. It is only by comity that they are permitted to transact business in another state than that of their creation. They are citizens, so to speak, of the state of their creation, and are, in contemplation of law, absent from all other states than the one of their situs. Wood, Lim. p. 599. The statute, then, is not a limitation upon the right of foreign corporations to avail themselves of our statutes of limitations, but it confers that right, subject only to the condition prescribed.

2. Appellant contends that its general demurrer to the complaint upon the ground "that said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against this defendant" should have been sustained. The complaint, as we think, in giving, as it does, a history of the whole transaction, including the contract made with the Florida Midland Company to ship the orange trees to Riverside, Cal., via the Southern Pacific Company; the transportation of the trees to New Orleans, and delivery to defendant under the contract; its failure to forward them by its usual route, with a statement of the route by which defendant shipped the goods; the objections to such route, and the result of the deviation, etc.,—sets out a cause of action, either sufficient to hold defendant as for a breach of the contract, or, failing in that, under its common-law liability as a common carrier. It may well be that a demurrer to the complaint upon the ground of ambiguity or uncertainty would have been good; but no such objection was presented.

3. The contention of defendant that it cannot be held liable for the reasons (a) that the bill of lading described the packages as "contents unknown"; (b) that it was not furnished with the bill of lading, or with an opportunity to inspect the property, so as to inform itself of the character thereof, or its liability to injury,—cannot be maintained. It is true, the printed portion of the bills of lading uses the following expression: "The following articles and packages (contents unknown), marked and consigned as below, to wit [then follows the description in each bill of lading in writing, which is in part as follows]: 1 car orange trees." Again, the evidence shows without contradiction that the cars were marked on the outside with the names and residence of the consignees, and "orange trees," marked in big plain letters. In addition to this, the cars had open ventilators at each end, affording an opportunity to see and examine the contents. Defendant must, therefore, be held to have known the contents of the cars, or, at least, to have had the means of knowledge at hand. "It is the duty of the carrier to transport the goods by the usual direct route, and for any loss which a departure from such route may occasion to them he is liable." Hutch. Carr. § 312. It is said, however, that where there are two or more customary routes, and the carrier is left free to choose between them, he may take his choice without incurring increased liability, if there are no special reasons which make the route chosen unsafe. Express Co. v. Kountze, 8 Wall. 342; Maghee v. Transportation Co., 45 N. Y. 514. Judging from the testimony, it can hardly be said that the route by which defendant shipped the goods in this case was one of its customary routes. With a through route of its own through Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona, it sent the goods many hundred miles to the north, over roads operated by other companies, to meet its Central Pacific road at Ogden, in the state of Utah. Conceding, however, that the route was a usual one, there were special reasons for not sending goods which were liable to destruction by frost over this northern route in winter, where defendant might reasonably have expected the result which followed. When, therefore, defendant's through route via Ft. Yuma was obstructed by stress of weather, it became its duty to hold the goods until that or some other safe avenue was opened, or to notify the consignees or consignor, and take their directions in the premises. The evidence shows that they did this with another car of like orange trees at a date a little earlier, and by direction of the consignees shipped them safely through by the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad. Where goods are marked in such a way as to indicate their character, or as to give notice to the carrier that their safety requires that they must be carried in a particular manner, such marks must not be disregarded. Hutch. Carr. § 310. In view of all the surrounding circumstances, we are of opinion that the defendant, by a failure to adopt one or the other of the foregoing courses, erred in judgment, and became liable to plaintiff for the results which followed. The evidence fails to establish a case of gross or wanton negligence; but still does, we think, show a want of that extraordinary care imposed upon common carriers of goods.

4. A carrier is not relieved from responsibility under a contract that he shall not be responsible if he has been guilty of negligence. Railroad Co. v. Pratt, 22 Wall. 123. It is contrary to public policy to permit the carrier to stipulate for exemption from the effects of the negligence of himself or his servants. Hutch. Carr. § 260, and cases there cited; Railroad Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357; Liverpool & G. W. Steam. Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co., 129 U. S. 397, 9 Sup. Ct. 469.

5. As to the measure of damages. The court below awarded damages up to the full value of the goods at the point of destination, although the uncontradicted evidence tended to show that the value at the shipping point was about one-half of that given. It will be observed that the contract between the plaintiff and the Florida Midland Railway was for a through shipment of the goods to Riverside. We repeat that portion essential to the matter in hand: "Whereas, said railway company has agreed that the cost of transportation * * * shall not exceed * * * $1.97¾ per 100 lbs., said rates being lower than the regular tariff charges of said railway company and connections: Now, therefore, said shippers, for themselves and consignees, do hereby insure said Florida Midland Railway Company and all lines over which said shipments may pass between points of shipment and destination. * * * It is further agreed that the actual invoice cost at point of shipment will be taken as measure of damages to govern settlement of any damages for which the carriers may be liable." There is a wide distinction between a contract for exemption from liability in case of negligence which is usually held in derogation of public policy because tending to encourage negligence, and a contract fairly made, whereby, in consideration of a lower freightage, the parties agree upon a fixed or determinate value to be placed upon the article to be shipped in case of its loss. Hutchinson, at section 250, after discussing the question of total exemption in case of negligence, adds: "To be distinguished from these cases, however,—though the distinction is not always observed,—are those cases, obviously different, in which, for the purpose of determining the shipper's liability for freight and the carrier's responsibility for damages, the value of the property is agreed upon. When such is the case, the supreme court of the United States and many of the state courts hold, to use the language of Mr. Justice Blatchford in Hart v. Railroad Co., 112 U. S. 331, 5 Sup. Ct. 151: 'That where a contract of the kind, signed by the shipper, is fairly made, agreeing on the valuation of the property carried, with the rate of freight based on the condition that the carrier assumes liability only to the extent of the agreed valuation, even in case of loss or damage by the negligence of the carrier, the contract will be upheld as a proper and lawful mode of securing a due proportion between the amount for which the carrier may be responsible and the freight he receives, and of protecting himself against extravagant and fanciful valuation.'" In the same case the learned justice further said: "The limitation as to value has no tendency to exempt from liability for negligence. It does not induce want of care. It exacts from the carrier the measure of care due to the value agreed on. The carrier is bound to respond in that value for negligence. The compensation for carriage is based on that value. The shipper is estopped from saying that the value is greater. The articles have no greater value for the purpose of the contract of transportation between the parties to that contract. * * * There is no violation of public policy. On the contrary, it would be unjust and unreasonable, and would be repugnant to the soundest principles of fair dealing and of the freedom of contracting, and thus in conflict with public policy, if a shipper should be allowed to reap the benefit of the contract if there is no loss, and to repudiate it in case of loss." We understand full well that there are many cases holding a contrary doctrine to that enunciated in Hart v. Railroad Co., supra, but we think that case, which is cited as a leading one, is founded upon reason and justice, and that the trend of judicial opinion is to the doctrine there enunciated. See cases cited in Hart v. Railroad Co., 112 U. S., at page 342, 5 Sup. Ct. 156. Respondent objects, and urges that, as the trees in question were cultivated by the plaintiff, there was not and could not be any "invoice price." The evident answer is that by the term "invoice price" was meant the cost or value of the property at the shipping point. That it had a fixed value at that point was attested by the evidence. One of the definitions of an invoice is: "A writing made on behalf of an importer, specifying the merchandise imported, and its cost or value." Black, Law Dict. Plaintiff sued upon his special contract, and averred that defendant received the goods thereunder. Defendant averred in its answer "that it duly performed its duty under the contract set out in the complaint." We think the demand for damages from defendant was in due time, and sufficiently specific, in the absence of any demand by defendant of an invoice, to comply with the contract. We think the court erred in overruling the objection of defendant to proof of the market value of the trees at Riverside, instead of confining the inquiry to the cost or value of the trees at the point of shipment in Florida, as per contract, which, with the freight paid, was the true measure of damages. For this error we recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

WILLIAMS et al. v. BERGIN. (S. F. 487.)

STREET ASSESSMENT—SUPERVISORS—JURISDICTION—LIMITATIONS—DEMURRER—PRELIMINARY ACT—PERFORMANCE BY PLAINTIFF—REASONABLE TIME.

1. An order "that granite curbs be laid on F. street, between M. and T. streets, where not already laid, and that the roadway thereof be paved with basalt blocks, where not already so paved," sufficiently describes the work, since nothing is left to the discretion of the superintendent of streets.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 458, providing that, if the plea of limitations is controverted, the party relying on it "must establish, on the trial, the facts showing that the cause of action is so barred," does not apply to a demurrer to a complaint on the ground that the facts alleged therein show that the cause of action is barred.

3. A demurrer to a complaint on the ground of limitations can be sustained only where it affirmatively appears from the complaint that plaintiff's cause of action is barred.

4. Where a statute in reference to municipal public improvements does not prescribe any particular time after the acceptance of the work within which the superintendent of streets shall issue the assessment and warrant therefor, the mere lapse of time for more than the period fixed as the duration of the lien is not a bar to their issuance.

5. When plaintiff's right of action depends upon some preliminary act which he has to perform, and the time within which such act must be performed is indefinite, a reasonable time will be allowed therefor, after which limitations will begin to run.

6. What is a reasonable time will depend upon the circumstances in each case.

7. Where a right of action depends upon an official act to be performed by a public officer, there is no presumption that any delay in the performance was unreasonable.

8. In an action, commenced February 26, 1896, on a street assessment, where the complaint shows that the work was completed May 1, 1892, and that the superintendent made and issued the assessment October 21, 1895, and the averments are as consistent with holding that the delay in issuing the assessment was owing to the superintendent as to plaintiff, the complaint is not demurrable on the ground that it is barred by limitations.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by one Williams and others against one Bergin. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

J. C. Bates, for appellants. Thos. I. Bergin, in pro. per.

HARRISON, J. Action upon a street assessment. The board of supervisors of San Francisco ordered "that granite curbs be laid on Francisco street between Mason and Taylor streets, where not already laid, and that the roadway thereof be paved with basalt blocks, where not already so paved"; and a contract therefor, awarded to the plaintiffs, was on March 1, 1892, entered into between them and the superintendent of streets. The time fixed for the completion of the contract was 60 days from its date. It is alleged in the complaint that the work was completed according to the terms of the contract within this time, and was accepted by the superintendent, "who thereupon, on the 21st day of October, 1895, made and issued an assessment therefor," and on the same day issued a warrant for its collection. The present action was commenced February 26, 1896. The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the grounds that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that it appears upon its face that the supposed cause of action alleged therein is barred by the statute of limitations. The demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiffs have appealed.

1. The description of the work was sufficient to give to the board jurisdiction to order the improvement. Whether granite curbs had been laid on any part of the street, or any part of the roadway had been paved with basalt blocks, as well as the extent thereof, was capable of exact ascertainment, and did not depend on the arbitrament or discretion of the superintendent of streets. If the assessment should include any expense for paving or for curbs that were laid at the date of the order, it should be corrected on an appeal therefrom. Assessments in which the work has been similarly described have been frequently sustained. McDonald v. Conniff, 99 Cal. 386, 34 Pac. 71; Perine v. Erzgraber, 102 Cal. 234, 36 Pac. 585.

2. The demurrer sufficiently presented the defense of the statute of limitations. Brennan v. Ford, 46 Cal. 7. The provisions of section 458, Code Civ. Proc., have reference to cases in which the statute is pleaded in the answer as an affirmative defense. It is in an answer, and not in a demurrer, that "facts showing the defense" would be proper, and the provision that "the party pleading must establish on the trial the facts showing that the cause of action is so barred" clearly indicates that the section has no reference to a demurrer to a complaint upon the ground that the facts alleged therein show that the cause of action is barred. In such a case it is sufficient to specify the statute as one of the grounds of the demurrer. A demurrer upon this ground can be sustained, however, only when it affirmatively appears from the complaint that the plaintiff's cause of action is barred. The defendant cannot, in support of the demurrer, invoke other facts which might be introduced in his defense.

3. The grounds urged by the defendant in support of the demurrer are that, inasmuch as the statute provides that the superintendent shall make the assessment and issue the warrant thereon "after the contractor has fulfilled his contract" to his satisfaction, a delay in making the same of more than three years after his acceptance of the work is unauthorized, and the assessment and warrant issued by him are incapable of enforcement. As the statute does not prescribe any particular time after the acceptance of the work within which the superintendent shall issue the assessment and warrant, the mere lapse of time for more than the period fixed as the duration of the lien is not of itself a bar to their issuance, since the issuance may have been delayed by circumstances sufficient to justify the delay. Whether they were sufficient therefor was to be considered by the officer before making the assessment, and, as he is presumed to have regularly performed his official duty, his act in making the assessment is entitled, prima facie, to be considered valid, if there could have been any circumstances under which an assessment would, after such lapse of time, have been authorized. If there are any facts or reasons why the lapse of time was such as to deprive him of the right to make the assessment, they should be presented as affirmative matter in defense thereto.

4. It is further contended by the defendant that, inasmuch as the plaintiffs were entitled to demand the assessment and warrant from the superintendent immediately upon his acceptance of the work, they could not, by their delay in making such demand, suspend the running of the statute in favor of the property owner. The rule is well settled that when the plaintiff's right of action depends upon some act which he has to perform preliminarily to commencing suit, and he is under no restraint or disability in the performance of such act, he cannot suspend indefinitely the running of the statute of limitations by a delay in performing such preliminary act, and that, if the time within which such act is to be performed is indefinite or not specified, a reasonable time will be allowed therefor, and the statute will begin to run after the lapse of such reasonable time. What is a reasonable time will depend upon the circumstances of each case. A party cannot by his own negligence, or for his own convenience, stop the running of the statute. Palmer v. Palmer, 36 Mich. 487; Railroad Co. v. Burlingame, 36 Kan. 628, 14 Pac. 271; Ball v. Railroad Co., 62 Iowa, 751, 16 N. W. 592; High v. Commissioners, 92 Ind. 580; Bills v. Mining Co., 106 Cal. 21, 39 Pac. 43; Thomas v. Beach Co. (Cal.) 46 Pac. 899. The rule rests upon the principle that the plaintiff has it in his power at all times to do the act which fixes his right of action. The reason of the rule, however, ceases when the right of action is not under his control, but depends upon the act of another; and when the act upon which his right to maintain an action depends is an official act, to be performed by a public officer in the line of his official duty, there is no presumption that any delay in its performance was unreasonable. In the present case the plaintiff had no right of action until after the issuance and return of the warrant, and there is nothing in the complaint from which it can be inferred that there was an unreasonable delay in the issuance of these documents. If it had appeared therein that the plaintiffs had neglected to make a demand therefor for an unreasonable time, or greater than the period during which the assessment would have been a lien upon the property, there might have been ground for holding them barred from enforcing the assessment; but, since the averments in the complaint are quite as consistent with holding that the delay in issuing the assessment was owing to the superintendent as to the plaintiffs, it must be held that it does not appear therefrom that the plaintiffs' cause of action is barred by the statute. If in fact the delay resulted from such neglect or other conduct of the plaintiffs as should deprive them of the right to enforce the assessment, such defense can be fully set forth in the answer. The judgment is reversed.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — DUE PROCESS OF LAW — PROSTITUTION — INSTRUCTIONS — IMPEACHING WITNESS—SUFFICIENCY OF FOUNDATION.

1. Act March 31, 1891 (St. 1891, p. 285), providing that a husband who "connives at, consents to, or permits" the placing or leaving of his wife in a house of prostitution, shall be convicted for felony, does not deprive him of his liberty without due process of law, on the ground that it makes criminal a mere operation of the mind.

2. In a prosecution under Act March 31, 1891 (St. 1891, p. 285), making it a felony for a husband to place or leave, or to consent to the placing or leaving of, his wife in a house of prostitution, an instruction that defendant's consent could be shown by some "omission," as well as by his act or declaration, is correct.

3. Asking a witness whether he remembers "telling A., at one time, in a conversation on L street, in this city, about three months ago,—within the last five months,—that," etc., sufficiently identifies time, place, and person, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 2052, to lay a foundation for impeaching the witness.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. C. Hinkson, Judge.

Eugene Bosquet was convicted of a felony, and appeals. Affirmed.

E. C. Hart and C. T. Jones, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., C. N. Post, Dep. Atty. Gen., and Frank D. Ryan, Dist. Atty., for the People.

SEARLS, C. Defendant was informed against in the county of Sacramento, under a statute approved March 31, 1891, entitled "An act to prevent the placing or keeping or leaving of married women in houses of prostitution, and to punish persons therefor." St. 1891, p. 285. He pleaded not guilty, and, upon a trial, was convicted. He thereupon moved in arrest of judgment, and also for a new trial, both of which motions were denied, and defendant was sentenced to five years' imprisonment in the state prison. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from the orders above specified.

The statute above referred to, and upon which the prosecution is based, reads as follows:

"Section 1. Any man who by force, fraud, intimidation, threats, persuasion, promises or any other means, places or leaves, or procures any other person or persons to place or leave, his wife in a house of prostitution, or connives at, consents to or permits the placing or leaving of his wife in a house of prostitution, or allows or permits his wife to remain therein, shall be guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be imprisoned in the state prison for not less than three years nor more than ten years.

"Sec. 2. In all prosecutions under this act the wife shall be a competent witness against the husband."

The first point made by appellant for reversal is that that portion of the statute of March 31, 1891, which permits a conviction of a husband for felony "for conniving at, permitting, or consenting to the placing or leaving of his wife in a house of prostitution," is in violation of section 13 of article 1 of the constitution, "in that it deprives a man of his liberty without due process of law; it makes criminal a mere conviction, act, or operation of the mind." Section 20 of our Penal Code only enunciated a familiar principle of law when it declared that "in every crime or public offense there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent, or criminal negligence." The "connivance," "consent," "permission," of the husband, spoken of in the statute, are used to characterize the substantive act of the wife in being, remaining, or living in a house of prostitution. The fact of the wife being in a place of that character is the central and essential fact or predicate, just as, in murder, the death of the person charged to have been murdered is an essential fact. This being admitted or proven, the consent, permission, or connivance of the defendant is to be proven by such declarations, acts, or omissions as outwardly manifest the intention. We fail to appreciate the force of appellant's objection, or to see any violation of the constitutional provision referred to, in the information against, trial and conviction of, the defendant.

It is next urged that the court erred in adding the words inclosed in parentheses to the following instruction asked by defendant, and given with such addition by the court: "Even though the testimony should show that the defendant was married to Lucy Bosquet, his wife, and that she is a prostitute and lived in a house of prostitution, that is not enough of itself to warrant his conviction on this charge, but you must be satisfied by the evidence, beyond all reasonable doubt, that he allowed or permitted her to be placed in or to remain in a house of prostitution by some act or declaration (or omission) of his; that is, that she was in a house of prostitution by his consent." The pith of the instruction is contained in the last sentence, viz.: "That is, that she was in a house of prostitution by his consent." Now, consent may be evinced in a variety of ways. A failure to object to a transaction, with a full knowledge of all the facts and circumstances, and where it becomes the duty of one to dissent, although an omission, is evidence from which consent may properly be inferred. There was ample evidence in the case to give point to the instruction as modified, and hence we think it was proper. The instructions on the part of the defendant are too lengthy to be repeated here. They were full, explicit, and quite as favorable to the defendant as the facts warranted.

It is further urged by appellant that "the trial court erred in permitting the prosecution to impeach the testimony of Lucy Bosquet, under an insufficient foundation." Lucy Bosquet was the wife of the defendant, and was a witness in his behalf. She testified that she lived in a house of prostitution at 229½ L street, Sacramento, which she rented, and in which she plied her vocation as a prostitute; that she had followed that business prior to her marriage to the defendant; that she had promised to reform, but preferred to follow her former calling; that her husband always objected to her doing so,—never in any way consented thereto; that he expostulated with her as to her meretricious conduct; and much more to the same effect. Upon cross-examination, counsel for the prosecution put to her the following question: "You remember of telling her [Amelie De Longe, of whom she had spoken], at one time, in a conversation on L street, in this city [Sacramento], about three months ago,—within the last five months,—that Eugene was very good to you; that he wanted you to live in the crib six or seven months more, or six or seven months longer, in order that you could earn money enough for he and you to go to Paris?" To this question she answered, "No; I never said that to anybody." In rebuttal, Amelie De Longe was called, and, in answer to the question put to Lucy Bosquet, answered that the latter did so state to her (the said Amelie) at the time and place mentioned. Was the foundation sufficient? Section 2052 of our Code of Civil Procedure enunciates the rule as it previously existed in this state and most of the states of the Union. It is in part as follows: "A witness may also be impeached by evidence that he has made, at other times, statements inconsistent with his present testimony; but before this can be done the statements must be related to him, with the circumstances of times, places, and persons present, and he must be asked whether he made such statements, and, if so, allowed to explain them." The time and place of the conversation, and the person with whom had, should be specified with sufficient definiteness to enable the witness clearly to identify it. The identification of the occasion and the person to whom the statement is made are of prime importance in directing the attention of the witness to the subject-matter. Oil Co. v. Van Etten, 107 U. S. 325, 1 Sup. Ct. 178; Koehler v. Buhl, 94 Mich. 406, 54 N. W. 157; People v. Devine, 44 Cal. 452; Birch v. Hale, 99 Cal. 299, 33 Pac. 1088. In People v. Turner, 65 Cal. 540, 4 Pac. 553, the question was: "Did you not state, in the month of September, in the presence of William Knowles and James Robinson, on the way between town here and the race track, that you would go into court?" etc.; and it was held that the question was sufficiently definite to lay the foundation for an impeachment of the witness. If the circumstances stated in the question are such as to describe the occasion with reasonable certainty, a variance as to the time has been held unnecessary. Jones, Ev. § 849. In Nelson v. Iverson, 24 Ala. 9, where the time was designated as in the spring of a given year, when it was in fact February, it was held sufficient. In Lawler v. McPheeters, 73 Ind. 577, it was held that, where the impeaching witness could not recollect the date, it was sufficient that he was about to speak of the declaration or conversation to which the attention of the principal witness had been called. In the present case the question put to the principal witness was accurate and explicit as to the statement made, the person to whom made, the place where made, and, we think, sufficiently explicit as to time, to entitle the prosecution to contradict the statement by the witness. The evidence was conflicting. Both defendant and his wife, while admitting that the latter lived in a house of prostitution, denied that it was by the procurement or consent of the former. On the other hand, there was sufficient testimony on the part of the prosecution, if credited by the jury, as it must have been, to warrant the verdict as rendered. Finding no reversible error in the record, we recommend that the judgment and orders appealed from be affirmed.

I concur: BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. SPENCER v. KNIGHT.

ATTORNEY FOR STATE BOARD OF HEALTH — APPOINTMENT.

St. 1891, p. 209, § 1, provides that the attorney for the state board of health shall be appointed by the governor, and hold his office for four years, and until his successor is "elected" and qualified. Held, that the person appointed to fill it during the first term was not entitled to hold it until his successor was "elected," a successor being appointed and having qualified.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Quo warranto by the people of the state of California, on the relation of Dennis Spencer, against George A. Knight. From a judgment in favor of relator, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Denson & De Haven, for appellant. W. W. Foote and Garret McEnerney, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The appellant was appointed attorney for the state board of health, by virtue of the provisions of an act authorizing such appointment (St. 1891, p. 209), June 13, 1891. July 11, 1895, the governor appointed the relator to succeed the appellant in the said office, and a commission therefor was duly issued to him. After qualifying for the office, the relator presented to the appellant his commission, and notified him that he had filed his oath of office, and demanded to be let into the possession and enjoyment of said office; but the appellant refused, and has ever since refused, to let the relator into the possession of said office, or to permit him to hold and exercise the same. The present action was brought under the provisions of section 803, Code Civ. Proc., for the purpose of having the appellant excluded from said office, and establishing the right of the relator thereto. Judgment was entered in favor of the relator, from which the present appeal has been taken.

Section 1 of the act above named is as follows: "Section 1. The office of attorney for the state board of health, and the board of health of the city and county of San Francisco, is hereby created; such attorney shall be appointed by the governor, and shall hold his office as such attorney for the term of four years, and until his successor is elected and qualified." The proposition contended for by the appellant, and upon which he claims the right to retain the office, is that, by reason of the last clause in the foregoing section, his successor is to be elected by the people, and that, until such election has been had, there is no vacancy in the office, and, by virtue of section 879 of the Political Code, he is entitled to retain possession of the office. This construction of the section fails, however, to give effect to the provisions therein, which are declared with definiteness, and attributes a controlling effect to a provision which is merely subsidiary and incidental to the purpose of the act. There is no provision in the section, or elsewhere upon the statute book, that this office shall be filled by an election. On the contrary, the office is created by the act, and the provision that "such attorney shall be appointed by the governor" is an express legislative declaration of the mode in which the office shall be filled. The appointment of the officer is not limited to the first appointment, but includes every "such attorney." By the succeeding clause his term of office is fixed at four years, and at the expiration of that term the right of the governor to appoint the successor of the first incumbent was the same as for the original appointment. The additional words "until his successor is elected and qualified" cannot have the effect to overcome the previous declaration that the officer is to be "appointed," or justify an inference that the legislature intended that the office should be elective. That the provision in the act that "such attorney shall be appointed by the governor" was intended by the legislature to apply to future incumbents of the office is corroborated by the fact that no provision has been made for an election of the officer, or declaring the constituency by which he should be elected. The judgment is affirmed.

MORTGAGES—COUNSEL FEES—DEFICIENCY.

1. A provision in a mortgage that counsel fees shall be part of the costs of foreclosure, and that the decree shall retain them, authorizes the court to include them in the decree as part of the obligation secured by the mortgage.

2. The court need not of its own motion direct that, if the proceeds of the foreclosure sale are insufficient to pay the judgment against the mortgagor, the deficiency shall be docketed against not only the mortgagor, but also against his grantee, who assumed the mortgage.

3. The grantee of a mortgagor having assumed the mortgage, and having defaulted, and a deficiency judgment having been entered against the mortgagor, the mortgagor was not entitled, until he had paid such judgment, to a judgment against the grantee for the deficiency.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Action by one O'Neal against one Hart and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

T. W. Nowlin and A. A. Moore, for appellants. J. K. Peirsol and C. T. Johns, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. 1. The mortgage which is foreclosed herein was given to secure the payment of a promissory note of the defendant Hart, and contained a clause which provided that in a suit for its foreclosure "a decree may be had to sell the said premises in the manner prescribed by law, and out of the money arising from such sale to retain the principal and interest, together with the costs and charges of making such sale, and of suit for foreclosure, including counsel fees, at the rate of five per cent. upon the amount which may be found due for principal and interest by the said decree." This express provision that counsel fees are to be regarded as a part of the costs of a suit for foreclosure, and that, if such suit be brought, there shall be entered therein a decree to retain said counsel fees, created an obligation for their payment upon the mortgagor of the same nature as his obligation to discharge other costs of foreclosure, and authorized the court to include them in its decree as a part of the obligation secured by the mortgage.

2. The court did not err in refusing to direct that, if the proceeds of the sale are insufficient to pay the amount of the judgment against Hart, the deficiency should be docketed against the defendant Burdick as well as Hart. Hart had conveyed the mortgaged premises to Burdick after the execution of his mortgage to the plaintiff, and his grantee had assumed the mortgage and agreed to pay the same. This would have authorized the court, at the request of the plaintiff, to enter a judgment that any deficiency be docketed against both Burdick and Hart; but, as the plaintiff declined to make such request, the court was not required to include it in the decree. Hart, by virtue of the provisions of his mortgage from Burdick, was entitled to a judgment against Burdick, not only for the amount of Burdick's note, but also for such an amount as he might pay in satisfaction of his mortgage to the plaintiff. He could not, however, claim any judgment therefor until after he had made such payment, and the decree provides that, for whatever deficiency he shall pay upon the judgment in favor of the plaintiff, judgment therefor shall be docketed in his favor against Burdick. The judgment is affirmed.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE OF SHEEP.

A mortgage of sheep does not extend the lien thereof to wool thereafter growing on them, or lambs in gestation at its date.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Towner, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of Santa Ana against Erreca and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant Bruschi and others appeal. Modified.

Gibson & Titus, J. C. Hizard, and J. W. Ballard, for appellants. Victor Montgomery, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff brought this action for the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage upon 2,330 sheep, that had been executed to its assignors January 18, 1894, by the defendants Erreca and Barrandeguy. In April, 1895, the mortgagors had sold to the defendant Bruschi 14,000 pounds of wool that had been grown upon the sheep described in the mortgage, after its execution, and sheared therefrom by the mortgagors; and in May, 1895, they sold to the defendant Cassou 815 lambs that had been born from the mortgaged sheep subsequent to its execution. The court held that the wool and the lambs thus sold were covered by the mortgage, and rendered judgment directing their sale. From this judgment, Bruschi and Cassou have appealed.

In Shoobert v. De Motta, 112 Cal. 215, 44 Pac. 487, it was held that in this state the lien of a chattel mortgage upon domestic animals does not cover the increase of the animals, unless expressly mentioned therein. The provision in section 2955, Civ. Code, authorizing the execution of a chattel mortgage upon "sheep, and the increase thereof," does not extend the lien of a mortgage upon "sheep" to the "increase" of the sheep, but implies that, unless the increase is covered by the terms of the mortgage, it is not included therein. In that case it was also said: "If the mortgagor retains the possession of the mortgaged property, he is at liberty to deal with and use it as its owner, and whatever income or profit may be derived from such use belongs to him, and not to the mortgagee." In Simpson v. Ferguson, 112 Cal. 180, 40 Pac. 104, and 44 Pac. 484, it had been held that the mortgagor of real property was entitled to whatever crops might grow upon the mortgaged property prior to a foreclosure, and it was also said in Shoobert v. De Motta: "If, in the case of sheep, the use to which the mortgagor puts the ewes is for breeding lambs, there can be no sufficient reason given why the lambs that are dropped by the ewes should belong to the mortgagee, any more than the wool which is sheared from their backs." The present case presents a question which was not involved or decided in that case,—i. e. whether the lien of the mortgage includes lambs in gestation at its date; but, upon the principles of that case, it must be held that they are not so included. As the lien of the mortgage extends only to the property described therein, and as the mortgagor remains the owner of the property mortgaged, he has an unrestricted right to sell or dispose of its fruit or increase. His right to dispose of lambs in gestation at the date of the mortgage is the same as his right to dispose of oranges which were on the trees, or wheat which was in the ground or standing in the field when the mortgage was made.

It is but just to counsel and to the court below to say that the decision in Shoobert v. De Motta had not been rendered when the present case was tried, or the appeal therefrom taken to this court. The superior court erred in holding that the wool sheared from the sheep and their increase was covered by the mortgage, and subject to its lien, and it is directed to modify its judgment in accordance with this opinion.

SERVICE OF PROCESS—NOTICE OF MOTION.

1. Service by publication on nonresidents whose address is known is not complete until copies of the summons and complaint are mailed to them, as required by the order for publication.

2. A defendant mortgagor need not be served with notice of motion to set aside a default judgment in foreclosure proceedings against her and her co-defendant, a prior mortgagee, under which judgment the property was sold to plaintiff.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by Henrietta Schart against Freda Schart and Louis J. Bock to foreclose a mortgage. From an order setting aside a judgment by default against defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Donnell & Howland, for appellant. H. O. Collins, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This is an appeal from an order of the court below setting aside a judgment by default, rendered against the defendants, on the ground that the summons was served by publication, and that no copy thereof was served upon the defendants by mail or otherwise, although the defendants were nonresidents of the state, and their residence, as shown by the affidavit for publication, was known, and although the order for publication required copies of the summons to be forwarded to said defendants by mail. The motion to set aside the default was made within one year after the entry of default and judgment, as provided by section 473, Code Civ. Proc. The moving affidavits show that defendant Bock is the holder and owner of a prior mortgage upon the property covered by plaintiff's mortgage, which was foreclosed in the action. The substituted service was not complete unless a copy of the summons and complaint were deposited in the post office, directed to the defendant, as required by the order of the judge. It became, therefore, not only the right, but the duty, of the court, to set aside the default and judgment inadvertently entered.

Appellant objects that the notice of motion by defendant Bock should have been served upon his co-defendant, Freda Schart. Bock is not seeking any relief against his co-defendant here, but only against the plaintiff. If he shall file a cross complaint, it will be time enough to serve her therewith. Where the direct legal effect of an order determines the right of a party, he must have notice of the application therefor. This is illustrated in a case where a motion is made to set aside a judgment under which property has been sold, and purchased by a third party, where it has been held that such third party must have notice. In the present instance the property was sold, and bought in by plaintiff, who had notice; and the direct legal effect of the order appealed from does not in any way operate for or against the defendant Freda Schart. We recommend that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

WIGMORE et al. v. BUELL. (L. A. 175.)

SET-OFF.

Damages for trespass committed by plaintiff in ejectment on land of defendant contiguous to the premises in suit neither arise out of "the transaction set forth in the complaint" nor "upon contract," within Code Civ. Proc. § 438, and hence cannot be set off.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. B. Cope, Judge.

Ejectment by John Wigmore and another against R. T. Buell. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thos. McNulta and Grant Jackson, for appellant. Boyce, Taggart & Kellogg, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This is an action of ejectment to recover possession of a tract of land situate and being in the county of Santa Barbara, damages for the detention thereof, and for the value of the rents and profits. Plaintiffs had judgment for possession of the land and $400 damages. Defendant appeals from the judgment. The only error assigned is based upon the refusal of the court, pending the trial, to permit defendant to file an amendment to his answer. The complaint is in the ordinary form in ejectment, and the answer consisted in denials of the allegations of the said complaint. At the trial, and after plaintiffs had rested their case, defendant sought to prove that plaintiffs' cattle had ranged and pastured upon his (the said defendant's) land. Upon an objection being sustained to this and similar evidence, defendant presented and asked to be permitted to file an amendment to his answer, which amendment, omitting the title and merely formal part, is as follows: "(2) The defendant further alleges that during the times mentioned in the complaint, up to 1893, the cattle and stock of plaintiffs ran in common in large numbers with the cattle and stock of defendant on the Rancho San Carlos de Jonata, then and now owned by defendant; that said Rancho San Carlos de Jonata adjoins the lands of plaintiffs, which lands of plaintiffs are part of the Laguna Rancho; that, in consequence of the cattle and stock of plaintiffs running and grazing upon the lands of defendant above mentioned, defendant was and has been damaged in the sum of $9,000." Plaintiffs' counsel objected to the amendment, and the objection was sustained, to which ruling defendant, by his counsel, excepted.

Waiving the fact that this was a jury trial, that the amendment came after the plaintiffs had closed their case, and that amendments in such cases are within the discretion of the court to grant or refuse, and only subject to revision in cases of an abuse of discretion, we still perceive no error in the ruling. The action, as before stated, is one of ejectment. The proposed amendment did not constitute a defense to the action. It was in the nature of a counterclaim for a trespass committed by plaintiffs upon land of defendant contiguous to the demanded premises. A counterclaim may consist of: "(1) A cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as a foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action. (2) In an action arising upon contract; any other cause of action arising also upon contract, and existing at the commencement of the action." Code Civ. Proc. § 438. The cause of action, the trespass set up in the amendment, did not, in contemplation of law, arise out of the transaction set forth in the complaint, and was not connected with the subject of the action, and hence is not included in the first ground specified in the statute. It does not come within the second subdivision of section 438, for the reason that neither plaintiffs' cause of action nor defendant's amendment is a cause of action arising upon contract, but is a tort, pure and simple. MacDougall v. Maguire, 35 Cal. 274; Lovensohn v. Ward, 45 Cal. 8; Demartin v. Albert, 68 Cal. 277, 9 Pac. 157; Carpenter v. Hewel, 67 Cal. 589, 8 Pac. 314; James v. Center, 53 Cal. 31. The case of Commercial Co. v. Story, 100 Cal. 30, 34 Pac. 671, contains a clear exposition of the principles involved in cases arising under the first subdivision of section 438. We recommend that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; BELCHER, C.

PERES v. CROCKER et al. (S. F. 96.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 23, 1897.)

DEED, WHEN A MORTGAGE — EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

1. In an action to declare a deed absolute in form a mortgage, a judgment for defendant cannot be set aside where, in confirmation of the presumption of the deed, there was evidence from the conduct of the grantor, and from his pecuniary condition at the time of its execution, and his declarations before and after, that the deed was in fact absolute.

2. Where plaintiff had already testified as to what he told his grantee certain lands conveyed by him "ought" to have been worth at the time, exclusion of his estimate of their value was harmless.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Action by Louis Peres against Mary Ives Crocker and others. Verdict for defendants. From an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

N. Hamilton, Geo. H. Maxwell, R. M. F. Soto (Rodgers & Paterson, of counsel), for appellant. Wilson & Wilson and A. L. Rhodes, for respondents.

BRITT, C. Plaintiff claims that certain deeds of land, absolute in form, by him executed to one Charles McLaughlin, whose interest defendants have acquired by devise, were intended by the parties thereto to operate virtually as a mortgage; and he prosecutes this action to obtain an accounting of the rents and profits of the land, and to redeem the same from the effect of the deeds, or compel a reconveyance of the residue after apportioning to defendants enough thereof at its present value to satisfy any indebtedness ascertained to be due from him on such accounting. The court found that the deeds were intended to be absolute, according to their purport, and the chief contention of plaintiff on appeal is that this conclusion was not justified by the evidence at the trial. While acknowledging the presumptions attending the findings, he yet insists that, "resolving every conflict of testimony in favor of the respondents, the whole evidence taken together, in its legal effect, is counter to the decision of the court, and justly demands a reversal of its action." Invited by the apparent candor with which this contention is urged on behalf of appellant, we have attentively examined the voluminous statement of evidence brought up in the record. We are thus informed that for many years prior to May 12, 1881, an action entitled "Blum v. Sunol and others" was pending in the courts of the state, in which claim was laid by Blum to an undivided two-thirds interest in and to the Rancho de los Vaqueros, more commonly called in the record here the "Basco Ranch," containing about 17,700 acres, situated in Alameda and Contra Costa counties, and in the possession of Louis Peres, the plaintiff in the present action. The latter had undisputed title in one-third of said rancho, and claimed to be owner of seventeen-eighteenths thereof as purchaser under sundry defendants in Blum v. Sunol, in whose name he defended that suit. In 1879 judgment was rendered in Blum v. Sunol in Blum's favor. Subsequently an order was made granting a new trial. Blum appealed from such order, and his appeal was pending in the supreme court on said May 12, 1881. Peres' interest in the rancho was then incumbered by two mortgages,—the first in favor of one Dupuy for the principal sum of $70,000, the second in favor of one Arsiniega for $10,000; both mortgage debts being then due, and together amounting, with accrued interest, to above $95,000. These mortgages were in course of foreclosure in a suit against Peres then recently instituted, and a contract had been made between said Dupuy and Blum for an adjustment of their conflicting interests when by means of the foreclosure the title of Peres should be extinguished. Peres was also under contract with his attorneys in Blum v. Sunol to give them 1,000 acres of the rancho as their fee contingent upon success in that litigation. At the same time he owned free of any incumbrance a tract of 880 acres in the near vicinity of the rancho. Such smaller tract was of the value of $4,400, and his seventeen-eighteenths of the rancho was worth, had the title been clear, say $170,000. In this posture of his affairs Peres executed to McLaughlin, on said May 12, 1881, the deeds mentioned at the outset of this opinion; one purporting to be a grant, bargain, and sale of the Basco rancho, the other of said tract of 880 acres. McLaughlin at once took possession of the lands, paid off the said mortgages, and assumed the defense of Blum v. Sunol, himself or his successors in estate paying as expenses of that action about $17,000, exclusive of attorney's fees. He died December 13, 1883, and his wife, Kate D. McLaughlin, who became his executrix, was sole devisee under his last will. She died on March 16, 1888, leaving a will whereby she devised her whole estate to the defendants in this action. The order granting a new trial in Blum v. Sunol was affirmed (63 Cal. 341). The second trial, had in 1884, resulted adversely to Blum. He again appealed, but in July, 1889, a compromise was effected whereby, in consideration of $8,500 paid by the executors of Mrs. McLaughlin, he released his claims to the rancho. Peres began the present action, July 9, 1890. The lands involved were then worth some $350,000.

Peres is the only surviving person professing to have actual knowledge of the terms of the oral agreement between himself and McLaughlin which led to the deeds in question. His testimony at the trial was, in effect, that McLaughlin agreed to treat the deeds as a mortgage; and to reconvey the land to Peres when the Blum suit should be won and Peres had repaid him "in money or in land" for his advances to discharge the mortgages and resist the suit of Blum, with interest; also to account for the rents and profits received meanwhile. As tending to corroborate the statements of Peres, we note that the tract of wholly unincumbered land was included in the conveyance; that the land was worth (with clear title) nearly twice the sum necessary to pay off the mortgages of Dupuy and Arsiniega, and besides yielded under the McLaughlin management a gross return in rents, etc., of about $14,000 per year; that Peres rendered some assistance in procuring testimony for the second trial of the Blum case; also certain evidence of parol declarations by McLaughlin in disparagement of his apparent title. It was testified that he stated to one witness: "It [the rancho] is not mine; if Peres wants it back, I expect to give it to him;" that he took "the fight off Peres' hands to beat Blum"; to another, that he had taken the deeds as security for money advanced to pay off two mortgages, and for money "that I may give him in the future to help him out in his lawsuit"; and to a third, that he had loaned some money on the rancho. Appellant lays stress also on a promise made to him by McLaughlin that in case of his success in the litigation he would be generous or liberal to him (Peres). It seems to us, however, that this matter has very equivocal significance in the case.

But the court below was of opinion that the lands were conveyed to McLaughlin in consideration of his engaging to discharge the debts of Peres secured by said mortgages, and that he contracted no other obligation to Peres; and tending to uphold this finding there was evidence, besides the matters already stated, that Peres was without money to pay off the mortgages, and expected besides that the future litigation with Blum would necessitate large expense; that when Dupuy insisted on payment of his mortgage Peres threatened to settle with Blum, and allow Dupuy to take what would be left; that when Dupuy forestalled such action, and himself made an alliance with Blum and began suit for foreclosure, both Peres and his counsel in the case of Blum v. Sunol were greatly perturbed, and considered the situation desperate; that the transaction with McLaughlin occurred in this emergency; that the value of Peres' undisputed interest in the land was then far below the sum McLaughlin was required to pay for the release of the existing mortgages, while for any purpose of raising money the value of that part claimed by Blum was greatly impaired; that, according to Peres' own statement, no rate of interest to be paid by him to McLaughlin was mentioned between them; that Mr. E. J. Pringle, a gentleman of character and repute as the parties agree, who for many years had been attorney and counsel for Peres, and under whose direction the deed of the rancho to McLaughlin was drawn, had, as he testified, no intimation from Peres that the deed was to serve as a mortgage, but believed it to be absolute, and on that assumption thenceforward conducted the litigation with Blum in the interest of McLaughlin (as he had done previously for Peres), at length compromising the suit without consultation with or objection from Peres; that Peres accepted a lease of part of the rancho from McLaughlin, and paid rent therefor, afterwards assigning his lease with McLaughlin's consent and removing from the land; that he made no arrangement for payment of taxes; these were paid by McLaughlin and his successors, to whom, after 1881, the land was assessed; that Peres never sought an inspection of the accounts of the business of the rancho, nor after the execution of the deeds had or claimed any part in its management. In 1885 Peres owed the executrix $700 for rents, and a larger sum for cattle he had bought of McLaughlin. The second trial of Blum v. Sunol had then been had, and Peres preferred a request for consideration at the hands of the executrix because of her deceased husband's promise to be liberal with him if that suit should be won. She refused, and required payment of his said account for rents and cattle, and thereupon to settle the same he transferred to her a certificate of purchase of 120 acres of state land adjoining the rancho. There was, besides, the testimony of several witnesses to divers statements of Peres inconsistent with the theory that he yet retained interest in the title; in substance, that his mortgages became due and he could not hold his land any longer, that he had sold it out to McLaughlin, that McLaughlin was the owner, had got it all, etc. We have endeavored to exhibit only more prominent features of the evidence, omitting matter touching mainly the credit of witnesses, and much besides which may have influenced the court below.

Counsel differ little as to the law of the case. That the evidence to sustain such an action must be cogent and clear has been often remarked. Thus it has been said that "the evidence ought to be so clear as to leave no doubt that the real intention of the parties was to execute a mortgage, otherwise the intention appearing on the face of the deed ought to prevail." Henley v. Hotaling, 41 Cal. 27. "Unless the evidence is such as to leave in the mind of the trial judge a clear and satisfactory conviction that the instrument which in form is a deed was intended by all the parties thereto as a mortgage, the finding should be against the plaintiff." Mahoney v. Bostwick, 96 Cal. 58, 30 Pac. 1020. So, Ahern v. McCarthy, 107 Cal. 383, 40 Pac. 482; Cline v. Robbins, 112 Cal. 584, 44 Pac. 1023; and numerous other cases. The trial court is the appropriate tribunal to weigh the evidence, and determine whether it is convincing and satisfactory in the sense of these cases, and its conclusion must be accepted on appeal unless obviously to the view of this court its deductions have no adequate support. In the present instance it cannot be discerned that the findings are without such support. In confirmation of the presumption attaching to the deeds themselves, we think the court might conclude upon the evidence, without straining the inference, that the conduct of Peres from and after the execution of the deeds was much more consistent with the character of a vendor, having some vague expectation of possible benefit in case success attended the speculation on which his grantee had purchased the estate, than of a mortgagor expecting to be reinstated in the rights and dominion he had temporarily resigned to a mortgagee; while, if adequate motive for the conveyance was essential to be found, it might be discovered in the difficulties of Peres' situation and the contingency which confronted him, that a sale of his property under foreclosure, in the embarrassed condition of his title, would not raise funds sufficient to pay the debts secured on the same.

Peres, called as a witness on his own behalf, was asked by his counsel, "What did you estimate to be the value of those lands at the time of your negotiation with McLaughlin for this money?" The court sustained an objection to the question, and it is insisted that here was error. If it be conceded that the evidence sought by the question was within the rule which allows the motive, belief, or intent of a person to be testified by himself directly, and was therefore legally competent, yet we think its rejection could not have prejudiced the plaintiff. He had already testified that he told McLaughlin he had 16,500 or 16,600 acres in the rancho, and it "ought to be worth eighteen or twenty dollars an acre"; also that he would not sell it to him for less than $350,000. Subsequently it was stipulated between counsel that the value of the rancho at the time in question was $170,000, this having reference, it seems, to the seventeen-eighteenths thereof owned by Peres. Further, to sustain plaintiff's case, it was necessary to show that not only himself, but McLaughlin also, considered or was bound to consider the transaction as a mortgage and not a sale; and no estimate of the value held in the mind of Peres could shed light on the intent of McLaughlin, except that which was communicated to the latter. It is therefore manifest that the result could not have been affected by any answer to the question asked of the witness, and the action of the court excluding it worked no injury. The order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial is affirmed.

BOWERS RUBBER CO. v. BLASDEL.

SALE—WARRANTY.

The fact that a buyer paid part of the price did not preclude him from relief, in an action for the balance, on account of the worthlessness of part of the goods, where at the time of payment he had no knowledge of the defects.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the Bowers Rubber Company against H. G. Blasdel. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Morris M. Estee (Arthus G. Fisk, of counsel), for appellant. Ryland B. Wallace, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought to recover the sum of $4,588, alleged to be the balance due from defendant to plaintiff for 100 "rubber concentrator belts," manufactured by plaintiff for defendant between January 3, 1893, and December 20, 1893. The defense was that a large number of the said belts were not of good quality, and were not reasonably fit for the purposes for which they were intended. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and, among other things, the court found that 16 of the belts, "by reason of the inferior quality used in the body of said belts, and the improper manner in which the flanges thereof were molded to the sides or edges thereof, were not fit for the purposes for which they were to be used and were of no value," but that the other 84 belts were all "of good quality and fit for the purposes for which they were intended, and the reasonable value of the material used and labor employed in the manufacture thereof was the sum of $6,862," of which sum defendant had paid to plaintiff on account $3,600, leaving a balance due to plaintiff from defendant of $3,262, which on March 2, 1894, defendant promised in writing to pay to plaintiff, with interest thereon. In accordance with the findings judgment was entered on September 19, 1895, that the plaintiff recover the sum of $3,615.28 and costs; from which judgment and an order denying a new trial the defendant has appealed.

It is claimed by appellant that the finding that 84 of the said belts were all of good quality, and fit for the purposes for which they were intended, was not justified by the evidence, but that, on the contrary, 66 of them were badly manufactured, and therefore practically worthless and of no value. Whether the finding referred to was justified or not is the only question which need be considered. To set out the evidence bearing upon the question, even in substance, would make this opinion quite lengthy, and subserve no useful purpose. We have carefully examined the record, and, in our opinion, there was uncontradicted evidence quite sufficient to show that a considerable number of the belts, other than the 16 which were found to be of no value, were badly manufactured, because of "the improper manner in which the flanges thereof were molded to the sides or edges thereof," and were therefore practically of no value. It was also proved that, when defendant paid the $3,600 on account, he did not know of the defects in the belts. That part of the finding to the effect that on March 2, 1894, defendant promised in writing to pay plaintiff $3,262, with interest thereon, is based upon a letter written by defendant on the day named to plaintiff's president, in which he simply says: "I should have paid a portion of the indebtedness some time since, and I will be glad to pay you a good rate of interest on my overtime." The judgment and order appealed from must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. It is so ordered.

ACTIONS AGAINST CORPORATIONS—WHEN AUTHORIZED—RAILROADS—OPERATION BY LESSEE—LIABILITY OF LESSOR FOR PERSONAL INJURIES—PLEADING AND PROOF—VARIANCE.

1. Const. art. 12, § 10, prohibiting any law permitting the leasing or alienation of any franchise so as to relieve the franchise or property held thereunder from liabilities contracted in the operation of such franchise, does not give the employé of a corporation's lessee a right of action against the corporation for injuries through the wrongful acts of the lessee in the use of the leased property.

2. Though St. 1880, p. 21, authorizes one railway corporation to lease its franchise and property to another, the lessor company is liable to an employé of the lessee for injuries caused by the improper construction of the road.

3. In an action against a railroad company for personal injuries, plaintiff alleged that he was defendant's employé, and that the injury was caused by the improper construction of the road. The proof showed that plaintiff was an employé of defendant's lessee. Held, that the variance was immaterial, since he was entitled to recover, though not an employé of either company, not being a trespasser.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by Charles C. Lee against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, in which there were special findings of facts, and a general verdict in favor of plaintiff. From a judgment for defendant, notwithstanding the verdict, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and judgment on the verdict directed.

Cole & Cole, for appellant. Bicknell & Trask, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff brought this action against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him. He pleaded that the defendant was the owner of a certain railroad in the county of Los Angeles, and of its roadway, tracks, and appurtenances; that, at the time of the injuries complained of, he was employed by the defendant as a brakeman; and that while in the performance of his duties as brakeman, at a siding called Honby, on the line of the road, he was thrown from an engine upon which he was riding, and sustained serious injuries. The cause of the accident was alleged to be the negligence of the defendant in imperfectly constructing the rails and track of the road at Honby, and in allowing this defectively constructed track to remain out of repair, inadequate, and unsafe. The answer admitted the ownership by defendant of the road in question, denied that defendant was engaged in the business of operating the road, denied that plaintiff was or ever had been in its employ as a brakeman, or in any other capacity, and denied the imperfect construction and want of repair of the rails and track. The jury returned a general verdict in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $8,000. It likewise made special findings of fact upon certain interrogatories presented. These findings, with certain other facts agreed to by counsel under stipulation, may thus be summarized: The defendant was the owner of the railroad upon which the accident complained of occurred, but, prior to the time of the accident, it had leased the road and all the rolling stock and property of every kind used upon or in connection with it to the Southern Pacific Company of Kentucky. The Southern Pacific Company was at the time of the accident in the exclusive operation of said railroad under the lease. The side track upon which the accident occurred had been constructed by the Southern Pacific Company as an aid or adjunct to the main line. The plaintiff at the time of the accident was in the employ of the Southern Pacific Company, and not of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. The trial court determined that a conflict existed between the special findings and the general verdict, and holding that, under the special findings, defendant was entitled to judgment, rendered its decision accordingly.

Section 10 of article 12 of the constitution declares: "The legislature shall not pass any law permitting the leasing or alienation of any franchise so as to relieve the franchise or property held thereunder from the liability of the lessor or grantor, lessee or grantee, contracted or incurred in the operation, use or enjoyment of such franchise, or any of its privileges." Upon this language, appellant contends that the constitution gives one a right of action against the corporation which has owned property for an injury which has resulted to him in the use of such property in the hands of a lessee or grantee of the original owner, and from this he insists that his right of action against the defendant is established by the constitution itself. The section in question was adopted by the constitutional convention without debate. It is a provision peculiar to this state. It has not so far received judicial interpretation; yet we think no difficulty need be experienced in arriving at its true meaning. It is not to be construed as a grant of authority to lease, but as a restriction upon the power of the legislature to make such grant of authority. Abbott v. Railroad Co., 80 N. Y. 27; Railway Co. v. Morris, 68 Tex. 49, 3 S. W. 457. It declares: (1) That, if a lease or sale shall be made of the franchise or property of a corporation, the lessee or grantee shall take such franchise or property cum onere, subject to any of the liabilities of the grantor at the time existing and enforceable against the franchise or property. This provision is for the very obvious purpose of preventing a corporation, by selling or assigning its franchise or property, from saving harmless the franchise or property, and leaving remediless one who but for the lease or sale could have enforced against the property a judgment which he might recover. It is designed, further, as a declaration that the forfeiture of a franchise for an act committed or omitted by the charter corporation while it owned such franchise may be enforced after transfer of the franchise by sale or lease. (2) That, in the hands of the lessee or grantee, the franchise or other property shall be subject to the liabilities which may be incurred in its occupation, use, or enjoyment. Thus, the corporation owning the property will not be allowed to save it harmless by conveying it to another corporation. In the hands of the operating corporation, the franchise and property will still be liable,—the one to forfeiture at the instance of the state, the other to execution levy at the instance of any individual who has sustained loss or injury by reason of the wrongful acts of the operating corporation. But it will be noted that the section does not attempt to give, and is not intended to give, a personal action against a corporation where none existed before. It is designed to subject the franchise and property of a corporation, whether the franchise be exercised or the property be used by the corporation itself or by another, to liability for breach of duty. Otherwise, a corporation might own a fully-equipped railroad; it might convey the road and the property used upon and with it to a lessee corporation owning no property whatsoever, and leave the conduct and operation of its property entirely to the lessee. A judgment creditor seeking to make good his claim against the operating company would find no property owned by it upon which it could levy. To prevent this and many other such evasions as might be instanced, the constitutional provision in question was adopted. So far as the case at bar is concerned, it can have but this application, and no more. It would enable the plaintiff injured by the negligence of his employer, the lessee company, to make good his judgment under appropriate procedure out of the leased property; but it would not operate to give the plaintiff, an employé of the lessee company, a right of action against the lessor company, upon the fiction that it was his employer.

Respondent contends that, having made a valid lease of all its railroad property to the Southern Pacific Company, it is absolved from all liability to plaintiff. Upon the part of the appellant it is contended that the lease is without sanction from the constitution and laws of the state, and is therefore void. The question of the validity or invalidity of the lease is thus collaterally presented, but a decision upon it is not necessary to a determination of the rights of the parties hereto. If the lease were made without legislative sanction, it would be void, and, under all of the authorities, the lessor would continue liable for all the negligence of the lessee affecting the public, the latter being treated as operating the road as the mere agent of the lessor. Arrowsmith v. Railroad Co., 57 Fed. 165; Thomas v. Railroad Co., 101 U. S. 83; Railroad Co. v. Winans, 17 How. 30; Railroad Co. v. Brown, 17 Wall. 445; Frazier v. Railroad Co., 88 Tenn. 138, 12 S. W. 537; Railway Co. v. Dunbar, 20 Ill. 623; Railroad Co. v. Morris, 68 Tex. 50, 3 S. W. 457; Nelson v. Railway Co., 26 Vt. 717. But, conceding all that respondent claims as to the validity of the lease, it does not follow that respondent is relieved from liability to this plaintiff. The act which it is insisted affords legislative authority for the lease in question is entitled "An act permitting and authorizing railway and other corporations organized under the laws of this state, or of any state or territory of the United States of America, or any act of congress of the United States of America, to do business in this state on equal terms." It is found in the Statutes of 1880, at page 21. No terms of the act afford exemption in any respect to the lessor company. Where a statute authorizing leases contains no clause exempting the lessor from liability, it is well settled that the lessor still remains liable for an injury resulting from the negligent omission of a duty owed by it to the public, such as the proper construction of its road, station houses, etc.

In Railway Co. v. Curl, 28 Kan. 622, a railway company constructed its track, and in the construction omitted to make sufficient cattle guards where the track entered and left an unfenced field. Thereafter the railroad was leased to another company, which, at the time of the injury complained of, was in the full possession and use of the track, and, by the terms of its lease, had contracted to discharge all statutory obligations and duties imposed upon the lessor company. The owner of land adjacent to the railroad brought his action against the lessor company to recover damages for injuries sustained to his crops by straying cattle. Justice Brewer, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Defendant contends that, where the statute authorizes the lease by one railroad company to another of its track, the lessor company is not responsible for injuries caused by the torts of the lessee company, and, in support of that doctrine, cites some authorities. To a certain extent this proposition is true. If the injury results from negligence in the handling of trains or in the omission of any statutory duty connected with the management of the road,—matters in respect to which the lessor company could, in the nature of things, have no control,—then the lessee company will alone be responsible; but, when the injury results from the omission of some duty which the lessor itself owes to the public in the first instance,—something connected with the building of the road,—then we think the company assuming the franchise cannot divest itself of responsibility by leasing its track to some other company. Thus, for instance, in the case at bar the defendant was charged with the duty of placing sufficient cattle guards before it either used this track which it constructed, or permitted any one else to use it; and it cannot divest itself of responsibility for injuries resulting from such omission by leasing its track to some other company. The injury resulted directly from its own wrong, and not from any mere negligence on the part of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company. It cannot relieve itself by contracting with some other party to discharge its statutory duty. * * * The defendant omitted this duty, and, by the statute, is responsible for all damages sustained by reason of such omission." In Nugent v. Railroad Co., 80 Me. 62, 12 Atl. 797, the defendant railroad, under express authority of law, had leased its road to the Portland & Ogdensburg Railroad, which latter road was engaged in its management and operation. A brakeman of the Portland & Ogdensburg road sued defendant for personal injuries received by reason of the negligent construction of an awning at a station house built by defendant company. The case received elaborate consideration. The action of the brakeman against the owning road was sustained, and the rule deduced in the following language: "Herein, as we think, lies the true distinction which marks the dividing line of the lessor's responsibility. In other words, an authorized lease, without any exemption clause, absolves the lessor from the torts of the lessee resulting from the negligent operation and handling of its trains, and the general management of the leased road over which the lessor could have no control. But for an injury resulting from the negligent omission of some duty owed to the public, such as the proper construction of its roads, station houses, etc., the chartered company cannot, in the absence of statutory exemption, discharge itself of legal responsibility." In Arrowsmith v. Railroad Co., 57 Fed. 165, the same rule is enunciated, and numerous authorities cited in support thereof. Indeed, a somewhat extended examination of the cases justifies the conclusion that this principle, at least, is accepted without conflict. An analysis of the case of Railway Co. v. Culberson, 72 Tex. 375, 10 S. W. 706, a case upon which respondent strongly relies, will disclose that the law there enunciated is not only not at variance with the principle above mentioned, but embodies a distinct recognition of it. In that case an employé of the operating company sued the lessor company, claiming damages for injuries sustained by reason of defective appliances furnished by the operating company. The court held, and very properly, that such an action would not lie against the lessor company, and said: "It may be that if the injury had occurred by reason of a defect in the roadbed or track, and not by reason of a defect in the engine, the company charged with the duty of keeping up the road would be liable. But if it were true that the injury was caused entirely by another company operating the owner's road, and was inflicted upon one of its employés by reason of a defect in machinery entirely under its control, it is difficult to see upon what principle of policy or justice the lessor should be held liable, merely because it owned the road."

In all cases where a valid lease is found (or, as in this discussion, where it is assumed), the lessor company owes no duty whatsoever as an employer to the operatives of the lessee company. The claim of the relationship of employer and employé under such circumstances is a false claim and quantity. It does not exist. The responsibility of the lessor company when it attaches does not spring from this relationship, but arises from a failure of the lessor company to perform its duty to the public, of which public the employé of the operating company may be regarded as one. Thus, in those cases where the injury has resulted to an employé of the operating company by reason of the negligence of a fellow servant, or of want of skill and care of the lessor company in managing the road, or in negligence in furnishing suitable appliances, these and kindred matters being entirely and exclusively within the control of the lessee company, for injury which may result the lessor is in no way responsible. But, where injury has resulted to an employé of the operating company by reason of a failure of the lessor to perform its public duty, as in its failure to construct a safe road, as is here charged, the injured employé may sue the lessor company, as one of the public, for its failure to perform that duty, and not because, between himself and the lessor company, the relation of employé and employer, or any relation of contractual privity, exists. As is said in Nugent v. Railroad Co., supra, where the brakeman of the lessee road was injured by reason of the defective construction of the station house by the charter company: "Our opinion, therefore, is that the plaintiff had the lawful right, as brakeman on the train of the P. & O., to pass and repass by the Bethlehem station house of the defendant, which, therefore, owed a duty to him to construct and maintain its station house there in such a reasonably safe manner that its awning would not injure him while in the performance of his duty with due care, and that a negligent breach of that duty by the defendant having resulted in a personal injury to the plaintiff, without fault on his part, he is entitled to maintain this action therefor." So, here, the charge against the defendant is that the injury resulted by reason of its imperfect construction and maintenance of the rails and track of its road. The verdict of the jury for plaintiff is its declaration that the charge was substantiated by the evidence, and the nature of the omission or dereliction is such as to entitle the plaintiff to compensation from the defendant herein for injuries which may have resulted to him by reason of it.

As has been indicated, the plaintiff in this case has averred that he was an employé of the defendant corporation. The proofs in this regard disclose that he was in the employ of the Southern Pacific Company. The variance we think to be immaterial. The averment could be eliminated, and a cause of action would still remain. Plaintiff has pleaded and shown to the satisfaction of the jury that he was not a trespasser upon the railroad at the time and place where he met with his injury, but that he was there under lawful employment; that, in pursuit of his vocation, he met with an injury occasioned by defendant's defective construction of its roadbed, for which injury the defendant is, in law, responsible. It follows that there is no irreconcilable conflict between the special findings and the general verdict of the jury, and the court should therefore have entered judgment for plaintiff. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the trial court to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff and appellant, under the general verdict of the jury.

LEASE—CLAIM FOR IMPROVEMENTS—MISJOINDER OF DEFENDANTS—DEMURRER.

1. A demurrer for misjoinder of parties, merely stating that demurrant was improperly joined with the other defendants, is sufficient.

2. Provision in a lease that "it is * * * covenanted and agreed" by and between the parties that the lessee may make improvements, and the lessor, for himself, his heirs, administrators, and assigns, agrees to pay the lessee therefor at expiration of lease, gives the lessee no claim therefor against one to whom the land is conveyed after termination of lease and surrender by the lessee, and no lien on the premises, but merely a personal claim against the lessor.

3. A lessor sued by his lessee for improvements cannot demur for misjoinder of defendants because of joinder of his grantee, against whom no cause of action is stated.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; E. D. Ham, Judge.

Action by Gardner against Samuels and another. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Henry C. Gesford and H. M. Barstow (Dinkelspiel & Gesford, of counsel), for appellant. F. E. Johnston, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff leased from the defendant Samuels, November 18, 1886, a tract of land in Napa county, for the term of three years from May 2, 1887, and entered into possession of said land at the commencement of the term, and at its expiration, May 2, 1890, surrendered the premises to the defendant. The lease contained the following agreement: "It is further mutually covenanted and agreed by and between said parties that said party of the second part may at any time prior to the going into effect of this lease go upon said premises to make such improvements as he shall deem necessary, and said party of the first part, for himself, his heirs, administrators, and assigns, agrees to pay unto said party of the second part, at the expiration of this lease, for any and all improvements placed upon said premises by said party of the second part, not to exceed the sum of $1,500," with provision for the determination of the value by agreement or by arbitration. In pursuance of this agreement the plaintiff made certain improvements of a permanent nature upon the land, which at the expiration of the term were of the value of $2,200. The defendant Morris became the owner of the land on the 10th day of November, 1891, and since that time has been the owner and in possession thereof, and before he purchased the same had full notice that the plaintiff had made these improvements, and also of the agreement by Samuels to pay him therefor, and of his failure to make such payment. At the expiration of the term Samuels refused to agree with the plaintiff upon the value of the improvements, or to pay him anything therefor, and in April, 1894, the plaintiff requested Samuels, and also the defendant Morris, to submit the determination of their value to arbitration, as provided in the lease, and named an arbitrator therefor, but they each refused either to submit the same to arbitration, or to pay for said improvements. Plaintiff thereupon brought the present action to recover from Samuels the sum of $1,500, and that it be decreed to be a lien upon the land so leased, and for a sale thereof in satisfaction of said lien. The defendants severally demurred to the complaint for want of facts to constitute a cause of action, and also for a misjoinder of parties defendant; each specifying in his demurrer that he was improperly joined with the other. The court sustained the demurrers, and from the judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has appealed.

1. The demurrer was sufficient in form. Each of the defendants distinctly specified therein that the ground of his demurrer for misjoinder of parties defendant was that he was improperly joined with the other defendant. It was not necessary to incorporate into the demurrer an argument in support thereof, or to state therein the reasons why such misjoinder was improper. A demurrer couched in the language of the statute would have been insufficient (O'Callaghan v. Bode, 84 Cal. 489, 24 Pac. 269); but a demurring party, by designating the defendants who are improperly joined with him, sufficiently calls the plaintiff's attention to his objection to the complaint.

2. The demurrer of the defendant Morris was properly sustained. The agreement of Samuels to pay the value of the improvements was not a covenant which could be enforced against one who purchased the land after the breach of such agreement. There was no covenant on the part of the plaintiff to make any improvements. He was merely given the permission to do so, and the agreement of Samuels was only for the payment of money therefor Such an agreement is personal, and does not bind the assignee of the reversion. Bream

v. Dickerson, 2 Humph. 126. Section 1466, Civ. Code, declares: "No one merely by reason of having acquired an estate subject to a covenant running with the land is liable for a breach of the covenant before he acquired the estate, or after he has parted with it or ceased to enjoy its benefits." See, also, Bailey v. Richardson, 66 Cal. 416, 5 Pac. 910. Upon the breach of this agreement the plaintiff had merely a right of action against Samuels which was purely personal, and which was not assumed by Morris when he subsequently became the owner of the land. Nor did the agreement of Samuels have the effect to give to the plaintiff a lien upon the land for the security of this payment. It was held in Ecke v. Fetzer, 65 Wis. 55, 26 N. W. 266, in an action of ejectment, that a covenant by which the lessor agreed that at the expiration of the term he would pay for improvements that should be placed upon the land by the tenant during the term, bound an assignee of the lease, "who took the assignment of the lease during the term, and received rent as such assignee during said term," and that the tenant was entitled to retain possession of the leased premises until such payment should be made. This right in the tenant exists, however, not by virtue of a lien on the land for the value of the improvements, but upon the principle that the landlord, having agreed to pay for the improvements, cannot maintain ejectment and compel their delivery until such payment is made. If the tenant surrenders the possession, he cannot afterwards claim a lien thereon as against a subsequent purchaser from the landlord. In Fowler v. Insurance Co., 28 Hun, 195, the trustees of a trust estate made an agreement with their lessee that at the expiration of the term he should be paid for certain improvements which he might make upon the property, but did not bind themselves for its payment, and it was held that, as the trustees made the agreement only in their representative capacity, the trust estate was bound therefor, and the lessee was entitled to have the amount decreed to be a lien upon the trust estate. This was the application of a well-known rule of equity, and differs essentially from the principles governing the present case. The parties could have inserted in their lease an agreement that the value of the improvements should be a lien upon the land to be secured thereby, but their omission to do so implies that such was not their intention, and the plaintiff is therefore deprived of the right to such lien. In the absence of an agreement to that effect, a tenant has no lien upon the leased land for improvements placed thereon under an agreement with the landlord to pay for the same at the expiration of the term. Hite v. Parks, 2 Tenn. Ch. 375; Taylor v. Baldwin, 10 Barb. 582; Coffin v. Talman, 8 N. Y. 465; Beck v. Birdsall, 19 Kan. 550.

3. The complaint sufficiently states a cause of action against the defendant Samuels. It is urged by the respondent, however, that the demurrer of Samuels was properly sustained by reason of the misjoinder of Morris with him as co-defendant. The provision authorizing a demurrer for the misjoinder of parties defendant is taken from the system of equity pleading which formerly prevailed. Under that system such demurrer could be interposed only by the party who was improperly made a defendant. A defendant against whom there was a sufficient complaint could not object that others who had no interest in the subject-matter of the suit were made defendants, unless it also appeared that his interests were affected thereby. Story, Eq. Pl. § 544; Beach, Mod. Eq. Prac. §§ 80, 254; Cherry v. Monro, 2 Barb. Ch. 618. This ground of demurrer is authorized by the Code of Missouri, and it is held in that state that the former rule in equity is to be followed. Ashby v. Winston, 26 Mo. 210. Another rule of pleading prescribed by the Code, which is also taken from the equity system, is the provision of section 379, Code Civ. Proc.: "Any person may be made a defendant who has or claims an interest in the controversy adverse to the plaintiff, or who is a necessary party to a complete determination or settlement of the question involved therein." The "controversy" here named is the claim for relief made by the plaintiff against the defendants, which he sets forth in his complaint. In the present case this claim is to have the amount of his demand against Samuels for the value of the improvements placed upon the land declared to be a lien thereon, and to have the land sold for its payment. As Morris is alleged to have an interest in the land, he is a necessary party to the determination of such an action, and he cannot be said to be improperly joined as a defendant, even though the complaint does not sufficiently state an affirmative cause of action against him. If the relief sought by a plaintiff by reason of the cause of action as framed in his complaint would render all of the persons named as defendants proper parties to entitle him to such relief, a defendant against whom a sufficient cause of action is stated cannot demur for misjoinder of defendants because the complaint does not sufficiently state a cause of action against another defendant. "It is only where the complainant has some ground of relief against each defendant, and where his claims for relief against them respectively are improperly joined in one suit, so as to make the bill multifarious, that each defendant has the right to demur upon the ground that the other defendants are improperly joined with him in the suit." Cherry v. Monro, 2 Barb. Ch. 627. In an action to foreclose a mortgage the mortgagor cannot demur for the misjoinder of a defendant whose alleged claim does not appear to constitute a lien upon the mortgaged lands, nor can the maker of a promissory note demur to a complaint against him and the indorser for the misjoinder of the indorser because the complaint fails to state facts sufficient to bind the latter. The judgment is reversed, and the court below is directed to overrule the demurrer of the defendant Samuels, with leave to him to answer within such time as it may designate.

STATUTE—REPEAL BY IMPLICATION—COUNTY OFFICERS—COMPENSATION.

1. Pol. Code, § 4109, as amended March 7, 1881 (St. 1881, p. 72), providing that certain county officers shall take office on the first Monday after the 1st day of January succeeding the election, and hold for two years, was repealed by the county government act of 1891 (St. 1891, p. 314, § 60), providing that such officers shall hold till their successors are qualified.

2. Under the county government act of 1891 (St. 1891, p. 314, § 60), providing that certain county officers—whose compensation is fixed at an annual sum—shall hold office from the first Monday after the 1st day of January next succeeding their election till their successors are qualified, such officers are entitled to be paid for the actual time they serve.

3. Such right is not affected by section 221 of said act, which requires the county auditor to draw his warrant on the first Monday of each month for the salary due these officers for the preceding month.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Petition by Henry C. Dillon for a writ of mandamus to compel Charles C. Bicknell, auditor of Los Angeles county, to issue a warrant in favor of petitioner. From a judgment for petitioner, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. A. Donnell and Geo. M. Holton, for appellant. M. W. Conkling and H. C. Dillon, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Plaintiff was elected district attorney of Los Angeles county, at the general election in November, 1892, and entered upon his said office on the 2d day of January, 1893, that being the first Monday after the 1st day of January; and his term of office expired on the 7th day of January, 1895, that being also the first Monday after the 1st day of January of that year. The salary was $4,000 per annum, and he received from the salary fund of the county $8,000, which was paid him in monthly installments of $333⅓ per month, by warrants drawn by defendant upon the county treasurer, as provided by section 221 of the county government act of 1891 (St. 1891, p. 419). Plaintiff, claiming that he served as district attorney five days more than two official years, demanded of the defendant, as such auditor, that he draw a warrant upon the county treasurer for his salary for said five days, amounting to $54.50. The auditor refused to issue said warrant, and the court below, upon the petition of the plaintiff, rendered judgment directing a peremptory writ of mandate to issue as prayed for by plaintiff, and from said judgment the defendant appeals.

Article 20, § 20, of the constitution provides as follows: "Elections of the officers provided for by the constitution, except at the election in the year 1879, shall be held on the even numbered years next before the expiration of their respective terms. Terms of such officers shall commence on the first Monday after the first day of January next following their election." Section 4,109 of the Political Code, as amended March 7, 1881 (St. 1881, p. 72), is as follows: "All elective county, city and township officers, except superior court judges, superintendents of schools and assessors, shall be elected at the general election to be held in the year 1882, and at the general election to be held every second year thereafter, and shall take office on the first Monday after the first day of January next succeeding their election, and shall hold office for two years. The years that said officers are to hold office are to be computed respectively from and including the first Monday after the first day of January of any one year to and including the first Monday after the first day of January of the next succeeding year; provided," etc. It is conceded that, if that section of the Political Code is still in force, it is conclusive as to what constitutes the official year, and that under its provision the demand made by the plaintiff was unauthorized. It is contended, however, that said section has been repealed, and whether it has been repealed or not is, therefore, the controlling question.

The county government act of 1883 (Deering's Pol. Code, Append. p. 850, § 60) is as follows: "The elective county and township officers (except superintendent of public schools and assessors) shall be elected at the general election to be held in November, 1884, and every two years thereafter, and shall take office at 12 o'clock meridian on the first Monday after the first day of January next succeeding their election. * * * All officers elected under the provisions of this act shall hold office until their successors are elected or appointed and qualified." The county government act of 1891 (St. 1891, p. 314, § 60) contained the same provision as to the time when officers should enter upon their office, and contained also the provision that all officers elected under it should hold office until their successors are elected or appointed and qualified. We think it clear that these subsequent acts repealed section 4109 of the Political Code as amended March 7, 1881, though none of them contained any provision expressly repealing that section. Said section 60 is a revision of said section 4109. It covers the same ground, with the exception of the clause defining how the official year shall be computed, but changes a number of its provisions, the more important of which are the following: The old section provided that the election shall be held "at the general election to be held in the year," etc. The new act inserted the word "November" in that sentence, thus changing the time of the election from September to November. In the clause in the old act providing that the officer shall take office on the first Monday after the 1st day of January next succeeding his election, and shall hold office for two years, the words "twelve o'clock meridian" were inserted, and instead of the provision that he should hold office for two years it was provided "that all officers elected under the provisions of this act shall hold office until their successors are elected or appointed and qualified," thus repeating the rule fixed by section 879, Pol. Code, for the termination of his incumbency of the office. This change in the section, we think, conclusively indicates that the new section was intended to be a revision of the former section, and preserved all of its provisions that were intended to be retained.

We think the rule was correctly stated by the learned judge of the court below that: "Wherever it clearly appears that the intention of the legislature by the later act is to revise the entire subject-matter of the former, the subsequent act operates as a repeal of the former, although it contains no precise words to that effect." Treadwell v. Yolo Co., 62 Cal. 564; Charnock v. Rose, 70 Cal. 192, 11 Pac. 625; Hanley v. Sixteen Horses, 97 Cal. 183, 32 Pac. 10; Ex parte Benjamin, 65 Cal. 310, 4 Pac. 23. In Sedgwick on Statutory Law (page 124) it is said: "Even if a subsequent statute be not repugnant in all its provisions to a prior one, yet, if the later statute was clearly intended to prescribe the only rule which should govern in the case provided for, it repeals the original act." Appellant contends, however, that other provisions of the county government act of 1891 are inconsistent with, and do not justify, the conclusion of the court below, and cites the following section of that act: "Sec. 221. The salaries of such officers named in this act, as are entitled to salaries, shall be paid monthly out of the county treasury; and it shall be the duty of the auditor, on the first Monday of each and every month, to draw his warrant on the county treasurer in favor of each of said officers for the amount of salary due him under the provisions of this act for the preceding month." The above section was also incorporated in the county government act of 1893. Section 117 of the county government act of 1891 (St. 1891, p. 323) provided as follows: "All warrants issued by the auditor during each year, commencing with the first Monday after the first day of January, must be numbered consecutively, and the number, date and amount of each, and the name of the person to whom payable, and the purpose for which drawn must be stated thereon. * * *" We do not think these sections sustain appellant's construction. Said section 221 requires the auditor to draw his warrant on the first Monday of the month in which the term of office expires; yet it may happen, and does occasionally happen, that the first Monday in January is the 1st day of January, and the term of the incumbent does not in that case expire until the second Monday; and in that case, upon the theory of appellant that the month for which the warrant is drawn is necessarily from the first Monday of the preceding month to the first Monday of the succeeding month, it would clearly appear that the incumbent does not, under his theory, always receive pay for the full time for which he serves, whether his successor is elected and qualified on the day fixed by the statute or not. Indeed, under the statute fixing the commencement and termination of the terms of county officers it can never happen that the term consists of precisely two years, it being sometimes more and sometimes less; and therefore the provision fixing the compensation at an annual sum should be construed as fixing the rate of compensation to be paid for the time the officer actually serves. This construction will do exact justice between the preceding and succeeding officers, and not increase the burden to be borne by the people. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

I concur: SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

5 Cal. Unrep. 612

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO v. GROTE. (S. F. 379.)[1]

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 23, 1897.)

EJECTMENT—TITLE TO MAINTAIN.

A city cannot maintain ejectment for recovery of possession of a street dedicated to the public by user, without showing ownership in the fee.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by the city and county of San Francisco against Ellen Grote. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

T. Z. Blakeman, for appellant. Harry T. Creswell, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This is an action in ejectment, brought by the city and county of San Francisco against Ellen Grote to recover the possession, for street purposes, of a small strip of land alleged to be a portion of a public street, dedicated to the public as such. Said alleged street is known as "Garden Avenue," and extends through a single block from Devisadero street to Broderick street, between Geary and Post streets, and its alleged width is 25 feet. Defendant's lot lies next to Broderick street, with its front on Geary, and has a depth of 137½ feet, and the demanded premises consists of a strip 12½ feet wide across the rear end of her lot, and which, plaintiff contends, forms part of said street or avenue. The action was tried by the court without a jury, and findings and judgment were for the plaintiff. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and the facts are brought up by a bill of exceptions.

[1] Reversed in banc. See 52 Pac. 127, 120 Cal. 59.

The record presents three questions: (1) Does the evidence show a dedication of the strip of land in dispute to the use of the public for street purposes? (2) If there was such dedication, was there an abandonment of that portion of the street? (3) Can the city and county of San Francisco maintain ejectment for the recovery of the possession of a public street without showing ownership in the land in fee? If the third question above stated should be answered in the negative, the consideration of the first and second questions becomes unnecessary, and we shall therefore consider that question first.

It is conceded by respondent that the defendant owns the fee in the demanded premises, nor is there any question that, if the said street is a public highway, it is such by dedication arising from the acts and acquiescence of the property owners along the same, and its acceptance, shown by the use thereof by the public. In other words, there has been no conveyance by the property owners of the land alleged to be covered by the street, nor has title to the easement been acquired by condemnation or other legal proceedings, but the right or title of the plaintiff and of the public rests solely in parol. Assuming that it is a street, and that the demanded premises is a part thereof, all the right or interest that the public has therein is an easement consisting in the right to use the same for the ordinary purposes of a highway; and such easement is an incorporeal hereditament. "By the common law and the general rule an ejectment will not lie for anything where an entry cannot be made, or of which the sheriff cannot deliver possession. It would follow, therefore, by this rule, that ejectment is only maintainable for corporeal hereditaments. * * * Things that lie merely in grant are not the subjects of ejectment, because these being incorporeal are in their nature invisible, and therefore not capable of being delivered in execution." Tyler, Ej. 37. "An action of ejectment will not lie against one claiming an easement in a parcel of land, or to his right to enjoy the same; nor will a writ of entry. But the owner in fee of land may maintain a right of entry to establish his title to the freehold against one having a prescriptive right of way over the same." Washb. Easem. (4th Ed.) 740. Newell, Ej. p. 17, lays down the following test as to the cases where ejectment is the only proper remedy: "(1) The thing claimed must be a corporeal hereditament; (2) a right of entry must exist at the time of the commencement of the action; and (3) the interests must be visible and tangible, so that the sheriff may deliver the possession to the plaintiff under the writ of possession issuing out of the court." The same author, at page 53, enumerates a large number of easements, among which is a "right of way," "a right to a road," which are "in legal consideration not tangible property, and for the recovery of which the action of ejectment will not lie." In Payne v. Treadwell, 5 Cal. 312, it was said: "The action of ejectment is merely a possessory action and is confined to cases where the claimant has a possessory title; that is to say, a right of entry in the lands." If it be true that an easement is an incorporeal hereditament, and that such hereditaments lie in grant, because not capable of livery of seisin, it is difficult to understand how there can be an ouster or a withholding of the possession, or how manual possession could be delivered by the sheriff.

This question, however, is not a new one in this state. In Wood v. Turnpike Co., 24 Cal. 474, it was held that ejectment does not lie to try the right to a road or right of way. In that case the plaintiff claimed title to the Truckee turnpike road (a toll road) under a conveyance made by the sheriff pursuant to an execution sale thereof, and the action was brought by said purchaser to recover possession of the road. The court said: "The plaintiff acquired nothing by the purchase of the road to which the action of ejectment has any remedial relations. 'Road' is a legal term, strictly synonymous with the word 'way,' and in the complaint and throughout all the title papers of the plaintiff their identity is strictly recognized; and the 'way' is an easement, and consists in the right of passing over another man's ground. It is an incorporeal hereditament; a servitude imposed upon corporeal property, and not a part of it. It gives no right of possession of the land upon which it is imposed, but a right merely to a party in whom the way is vested to enjoy the way. * * * A deed of a way or a right of way would pass to the grantee no title to or interest in the land. * * * But it is well settled that an action of ejectment will not lie in favor of a party to try his right to enjoy an easement, nor will it lie against one claiming an easement in land to try his right to enjoy it. And the reason is obvious,—the very subject matter of controversy is incorporeal. It is for that reason that an easement 'lyeth in grant and not in livery.' It is for that reason that the owner of a way cannot be disseised or otherwise ousted from it. He can only be disturbed or obstructed in his enjoyment, and for such injury the remedy is by action on the case at common law, or by bill in equity." Pages 487, 488. Wood v. Turnpike Co., supra, was cited and followed in City of San Francisco v. Calderwood, 31 Cal. 585, 590, where it was held that a deed of a way or right of way would pass to the grantee no title to or interest in the land; that it is an incorporeal hereditament and servitude imposed upon corporeal property, and not a part of it, and gives no right to possess the land upon which it is imposed.

In Fitzell v. Leaky, 72 Cal. 482, 14 Pac. 200, it was again said: "The owner of an easement upon the land has no right of entry, nor has he any right to possess the land as such."

There are several cases in this state which are claimed to be inconsistent with those above cited, and which should be briefly noticed. The case of City of San Francisco v. Sullivan, 50 Cal. 603, was an action of ejectment to recover a portion of a street upon which it was alleged the defendant had entered. The complaint, however, alleged that the city and county of San Francisco was "the owner thereof, subject to the right of its citizens to pass and repass over the same." The court said: "We are of the opinion that the force of the allegations that the plaintiff here is the owner and entitled to the possession of the premises sued for is not impaired or affected by the further allegation that the public has an easement therein as a public street. * * * The existence and enjoyment of the easement is entirely compatible with the seisin of the plaintiff as being the owner of the fee." This case, so far as we have quoted the opinion of the court, clearly sustains the general doctrine that the owner of the fee subject to an easement may maintain ejectment against an intruder who asserts a right inconsistent with the easement, and is not inconsistent with the cases we have above cited. It is true, the court quoted a paragraph from Dillon's Municipal Corporations, the first part of which is directly to the point in the case there before the court. The latter part of the quotation has no application to that case. This extract, however, we shall have occasion to notice in another connection. The case of City of Visalia v. Jacob, 65 Cal. 434, 4 Pac. 433, was also an action of ejectment for a portion of a public street. The demurrer to the complaint was sustained; and judgment rendered for the defendant. The complaint, however, in that case alleged that the plaintiff was "seised of and entitled to possession of the land, the same being a portion of a public street duly laid out and dedicated to the public use." This allegation is equivalent to an allegation that the fee of the land was in the city. The court in that case also cited Dillon on Municipal Corporations and City of San Francisco v. Sullivan, supra. It would appear from the language of the complaint that the defendant demurred on the ground that the complaint showed the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations, and the opinion principally discusses the question whether title to the land dedicated to the public as a street could be acquired by adverse possession.

Southern Pac. Co. v. Burr, 86 Cal. 279, 24 Pac. 1032, is also cited by respondent. That case, however, is clearly distinguishable from the case at bar. In that case the plaintiff was granted by congress a right of way over the public lands, 400 feet in width, for the purposes of a railroad. The action was ejectment to recover from defendant a portion of said right of way occupied by him. The court in its opinion referred to the case of Wood v. Turnpike Co., supra, and distinguished it from the case then under consideration. The grant of the right of way to the railroad company was necessarily exclusive as to the right of occupancy. Quoting from Railroad Co. v. Benity, 5 Sawy. 118, Fed. Cas. No. 2,551, it was said: "It may be admitted that for the obstruction of a mere easement the recovery of the possession of the land itself would not be the proper remedy; but, in order that the plaintiff in the case at bar may make such use of the land as the grantor intended it should under a grant of right of way, it becomes necessary to take and keep an actual possession of the land. It must also be a possession exclusive of all other persons." Page 285, 86 Cal., and page 1033, 24 Pac. This case, therefore, does not conflict with the views we have above expressed. In the case of City of Eureka v. Armstrong, 83 Cal. 623, 22 Pac. 928, and 23 Pac. 1085, and the case of City of Eureka v. Fay, 107 Cal. 166, 40 Pac. 235, the action was ejectment for land alleged to be a portion of a public street. In neither of these cases, however, was any question made or considered in relation to the form of the action. But for the quotation of the passage from Dillon on Municipal Corporations in the case of City of San Francisco v. Sullivan, supra, and City of Visalia v. Jacob, supra, there is no real conflict in the decisions in this state upon the subject under discussion, and in neither of those cases was it necessary to decide the question here involved, inasmuch as in both cases it appeared that the fee in controversy was in the plaintiff.

The great consideration which should be given to all propositions of law stated by the learned author above mentioned requires that some notice should be given it. Section 662 of said work is as follows: "A municipal corporation entitled to the possession and control of streets and public places may, in its corporate name, recover the same in ejectment. Where it possesses the fee, although in trust for public uses, there are no technical obstacles in the way of maintaining such action against the adjoining proprietor, or whoever may wrongfully intrude upon, occupy, or detain the property. And, where the adjoining proprietor retains the fee, the courts have overcome the technical difficulties by regarding the right to the possession, use, and control of the property by the municipality as a legal, and not a mere equitable, right." I have examined all the American cases cited by the learned author in the note to said section. The New Jersey cases, it may be conceded, sustain the text, though it will be observed that two of the five cases cited were in equity. Of the cases at law, in Den v. Dummer, 20 N. J. Law, 86, the land in question was dedicated by the owner of the town site upon a recorded plat for a public market ground. Trustees of M. E. Church v. Mayor, etc., of Hoboken, 33 N. J. Law, 13, was to recover possession of land dedicated upon the original town plat as a public square. The third case—Hoboken Land & Improvement Co. v. Mayor, etc., of Hoboken, 36 N. J. Law, 540—involved the right to a street, which, by the original plat, extended back from high-water mark on the Hudson river. The improvement company—the plaintiff in error, and the defendant below—succeeded to the ownership of the land platted so far as it remained unsold, and was granted a charter by the legislature to fill in land covered by water in front of their property, and construct wharves, etc., but it was provided "that it should not be lawful for the company to fill up any such land covered with water * * * in front of the lands of any other person owning down to the water without the consent of such person in writing." It was held that the city could recover, in ejectment, the street to the new high-water line. City of Winona v. Huff, 11 Minn. 119 (Gil. 75). In a town plat, made under the statute, certain squares mentioned in the certificate to the plat were declared to be for "public use and benefit forever." It was held as to such dedication the plat itself operates as a conveyance to the public, and a claim by the public is unnecessary; that under a statutory dedication the fee simple to the land does not pass, but only such an estate or interest in the land as the trust requires. In the opinion (page 136, 11 Minn. [Gil. 85]) the court said: "The action of ejectment is a mixed action, and the form of remedy by which a person is entitled to recover possession of real property in fee, for life, or for years. It does not lie where the thing to be recovered is incorporeal. Saund. Pl. & Ev. tit. 'Ejectment,' p. 446. The purpose for which the action is brought is not to try the mere abstract right to the soil, but to obtain actual possession. Jackson v. Huntingdon, 6 Pet. 442. For a mere easement, perhaps, the action will not lie; but wherever a right of entry exists, and the interest is tangible, so that possession can be delivered, an action of ejectment will lie. Chit. Pl. 188, 189; Jackson v. Buel, 9 Johns. 298. If, therefore, the plaintiff has an interest in the land and the right of possession, this action may be maintained." It was further held by the court in that case that dedication of lands for different purposes may require different interests or estates to support them. As, for instance, a dedication of land for public buildings, or a burying ground, or a public square, which may be inclosed, improved, and ornamented for purposes of pleasure, or amusement, or recreation, or health. In Weeping Water v. Reed, 21 Neb. 261, 31 N. W. 797, the action was to recover the possession of a square marked "College Square." It was held that there was a dedication of College Square to the public, with a right to the use thereof for the purposes of an institution of learning so long as the user continued; the title remaining in the public as represented by the municipal corporation for that use, and ejectment will lie to remove any person in unlawful possession. In City of Hannibal v. Draper, 15 Mo. 634, it was held that the memoranda, "Lots numbered two, three, four, in block twenty-six, is intended for church grounds," and as concerning the lots were written the words "church ground," appearing upon a duly-acknowledged plat of the town of Hannibal, it was sufficient, under the act concerning plats, towns, and villages, to vest the fee in the county for public use. In City of California v. Howard, 78 Mo. 88, the action was ejectment for a public street. It was held: "A city invested by law with the title in fee, and the right and control over all public streets, may maintain ejectment for land dedicated for a street." In City of Chicago v. Wright, 69 Ill. 318, 322, the court quoted the above extract from Dillon on Municipal Corporations. That case, however, was a bill in equity, brought by Wright against the city of Chicago and the chief of police, to prevent them from removing certain fences from lands claimed by the city to be a public street. The only ground suggested by the author upon which ejectment is sustained in such cases is "by regarding the right to the possession, use, and control of the property by the municipality as a legal, and not a mere equitable, right."

If it be conceded that where the dedication appears of record, as by recording a plat with streets delineated thereon, and the sale of lots described as bounded thereby, and especially where the municipality has expressly accepted the dedication, the action of ejectment may be maintained,—a proposition we neither concede nor decide,—the case here is very different. There was no dedication by filing a plat showing the existence of any street through the center of the block. Some of the conveyances described the lot as abutting on "an alley," but without designating the width of the alley. Defendant's lot extended to the center of the block, and the conveyance from plaintiff was silent as to an alley. If there was any dedication of the avenue or alley, it was by the individual owners of the lots. There was not, except as to irregular portions, any reservation in the deeds executed by the city of the land covered by the alleged street, and as to the land not conveyed no purpose was expressed in the conveyances; and whether there was any dedication rested wholly upon parol testimony of the acts and declarations of the respective owners, and the use of the way by the public. We think that, whatever may be the rule in cases where the evidence of dedication may be shown from the public records, such evidence of dedication as was given in this case will not support an action of ejectment. It is undoubtedly the general rule that in an action of ejectment legal title to land cannot be proved by parol, and, where not permitted by statute, equitable defenses thereto cannot be heard. The judgment appealed from should be reversed, and the action dismissed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, with directions to dismiss the action.

TOMPKINS et al. v. MONTGOMERY. (S. F. 799.)

APPEALS—TRANSCRIPT—BONDS—JUSTIFICATION OF SURETIES—SUPERSEDEAS—DISMISSAL.

1. Notice of motion to dismiss an appeal from a judgment for failure to file a transcript having been given, the transcript was afterwards filed, and on the same day notice was given of an amendment of the notice of motion by including a motion to dismiss also an appeal from an order denying a new trial. Held, the transcript being sufficient for the latter appeal, that the amendment did not take effect as of the date of the original notice.

2. When the transcript is filed on the day on which notice is given to dismiss the appeal for failure to file a transcript, the burden is on movant, under Sup. Ct. Rule 5, to show that the notice was given before the transcript was filed.

3. A few days after appealing, appellant again appealed from the same judgment, and afterwards filed a transcript sufficient in substance. Held that, though the only notice of appeal in the transcript was the notice of the second appeal, the transcript was a "sufficient answer" (Sup. Ct. Rule 5) to a subsequent motion to dismiss the first appeal for failure to file a transcript.

4. The failure of the sureties in an undertaking on appeal to justify does not deprive the supreme court of jurisdiction so as to permit another appeal from the same judgment.

5. The fact that the sureties in an undertaking to stay execution on the judgment appealed from failed to justify before the county clerk does not preclude appellant from applying to the supreme court for leave to file another such undertaking. Hill v. Finnigan, 54 Cal. 493, followed.

6. Where a party appealed from a judgment and an order denying a new trial, his right to have execution stayed is not impaired by dismissal of the appeal from the judgment.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; A. L. Frick, Judge.

Action by one Tompkins and others against one Montgomery. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appealed, and, after the failure of his sureties to justify, he again appealed. On motions to dismiss and on application for leave to file an undertaking to stay execution. Appeals from the judgment and second appeal from the order denying a new trial dismissed. Application granted.

E. M. Gibson and Welles Whittemore, for appellant. A. A. Moore, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The defendant served and filed a notice of appeal from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial December 3, 1896, and on December 5th filed an undertaking on appeal in the sum of $300, and also an undertaking to stay execution upon the judgment. The plaintiffs excepted to the sufficiency of the sureties, and on December 18th, upon notice that they would justify on that day before the county clerk, the sureties appeared, and, after examination, failed to justify, and were rejected by the clerk. December 21st the defendant served upon the plaintiffs and filed with the county clerk another notice of appeal from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial, and on the 23d of December filed a sufficient undertaking on appeal in due form of law. January 18th the respondents gave notice of a motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment on the ground that no transcript of the record on appeal had been filed in this court. January 20th the appellant filed with the clerk of this court a transcript containing the judgment roll, statement on motion for a new trial, order denying a new trial, and a copy of the notice of appeal which was filed December 21st. On the same day the respondents gave notice to the appellant that they amended their notice of motion to dismiss the appeal by including therein a motion to dismiss the appeal from the order denying a new trial. February 4th the respondents gave notice of a motion to dismiss the appeals taken December 21st, upon the ground that at the time said notice of appeal was served and filed an appeal from the judgment and order was pending in this court and undetermined. February 6th the appellant made application for leave by this court to file an undertaking sufficient to stay execution upon the judgment appealed from. The several motions and applications have been heard and submitted together.

1. At the time the notice of the motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment was served upon the appellant there had been no transcript filed in this court, and under the provisions of rule 5 the respondents are entitled to have this motion granted.

2. The motion to dismiss the appeal from the order denying a new trial cannot be regarded as having been given until the notice by the respondents of their amendment to their motion, and, as the transcript was filed on that day, and the respondent has not shown that his notice was given prior to its filing (Hoyt v. Railroad Co., 87 Cal. 610, 25 Pac. 160, 1066), it must, under the same rule, be considered "a sufficient answer to the motion." It is contended by the respondent that, as the only notice of appeal which is contained in the transcript is that which was given December 21st, the transcript so filed cannot be regarded as an answer to the motion to dismiss the appeal which was taken December 3d. The transcript, however, purports to contain a record of all the proceedings of the superior court which are sought to be reviewed on the appeal, and is therefore sufficient to avoid a dismissal under rule 5. Hill v. Finnigan, 54 Cal. 311; Paige v. Roeding, 89 Cal. 69, 26 Pac. 787; Woodside v. Hewel, 107 Cal. 141, 40 Pac. 103. The most that can be claimed by the respondents is that there was a defect in the transcript, which could be cured under rule 14 upon a suggestion of a diminution of the record; and by rule 15 any technical objection to the record in civil cases, which might be so corrected, must be notified to the appellant, who is allowed until the hearing of the cause in which to present the additional record. Woodside v. Hewel, supra.

3. The notice of appeal which was served and filed on the 21st of December was unauthorized. At that time the appeal which was taken December 3d was pending in this court, and there was no judgment or order pending in the superior court from which an appeal could be taken. The failure of the sureties to justify upon the $300 undertaking did not render the appeal ineffectual, or take from this court the jurisdiction of the cause which was given by the appeal of December 3d. Schacht v. Odell, 52 Cal. 449; Hill v. Finnigan, supra; Brown v. Plummer, 70 Cal. 337, 11 Pac. 631.

4. The appellant is not precluded from applying to this court for leave to file an undertaking to stay execution of the judgment by reason of the failure of the sureties upon the former appeal to justify before the county clerk. A similar question was presented in Hill v. Finnigan, 54 Cal. 493, and it was held that an undertaking to stay execution may be filed after an appeal has been taken, but that, as the Code contemplates but one proceeding in the court below for that purpose, if the appellant has been unable to secure such stay by reason of the failure of his sureties to justify, this court has authority to permit such undertaking to be filed after an appeal has been taken. The right of the appellant to have the execution stayed pending the appeal from the order denying a new trial is not impaired by the fact that the appeal from the judgment is dismissed. Fulton v. Hanna, 40 Cal. 278. The appeals taken December 21, 1896, and also the appeal from the judgment taken December 3d, are dismissed. The motion to dismiss the appeal from the order denying a new trial is denied. The application of the appellant for leave to file an undertaking to stay execution upon the judgment is granted, and upon the sureties in such undertaking justifying before the chief justice of this court, upon notice to the respondents, the said undertaking may be filed, and thereupon the execution of the judgment shall be stayed until the determination of the appeal.

RIGHTS OF JUNIOR MORTGAGEE—FORECLOSURE OF SENIOR MORTGAGE—RELEASE OF INDORSERS ON NOTE.

1. A junior mortgagee does not discharge indorsers on his mortgage note by failing to set up and foreclose the mortgage in a suit to foreclose the senior mortgage, to which he was made a party.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 726, providing that there can be but one action on a mortgage debt, which must proceed first against the security itself, does not cause a junior mortgagee, who made default in a suit to foreclose the senior mortgage, to lose his remedy against the indorsers of his mortgage note, though he may have thereby lost his remedy against the maker.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Minnie A. Carver against S. B. Steele and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

William F. Gibson, for appellant. Warren Olney, for respondents.

BRITT, C. On March 18, 1889, one Staples borrowed of one Montgomery a sum of money. To secure its repayment, Staples and S. B. Steele executed their promissory note, payable in 90 days, to E. W. Steele, who indorsed the same to Montgomery. As between Staples and the Steeles, they were sureties for him in this transaction. As further security for the loan, Staples and his wife executed to Montgomery a mortgage, in form a bargain and sale deed, of a tract of land which was subject to a prior mortgage in favor of John and Louisa Bauerle. Finding that he would be unable to pay said note when due, Staples agreed with Montgomery for an extension of time of payment, and on May 27, 1889, pursuant to such agreement, he executed to Montgomery a new note for the same sum, payable August 27th after date, which was indorsed by the Steeles. Thereupon the first note was surrendered and canceled. Staples entered into no new express engagement relative to the mortgage, though the court found an "understanding" that it should secure the new note. February 16, 1892, John and Louisa Bauerle commenced an action for the foreclosure of their prior mortgage against said land, making Montgomery a party defendant. He made default, and on October 31, 1892, the land was sold under judgment of foreclosure in that action to satisfy the debt due the Bauerles, and in due time a sheriff's deed was issued to the purchaser. Subsequently to this judgment, Montgomery assigned the said note of May 27, 1889, to the plaintiff here, Minnie A. Carver, who brought the present action to recover the amount thereof from E. W. and S. B. Steele as indorsers. The defense—sustained by the court below—is that Montgomery discharged Staples, the maker of the note, and consequently the indorsers, by failure to set up and foreclose his junior mortgage in the suit brought by the Bauerles to enforce their prior lien.

Conceding the point contended for by respondents, though without intimating any opinion on the subject, that the mortgage continued to be a security for the payment of the renewed note in the hands of Montgomery at the time of the Bauerle foreclosure, we yet fail to discern that he was under legal compulsion to assert the same in order to hold the indorsers. In general, unless some agreement or special circumstance imposes diligence upon the creditor as a duty, he does not, by mere failure to pursue the person primarily liable, discharge the guarantor, surety, or indorser; even though his passivity in this regard may result in barring his remedy against the original debtor. Whiting v. Clark, 17 Cal. 407; Bull v. Coe, 77 Cal. 54, 60, 18 Pac. 808. Accordingly the rule is that the creditor loses no rights against the indorser, whose liability has become fixed, by simple failure to enforce his lien against property mortgaged for security of the debt. Bank v. Wood, 71 N. Y. 405; Hoover v. McCormick, 84 Wis. 215, 54 N. W. 505; Fuller v. Tomlinson, 58 Iowa, 111, 12 N. W. 127; Coleb. Coll. Sec. § 241, and cases cited. It is a familiar provision of our statutes that there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt, or the enforcement of any right secured by mortgage upon real estate or personal property, which action must be first directed to the exhaustion of the security (Code Civ. Proc. § 726); and it is the theory of respondents that in virtue of this section the effect of Montgomery's default in the Bauerle suit was to preclude him from maintaining any personal action against Staples for the recovery of his debt, citing Brown v. Willis, 67 Cal. 235, 7 Pac. 682, where it was so held; and hence that the maker being released the indorsers are released. Admitting that Brown v. Willis was correctly decided, it does not reach respondents' case. Their contract to pay Montgomery was not the same as that of Staples. "The promise of the maker of a note is one thing and the promise of an indorser is another," and their promise was not secured by the mortgage held by Montgomery. Vandewater v. McRae, 27 Cal. 596, 603. And, as the authorities referred to above show, the loss of personal remedy against the maker, or of the lien upon the mortgaged property, following as a consequence of mere inaction on the part of the holder, is of no moment in the case. The court therefore erred in holding that the indorsers had been released, and the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

KENNEDY & SHAW LUMBER CO. v. DUSENBERY et al. (S. F. 343.)

ENFORCING LIEN FOR MATERIAL—CONSOLIDATION OF ACTIONS—NONSUIT OF ONE CLAIMANT—FINDINGS AND JUDGMENT AFTER NONSUIT—DEFAULT JUDGMENT.

1. Where several suits to enforce liens were consolidated, and one plaintiff was nonsuited as to the defendant owners only, it was not error to render judgment that, as against the owners, such plaintiff should take nothing, and pay costs; since, after the nonsuit, he remained a party as against the other claimants, and they were entitled to have his claim to a portion of the contract price eliminated.

2. Nonsuiting one claimant in a consolidated suit to enforce liens for materials, in favor of the defendant owners only, does not affect his right to judgment against the contractor who had made default, as to such claimant's petition, before the nonsuit.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by the Kennedy & Shaw Lumber Company against Dusenbery and others to enforce a mechanic's lien. From a judgment entered after a nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William H. Jordan (H. M. Barstow, of counsel), for appellant. Napthaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, W. H. Mahony, Stafford & Stafford, Fisher Ames, A. D. D'Ancona, W. C. Graves, T. J. Shackleford, E. H. Wakeman, and C. H. Herrington, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. Nine actions for the foreclosure of certain mechanics' liens, of which one was by the appellant, were commenced in the superior court, and, by the order of the court, consolidated, and thereafter tried. The plaintiffs in the several actions were material men, and claimed liens upon certain buildings of the defendants Dusenbery & Stencel for materials which had been furnished by them to one Green, by whom the building had been constructed under a contract therefor with Dusenbury & Stencel. The defendant Green was a defendant in the several actions, but his default for want of appearance was entered in the action brought by the appellant. A nonsuit was granted against the appellant, in behalf of the defendants Dusenbery & Stencel. Findings of fact were thereafter made, and judgment rendered in favor of the other claimants, from which this appeal has been taken upon the judgment roll without any bill of exceptions.

It is recited in the findings that "the defendants Dusenbery & Stencel, at the close of the evidence introduced in support of the claim of lien of plaintiff the Kennedy & Shaw Lumber Company, moved for a nonsuit against said plaintiff, which motion was granted." No exception was taken to this ruling of the court, and we must assume that, upon the evidence before it, the nonsuit was properly granted. It does not appear that any evidence was afterwards presented to the court, and, as the appellant was nonsuited, there was no occasion for any findings upon the issues made upon the averments in its complaint. In its findings of fact, the court finds that, during the construction of the building the appellant furnished to the contractor certain lumber, which was used in the construction of said building, "but the evidence fails to show the quantity of lumber or the reasonable value of the lumber which was furnished," and, in its conclusion of law, finds that the appellant is not entitled to any judgment. It is contended by the appellant that it was error for the court, after having nonsuited it, to make these findings of fact, and render the judgment against it.

Upon the consolidation of the several actions, the plaintiffs therein became actors in the suit against each other, as well as against the owners, and each was entitled to reduce or avoid the lien of either of the others by any evidence that would have that effect. The nonsuit of the appellant was granted only in favor of the defendants Dusenbery & Stencel, and the judgment from which the appeal is taken merely determines that the appellant shall take nothing as against them, and that they shall have judgment against the appellant for their costs. After the nonsuit had been granted in favor of the owners, the appellant still remained a party to the consolidated action as against the other plaintiffs in the several actions, and the judgment which was finally entered is in the form which is proper to be entered upon a nonsuit. The foregoing statement in the findings may be treated as a reason for the order granting the nonsuit, but it does not strengthen or invalidate the judgment which was entered in the action. Neither the findings nor the judgment entered thereon purport to determine any right of the appellant, as against the contractor, but simply to determine that, as against the owners, the appellant is not entitled to a lien, and consequently is not entitled, as against the owners or the other lien claimants, to any portion of the unpaid amount of the contract price.

As the nonsuit was granted in favor of only the defendants Dusenbery & Stencel, it did not affect the default of the contractor that had been previously entered, or the right of the appellant to the judgment authorized by that default. Unless, however, the plaintiff established a lien upon the property, it was not entitled to a judgment against the owners for the unpaid amount of the contract price. Whatever remained of this amount after satisfying the other liens was a simple debt of the owners to the contractor, and they could not be directed in this action to pay it to the appellant.

The provision in the decree giving to the owners judgment against the appellant for their costs is not on its face erroneous. It does not appear that any costs were taxed, and no amount is named in the judgment. The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BUCKLEY. (Cr. 76.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 1, 1897.)

CRIMINAL LAW—RIGHT TO SPEEDY TRIAL—APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—ELECTIONS—ALTERING RETURNS—EVIDENCE.

1. When an exception is that the evidence failed to show that defendant committed the offense charged, the state must place in the bill of exceptions at least some of the evidence, if any there was, showing participation by defendant.

2. When, however, the only evidence of defendant's guilt consisted in the comparison of handwriting by the jury, it was sufficient for the state, in response to an exception to the sufficiency of the evidence, merely to specify, in the bill of exceptions, of what the evidence consisted; since it could not incorporate such evidence into the bill, or provide fac similes of the writings. Garoutte, J., dissenting.

3. In the absence of evidence of motive for altering election returns, and of opportunity for doing so, a conviction was not sustained merely by a comparison by the jury of the few words and figures alleged to have been altered, with the same words and figures written by defendant under abnormal conditions.

4. Information was filed December 27th, and defendant was arraigned January 4th, and demurred on the 11th. Demurrer was argued the 18th, and overruled the 25th, and defendant then pleaded not guilty. Case was called for trial February 12th, and defendant obtained a continuance of one day, but the trial did not occur until March 18th. Held, that defendant was entitled to a dismissal under Pen. Code, § 1382, enacted pursuant to the constitution, providing that the prosecution shall be dismissed, unless good cause to the contrary be shown, if a defendant whose trial has not been postponed at his own instance is not brought to trial within 60 days from filing of information. McFarland and Harrison, JJ., dissenting.

5. The mere statement of the judge, on denying the motion to dismiss, that during the time of delay the court had been wholly occupied with other cases, does not show good cause for the delay.

6. Nor was it good cause that a material witness for the state was absent during the period of delay, where no diligence was shown to procure his attendance.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Jerome A. Buckley was convicted for altering election returns, and appeals. Reversed.

John O'Byrne and J. J. Guilfoyle, Jr., for appellant. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, Chas. H. Jackson, and Wm. S. Barnes, Dist. Atty., for the People.

TEMPLE, J. In this case, the department having failed to agree upon a judgment, a reargument was had in bank. The defendant was a member of the board of election, in the Tenth precinct of the Thirty-Fifth assembly district, in the city and county of San Francisco, at the general election of 1894. The information charges that at such election the defendant and one L. M. Martinet altered the official returns, and returned and caused to be received as true and official returns certain false and fraudulent tally lists, etc. As presented here the transcript contains no evidence tending to show guilt in the defendant. It would appear that the only inculpating evidence before the jury consisted of the comparison by the jury itself of certain handwriting, proven to be that of the defendant, with the altered portions of the tally lists. The tally lists are not in the record in any form, and neither the original nor any fac simile of either paper is presented here. The point is made that the evidence does not sustain the verdict. Of course, since the only evidence consisted in the comparison of handwriting by the jury, the record here does not show whether there was any probative force in the evidence. A motion for a new trial was made, on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence; and, among the specifications of the respects in which it was insufficient, it was stated, in the bill of exceptions proposed by defendant, that the evidence failed to establish that defendant was the person who made the alterations.

The defendant contends that, in response to that specification, it was incumbent upon the prosecution to have put into the bill some evidence (if any there was) which would make it appear to this court that there was proof of the participation of defendant in the crime specified. This position is sustained by the cases of People v. English, 52 Cal. 211, and People v. Fisher, 51 Cal. 319. In the first-mentioned case, the court, speaking of an exception of this character, said: "It must be presumed, and always will be presumed, by this court, that such exception in a bill is preceded by all the material evidence actually given bearing on the point of the objection." In People v. Fisher it is said: "The presumption in this court is that there was no evidence introduced in support of a fact in issue, unless the bill of exceptions contains the substance of the evidence introduced to prove the fact, or states that the fact was proven, or that evidence was introduced tending to prove it." This is in accord with the rule constantly enforced in civil cases, and seems just and reasonable. These cases have never been expressly overruled or criticised, but the cases of People v. Marks, 72 Cal. 46, 13 Pac. 149, and People v. Tonielli, 81 Cal. 275, 22 Pac. 678, are cited as holding a contrary doctrine. A contrary view is stated in People v. Marks, but it does not appear that any such question was raised in the case. In People v. Tonielli it is expressly stated that the evidence found in the record is sufficient, and it is then added that it does not appear that the statement contains all the evidence. I see no reason why the rule should be different in civil and criminal cases, and the cases last cited are not sufficient to establish a new departure in criminal cases.

But, although it was incumbent upon the people to see that the bill of exceptions contained some evidence tending to establish every element of the crime, still they could not, under the statute and rules of the court, incorporate into it the original papers. Nor was it the duty of the prosecution—or, indeed, permissible under the Code—to provide photographs of the writing. It was only possible under the Penal Code for it to do just what it did do, to wit, state what evidence was submitted to the jury. It then becomes one of the numerous cases in which we are at a disadvantage in weighing the evidence. It cannot be represented or pictured here as the jury and the court saw it. Perhaps, upon a proper application, this court would have ordered the original papers sent up under rule 25; but, as this has not been done, still, if we can see that in the nature of things the evidence might have been sufficient, we must so hold.

What, then, does the record show in regard to the evidence? Defendant was a clerk of election at the precinct named, appointed as a Republican. He assisted in keeping tally as the votes were counted. There is no suspicion that he did not perform this duty properly. It was shown by the prosecution that, after all the ballots had been counted for the state ticket, defendant gave the result to a person who was employed by one of the candidates, and gave the correct result, and not according to the altered list. It is assumed that the lists had not been tampered with until after they had been certified and sealed up to be carried to the registrar. There was no evidence—other than the handwriting alluded to—which tends to show that after that time the paper, or the package including it, was ever in the hands or under the control of defendant. On the contrary, all the precinct officers who were sworn testified that they never saw him have it. Nor, aside from the handwriting, was there shown a single suspicious circumstance against the defendant. No motive was proven or alleged. It did not appear that he knew the person in whose interests the changes were made, or had any reason to desire his success. Witness after witness went upon the stand, and testified to his good character. They were not even cross-examined, and there was no counter evidence. The circumstances show no opportunity for defendant to have made the alterations except that, against his protest, he was ordered to accompany Martinet, who was an inspector at that precinct, when Martinet took the returns to the registrar. Martinet was a Democrat, and defendant was ordered to go along as a Republican. The package was sealed up when it was taken, and was sealed up when it was returned again to the precinct; and no one noticed that the seal had been tampered with, nor was there any evidence which tended to show that the alteration was made while the package was thus in the custody of Martinet. Both defendant and Martinet testified that the package was never in the hands of the defendant, and that the package was not opened, and that no alterations were made. The package was returned to the precinct because the tally list and the ballots were sealed up in the same envelope, whereas they should have been in separate envelopes. The canvas for the local ticket had not yet been concluded. The package was then locked up in a box, and kept until the next day, when the seal was broken by another officer of the election in the presence of the board. A new package containing this tally list was then taken by a Mr. Maher, who was an additional judge, to be delivered to the registrar. He took them away alone to his residence, where they remained while he had dinner. He was there met by some other members of the board, who accompanied him to the registrar's office. The alterations were not discovered until the returns came to be canvassed by the board of election commissioners. How long that was after the returns were delivered to the registrar is not shown. As to their custody in the meantime, the registrar merely stated that they remained in his office sealed. The opportunity which defendant is supposed to have had to make the alterations was while the package containing the list was being taken by Martinet to the registrar, and back again to the voting booth. As already said, there is no evidence tending even to raise a suspicion of any such thing, or that defendant ever had the package in his hands, and positive evidence that he did not. There was no testimony tending to cast suspicion upon Martinet, and there is, as in the case of Buckley, a total absence of proof of motive or of interest in the candidate in whose interests the alterations were made.

The writing by defendant, which was compared with the alterations in the tally list, was not made under normal conditions, but in a state of excitement upon the first charge of wrongdoing, and consisted in the figures "60" and "135," the same numbers in longhand, his name, a few other figures, and 40 tally marks. The record does not show what portions of the tally list were offered in evidence, save that the alterations were put in evidence, and it does not show that these were submitted to the jury for inspection. The bill of exceptions does not state that the jury did make the comparison, or that they took the documents to their room, when they retired to deliberate upon their verdict. But suppose they did so, what does the bill show they compared? Why, only the figures alleged in the information to have been made in altering the tally list, —the numerals "60" and "135," nothing more. Now, there was positively no other evidence save the supposed similarity of the few figures and words, written by defendant under abnormal conditions, with these figures, or, at most (and that is a supposition unsustained by the record), the same numbers written out in longhand, which tends to prove guilt or raise a suspicion against the defendant. Certainly, we all know how unsatisfactory is the evidence derived from the comparison of handwritings even when done by experts of the greatest skill. Rarely will such evidence alone satisfy a reasonable person beyond reasonable doubt, especially when, as in this case, the conclusion is against positive evidence, in addition to the presumption of innocence. To allow such a verdict to stand would, in my opinion, be an outrage upon justice.

The accused was not tried within 60 days after the filing of the information. He asked that the prosecution against him be dismissed for this reason. His motion was denied, and the ruling is relied upon here as error. The constitution and the laws alike guaranty a speedy trial, and section 1382 of the Penal Code prescribes that the prosecution shall be dismissed, unless good cause to the contrary be shown, if a defendant whose trial has not been postponed upon his application is not brought to trial within 60 days after the filing of the information. The motion was denied on three ground: (1) The defendant himself applied for and obtained a postponement; (2) there was no opportunity to try defendant, as the court had been constantly occupied; and (3) a material witness for the prosecution was absent.

1. The case was postponed, on the application of defendant, from the 12th of February, 1895, to the 13th,—one day. Does the postponement of one day, on the application of the defendant, deprive him entirely of the constitutional guaranty of speedy trial? Certainly not, and any such construction of the statute would be unreasonable.

2. In denying the motion, it was stated by the court that at no time since the plea had there been an opportunity to bring the case to trial except the 12th day of February, on which day the defendant asked for and obtained a continuance of one day, other cases having in the meantime occupied the attention of the court. Nothing is said about the nature of the other cases. They are not shown to have been cases of equal urgency, and then nothing is said of the other 11 departments of the same court. In my opinion, the constitutional guaranty imposes upon the state the duty of providing courts which, under ordinary conditions, can furnish a speedy trial. A speedy trial does not mean at once, but with all convenient dispatch, and implies courts in which a trial may be had. No doubt it also implies reasonable time for the state to provide courts and juries, and to procure witnesses. It imposes, however, a special duty upon the state with reference to such cases, and, if the duty is not performed, the prosecution should be dismissed. The legislature has seen fit to lay down a rule by which the constitutional provision may be interpreted, which seems reasonable. In my opinion, the mere statement of the judge that the court has been otherwise engaged does not show good cause.

3. No diligence was shown to procure the attendance of the witness. Certainly, the statement of the witness that it would be a hardship to require him to come from Sacramento was a poor excuse for continuing the case 33 days, while the defendant was in jail, and liable to lose his witnesses by the delay. It was not shown that the services of the witness were at all important to the legislature. The benefit of this constitutional guaranty cannot be denied on such flimsy showing.

Upon the showing made, I think the motion to dismiss the prosecution should have been granted, and the prosecution dismissed. Under the rule laid down in People v. Houston (Cal.) 40 Pac. 756, the information must be held good. The judgment and order are reversed.

We concur: VAN FLEET, J.; HENSHAW, J.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment of reversal, and in that part of the opinion of Mr. Justice TEMPLE which holds that there is no evidence in the record sufficient to warrant the verdict. I do not concur in that part of said opinion which holds that in this case the prosecution should be dismissed because the defendant was not tried within 60 days after the filing of the information.

HARRISON, J. I concur in the judgment of reversal upon the ground, as set forth by Mr. Justice TEMPLE in his opinion, that the evidence, as shown by the record, was insufficient to justify the verdict. I am of the opinion, however, that the court did not err in refusing to dismiss the cause. The information was filed December 27, 1894, and the defendant was arraigned January 4th, and, having taken time to plead, on the 11th of January demurred to the information. Argument was had upon this demurrer January 18th, and on the 25th of January the court overruled the demurrer, and the defendant entered a plea of not guilty. This was the first point of time after the filing of the information at which the defendant could be brought to trial, and his trial was had on the 18th of March. Whatever time was consumed by him in dilatory motions or pleas which had the effect to postpone the time at which he could be brought to trial was "good cause to the contrary," upon his application, for the dismissal of the cause, under section 1382 of the Penal Code.

GAROUTTE, J. (concurring). The record presented to us in this case contains no evidence whatever indicating defendant's guilt; and wherever a defendant appeals to this court, upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict, we must assume that all material evidence introduced before the jury is in the record. Section 1944 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "Evidence respecting the handwriting may also be given by a comparison made by the witness, or the jury, with writings admitted or treated as genuine by the party against whom the evidence is offered or proved to be genuine to the satisfaction of the judge." In line with the principle declared in this section, the people introduced the genuine handwriting of the defendant before the jury, for the purpose of comparison with the handwriting in which the altered returns were made. We have not before us either a fac simile of the genuine handwriting of the defendant, or of the altered returns. Neither have we the original writings, which might well have been brought here for inspection, under the rules of court. This evidence not being before us in any form, it must be assumed that it failed to establish defendant's guilt, and for that reason was deemed immaterial by the people in the preparation of the record on appeal.

Section 32 of the purity of elections act provides: "A person offending against any provision of sections * * * of this act is a competent witness against another person so offending, and may be compelled to attend and testify upon any trial hearing proceeding, or lawful investigation or judicial proceeding, in the same manner as any other person. But the testimony so given shall not be used in any prosecution or proceeding, civil or criminal, against the person so testifying. A person so testifying shall not thereafter be liable to indictment or presentment by information, nor to prosecution or punishment for the offense with reference to which his testimony was given, and may plead or prove the giving of testimony accordingly in bar of such indictment, information or prosecution." St. 1893, p. 26. It is now claimed that the defendant, relying upon the aforesaid provisions of law, is exempt from prosecution, inasmuch as he gave testimony before the board of election commissioners at a hearing held by that body for the investigation of these alleged election frauds. The hearing, proceeding, or investigation mentioned in this section must be a lawful one; that is, one authorized by law. And the attorney general insists that the board of election commissioners has no authority, under the law, to carry on such an investigation as was being conducted when this defendant made the aforesaid statements. I agree with his position. The board of election commissioners is purely a creature of the statute, and it may only do those things which the statute says it may do. The examination carried on by it was in excess of and beyond its power, and defendant cannot therefore invoke the exemption provided by section 32 of the act. I concur in the reversal of the judgment and order.

BROKERS—COMPENSATION.

An agent for the solicitation on commission of orders for the output of another's business was not entitled to compensation merely because he performed services which "tended" to obtain orders, or because he introduced to his principal parties, who subsequently gave orders. Zeimer v. Antisell, 17 Pac. 642, 75 Cal. 512, followed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by E. S. Ayres against Albert Thomas. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

T. E. Gibbon, for appellant. Murphy & Gottschalk, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This action was brought to recover $1,584.69, with interest on $831.48 thereof from July 28, 1893, and interest on the balance thereof from October 9, 1894. The cause was tried before a jury, and a verdict returned in favor of plaintiff for $1,694. Upon a motion for a new trial, the court made an order granting a new trial unless plaintiff should consent to reduce the verdict by $117.45, leaving the verdict to stand at $1,576.55, to which deduction plaintiff consented; whereupon the motion for a new trial was denied and judgment entered for $1,576.55. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. Plaintiff acted as an agent of defendant, a foundryman, in soliciting orders for the output of defendant's business on commission, and also to some extent as a collector for said defendant. There are five counts in plaintiff's complaint. The evidence shows that all of the five causes of action are based upon three several grounds: (1) A claim for services in obtaining orders for the products of defendant's business as an iron founder; (2) a claim for money paid by plaintiff to defendant's use; (3) a claim for labor performed by plaintiff as collector for defendant. The services were rendered and the money paid out between May 15, 1892, and October 9, 1894.

Appellant attacks the ninth instruction given by the court to the jury at the request of plaintiff, and urges that it was erroneous and injurious to defendant. It is as follows: "(9) The jury are further instructed that to entitle the plaintiff to commissions from the defendant for work done by the defendant for third parties, that it is not necessary for the plaintiff to show that he did everything in connection with procurement of the work. If, at the request of the defendant, he performed any services which tended to obtain the work, or introduced the parties to the defendant or to the defendant's managers or superintendent, or if you should find from the evidence that the plaintiff, by means of his solicitations, brought the attention of any parties to the defendant or his manager or superintendent, and by reason thereof work was afterwards ordered by such third parties, then, in such case, the plaintiff should be entitled to his commissions, even though he did not do all of the work of soliciting whereby the work was given to the defendant; but it is enough for him to show that he did something in connection with any job or work given by any third person to the defendant which aided or assisted the defendant in any way in obtaining the said work, and which was the cause of inducing the purchasers or customers negotiating with defendant or contracting with defendant." There was evidence tending to show that plaintiff was, under an arrangement with defendant, entitled to receive 5 per cent. on all orders for goods which he secured in amounts exceeding $50, and 10 per cent. on all orders for a less amount than $50. Plaintiff furnished a bill of particulars, and, as to some of the items charged therein, there was a sharp conflict as to whether or not plaintiff had secured the customers upon whose purchases he had charged a percentage. Under this state of the case, the law in relation to the circumstances under which plaintiff became entitled to a commission became an important factor in the problem to be solved.

Brokers are of many kinds, the most important being enumerated and defined as follows: Exchange brokers, insurance brokers, note brokers, pawn brokers, real-estate brokers, ship brokers, stock brokers, and merchandise brokers. "Merchandise brokers are those who buy and sell goods and negotiate between buyer and seller, but without having the custody of the property." Black, Law Dict. tit. "Broker." All brokers are agents, and there are certain well-defined principles of law applicable to them as such, and as to the different classes certain other principles are applicable dependent upon the peculiarities of the class. One of the distinguishing features of that class of agencies termed "brokerage" is that the transaction must be completed before commissions are earned. To this rule there is the exception that where the agent has completed his part in the transaction, and the failure of the negotiation be due to the interference of the principal or to causes outside of the agent, then the commissions are earned. Whart. Ag. § 325. The agent must be an efficient agent in or the procuring cause of the contract. Tombs v. Alexander, 101 Mass. 255; Walker v. Tirrell, Id. 257; Barrett v. Johnson, 64 Pa. St. 223; Shanklin v. Hall, 100 Cal. 26, 34 Pac. 636. As was said by this court in Zeimer v. Antisell, 75 Cal., at page 512, 17 Pac. 643, quoting from Sibbald v. Iron Co., 83 N. Y. 382: "The duty assumed by the broker is to bring the minds of the buyer and seller to an agreement for a sale, and the price and terms on which it is to be made, and, until this is done, his right to commissions does not accrue." The broker must be the "efficient agent or procuring cause of the sale." McGavock v. Woodlief, 20 How. 221; Wylie v. Bank, 61 N. Y. 415.

Tested by these rules, the foregoing instruction was too broad. As is claimed by appellant, the instruction indicated to the jury that plaintiff was entitled to recover his commissions upon sales (1) if, at the request of the defendant, he performed any services which tended to obtain the work; (2) if plaintiff introduced to defendant, or to his manager or superintendent, parties who subsequently ordered work; (3) if the plaintiff, by means of his solicitation, brought the attention of any parties to the defendant or his manager or superintendent, and, by reason thereof, work was afterwards ordered by said parties. The first and second of the foregoing propositions cannot be maintained. It was not for any services which tended to obtain work that the plaintiff was entitled to commissions, but for such services as constituted the proximate and efficient or procuring cause of the work being ordered. In the case of Zeimer v. Antisell, supra, the plaintiff, a broker, had performed some services which tended to bring about the sale. He had taken Levy, the subsequent purchaser, to see the property, etc., but, as nothing more was done until plaintiff's authority ceased, this was held insufficient. The second proposition is still more open to objection. It clearly stated to the jury, as law applicable to the case, that if plaintiff introduced to defendant, his manager or superintendent, parties who subsequently ordered work, he would be entitled to a commission thereon. The instruction isolates the fact of an introduction from all idea of any other duty on the part of plaintiff, and, without reference to its object or the surrounding circumstances, makes it the prime factor in the problem, provided always the party or parties so introduced should at any future time, and under any circumstances, order work from the defendant. The remainder of the instruction, although proper, being connected with the portions indicated, disjunctively, in no wise qualifies the objectionable part.

We find nothing in the other instructions given calculated to dispel the effect of the error complained of. The sixth instruction, asked by the defendant and refused, was objectionable on account of the last clause therein, consisting of the words "without the intervention or aid of any other essential matter, thing, or influence." Aside from such last clause, the instruction contained a correct and clear exposition of the law applicable to the case. For the error indicated, we recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: BRITT, C.; BELCHER, C.

PEOPLE v. FOURNIER. (Cr. 203.)

ARSON—EVIDENCE.

1. On a trial for arson, where the evidence is circumstantial, and a witness for the state testifies that she was awakened during the night by the smell as of burning rags, she may be asked on cross-examination whether there was not a great deal of rubbish in the back yard, near where the fire originated.

2. Where the fire was seen in rubbish in a yard near the building burned, evidence that the rubbish was on fire in the same yard the day previous was admissible.

3. Where a suspicious circumstance in the evidence against defendant was the removal of certain goods from the burned building the day before the fire, it was error to exclude evidence of defendant explaining the removal.

4. Where a suspicious circumstance against defendant was that his building was insured, evidence that the building of a third person in which the fire started was also insured was admissible.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Madera county; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Joseph Marie Achille Fournier was convicted of destroying by fire a certain building with intent to defraud an insurance company, and appeals. Reversed.

Raleigh E. Rhodes and John R. Kittrell, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and C. N. Post, for the People.

TEMPLE, J. The defendant was charged, under section 548, Pen. Code, with the offense of willfully destroying by fire a certain building, with the intent to defraud the Palatine Insurance Company, Limited, of Manchester, England, a corporation, in which company the property was then insured. A fire occurred in the town of Madera on the 27th of July, 1895, in which several buildings were consumed, one of which belonged to the defendant, and was insured for the sum of $600. The witnesses all agreed that the fire commenced either in the building occupied by the Tribune newspaper, between which and the defendant's building there was a space of 8 feet, or somewhere along the line of a fence running northerly from the rear of the Tribune Building some 20 feet to a shed adjacent to the dwelling occupied by the defendant and his wife. The defendant did not own the land upon which the building was, but occupied the same under a lease, and had built a small wooden house on the southeast corner of the lot, which he occupied as a saloon. On the rear of the lot, and some 40 feet from the saloon, northerly, was the dwelling spoken of. Some of the witnesses—and apparently those who were first at the fire—testified that when first discovered by them it was immediately in the rear of the Tribune Building, back of which was a little porch; others, that when they saw it it was upon the fence mentioned, and was spreading rapidly along the fence from the dwelling occupied by the defendant towards the Tribune Building. The fence partly divided the lot occupied by the defendant from the lot upon which the Tribune Building was situated. The evidence that the fire was of incendiary character, and tending to cast suspicion upon the defendant, was entirely circumstantial. That which tended to show that the fire was of an incendiary character, aside from that which cast suspicion upon the defendant, was the testimony of some of the witnesses that the fire was proceeding along the fence from the dwelling of the defendant to the Tribune Building rapidly, indicating that the fence might have been saturated with coal oil, and that they perceived the odor of coal oil.

The evidence which tended especially to raise a suspicion against the defendant was simply and only: (1) That he was a Frenchman, and had announced his intention of soon returning to France, and that he had an insurance upon the building, as stated. (2) On the very day of the fire he removed from the saloon to his dwelling a barrel of brandy and two cases of champagne. And (3) he and his wife were, shortly before the fire, sitting on the sidewalk by the saloon. The fire occurred shortly before midnight, and defendant and his wife claimed that they were both in bed at the time the alarm was given. The fire occurred in the middle of summer, and it appeared that in the rear of the printing office, which was first on fire, there was a great deal of rubbish, consisting of old rags, paper, straw, etc. A witness for the prosecution, who occupied one of the houses destroyed, testified that she was awakened during the night by mosquitoes, and immediately smelled fire, as of burning rags. She looked from her window, and saw the fire. She thought it was back of the Tribune office, nearer the office than the fence; and finally she stated that she was sure that it was under the porch, back of the Tribune Building. On cross-examination the witness was asked as to the condition of the premises,—whether there was anything on the ground in the shape of rubbish, paper, or anything of the kind. The question was objected to as incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant, and not cross-examination, and the objection was sustained. On like objection the court refused to permit an answer to the question whether at other times she had not perceived the odor of coal oil upon the premises, and the court also refused to permit the question whether, on the day before the fire, there had not been a pile of rubbish on fire, back of the Tribune office. These rulings were assigned as error here, and the attorney general hardly attempts a defense of them.

One question of interest at the trial was whether the fire ran along the fence from defendant's dwelling towards the Tribune Building, or was first discovered in the Tribune Building, or immediately at the rear of it. The attention of the witness was first aroused by the smell of burning rubbish,—rags. This first gave the alarm. The evidence was, therefore, quite material. The court sustained the objection to the existence of the burning rubbish on the 26th of July, on the ground that it was too remote in time. That was a question for the jury, and not for the court. No one would say that the time was so remote that it was absolutely impossible that a spark could be kept alive until the destruction of the building complained of. The ruling was clearly erroneous and injurious.

The court also erred in refusing to permit the defendant to show that the building owned by the witness Parsons was also insured. If the fact that the defendant's building was insured raised a presumption against him, it was competent to show that the person owning the building in which the fire first started had a like inducement to commit the crime.

A witness for the defendant (his wife) testified that the brandy and champagne were removed from the saloon because defendant expected certain persons who wished to buy the building and stock to inspect the same on the next day. Defendant offered to prove, in addition, the fact that two persons were expected to come upon that day, and did actually arrive upon the following day at Madera, pursuant to their appointment to inspect the building, with a view of making such purchase. The reason given why the removal was made under such circumstances was that whoever wished to buy the building and stock would want everything in sight thrown in, and would give no more for the property. The defendant should have been allowed to explain this act, which probably, more than any other, tended to cast suspicion upon him. It was for the jury to determine the truth and value of the explanation.

It is contended by the defense that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, and it was certainly very weak. I doubt if an unprejudiced jury would have found a verdict of guilty upon it; but it is not necessary to reverse the case for that reason, as there are other sufficient grounds. Judgment and order reversed.

HELLER et al. v. DYERVILLE MANUF'G CO. (S. F. 421.)

JUDGMENT—ACTION TO MODIFY—FRAUD—PLEADING—ADEQUATE REMEDY AT LAW.

1. A complaint to modify a decree in a prior suit for injunction and damages alleged that the parties filed a stipulation for judgment enjoining defendants therein, but without damages; that afterwards plaintiff's attorney in that suit, "for the purpose of cheating and defrauding these plaintiffs," prepared a decree which he represented to the judge "was in accordance with the stipulation"; that the judge relied on the representation and signed the decree, which was then filed, but not entered till nine months afterwards; that the decree was prepared without the knowledge of defendants therein, and that no copy was submitted to them; that no steps were taken under it for more than six months; that it was prepared and filed "for the purpose of defrauding these plaintiffs"; and that "thereby the defendant herein did obtain relief it was not entitled to." Held insufficient to show that the decree was procured by fraud.

2. A complaint to modify a decree on the ground that, as made, it was procured by fraud, is bad, where it shows that plaintiffs knew of the decree within the six months allowed by Code Civ. Proc. § 473, for moving to modify or vacate judgments.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Action by M. Heller & Sons against the Dyerville Manufacturing Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from orders refusing to vacate an injunction, and denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Edmund Tauszky, for appellant. Rothchild & Ach, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. This is a suit in equity brought in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco to secure the modification of a judgment theretofore entered in that court, upon the ground that it had been procured by fraud. The complaint alleges that in March, 1891, the present defendant, the Dyerville Manufacturing Company, brought an action in said superior court against M. Heller & Sons, the plaintiffs here, to enjoin the latter from pirating or infringing a certain trade-mark or label of said Dyerville Manufacturing Company, and for damages for an infringement already perpetrated; that thereafter, on August 3, 1891, the parties in that action entered into a stipulation in writing that judgment should be entered therein enjoining the defendants "as prayed for in the complaint," and for costs, but without damages; that afterwards, on August 7, 1891, the attorney for the plaintiff in that action, "for the purpose of cheating and defrauding these plaintiffs," presented to the judge before whom said action was pending a decree prepared by said attorney, which the latter represented to the judge "was in accordance with the stipulation"; that the judge relied upon such representation and signed said decree; and that the decree was thereupon, on said 7th day of August, filed, but was not entered until April 26, 1892. It is alleged that Heller & Sons, the defendants in that action, had no knowledge of the filing of said decree "until subsequent to the 26th of April, 1892"; that the same was prepared without their knowledge or that of their attorneys, and no copy thereof was submitted to them; that no steps were taken under said decree by the plaintiffs in that action, the defendants here, until more than six months after the same had been signed and filed; and that it was prepared and filed by the plaintiff in said cause and its attorney "for the purpose of defrauding these plaintiffs, and that therein and thereby the defendant herein did obtain relief it was not entitled to, either by the terms of its complaint or by the terms of said stipulation." The said decree is set out in hæc verba, and the complaint in that action is attached as an exhibit, and made a part of the complaint in this. The complaint further alleges,—what we regard as largely if not wholly immaterial here,—in substance, that since August 3, 1891, said Heller & Sons have not infringed said trade-mark or label, but that, notwithstanding, they were on July 29, 1892, cited to show cause why they should not be punished for violating the said decree, and that thereafter, on December 5, 1892, they were adjudged guilty of a violation thereof; that on December 10, 1892, they applied to the superior court in said action to modify the said decree "so that the same should comply with the stipulation" upon which it was entered, and that on January 6, 1893, the court made an order so modifying the decree; that from this order the plaintiff in that action took an appeal to this court, where the order was reversed on the sole ground that the application was not made within six months from the entry of the decree. It is finally alleged that plaintiffs have no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law, and that, unless defendant is restrained from enforcing said decree, plaintiffs will suffer irreparable damage, etc. Upon the filing of the complaint a preliminary injunction was issued, restraining defendants from enforcing said decree in the particular wherein it is sought to be modified. Defendant demurred to the complaint as not stating facts entitling plaintiffs to any relief, and subsequently moved to vacate the injunction upon the same ground. The demurrer was overruled, and the motion to vacate the injunction denied. Thereafter defendant answered, and upon the trial the court found the facts substantially as alleged in the complaint, upon which findings judgment was entered modifying said decree as prayed. Defendant appeals from the order refusing to vacate the injunction, and from the judgment and an order denying it a new trial.

The appeal from the judgment is the only one which we are called upon to consider, since we are satisfied that the complaint states no cause of action, or, in other words, no case for equitable intervention. In the first place, assuming for present purposes that the relief awarded by the decree sought to be modified transgressed that to which the plaintiff in that action was entitled under the stipulation of the parties, the averments of the complaint, taking as true all the issuable facts, fail to make out a case of fraud in its procurement. It is true, it is alleged, in general terms, that in procuring the decree certain things were done "for the purpose of cheating and defrauding these plaintiffs," and "that said decree was prepared and filed by the plaintiff in said cause and its said attorney for the purpose of defrauding these plaintiffs"; but the specific facts alleged to point and support these general assertions of fraud will not bear the construction thus sought to be put upon them. It is alleged that the representation was made to the judge that the decree was drawn "in accordance with the stipulation," but it is not alleged that such representation was made with intent to deceive, or that when made the attorney did not honestly believe it to be true. Since the pleading is to be construed most strongly against the pleader, it will be presumed, in the absence of an averment to the contrary, that the representation was without deceit, and with a belief in its truth. It is not even alleged in express terms, or otherwise than by implication or mere recital, that the representation was in fact false, and there is no pretense of any direct averment that the attorney knew or believed it to be so. It is averred that the judge, in signing the decree, relied on the representations of the attorney. But fraud cannot be predicated of a statement or representation made without knowledge of its falsity, or an intent to deceive thereby, however implicitly it may have been acted upon. In this case it appears from the decree that the precise words of the substantive part of the stipulation relied upon were recited therein, and also the fact that the stipulation itself was on file. There was thus presented to the judge the same means of knowing the truth of the representation made as that possessed by the party making it, and it must be presumed, the contrary not being averred, that the decree was read over and examined by the judge before attaching his signature thereto. The averment that the decree was signed on August 7, 1891, but not filed until April 26, 1892, is not pointed by any averment that this delay was intentional, or for the purpose or with the intent of concealing from plaintiffs any fact upon which their rights depended, or to thereby deprive them of any such right, or for any similar purpose, and that fact is therefore without significance as tending to show fraud. It is alleged that the decree was prepared and filed without the knowledge of plaintiffs, and was never submitted to them; that they had no knowledge of the same until after April 26, 1892; and that no step was taken by defendant to enforce it until more than six months after it had been filed. But it is not alleged that knowledge of the filing of the decree was intentionally withheld from them, nor that there was any reason in fact, as there was none in law, why defendant was required to serve them with a copy of the decree, or to notify them of the filing. There was nothing in the stipulation, which is also set out in the complaint, requiring it. It is not alleged that defendant by any act prevented the knowledge of said filing from being acquired by plaintiffs. The decree was placed upon the public records, to which they had access, and it was as much the duty of plaintiffs as of defendant to keep track of the case, and to see that a proper decree was entered. They could not be permitted to indulge the presumption that the taking of their stipulation for a decree was a mere idle ceremony, and that nothing further would be done by defendant in the action. The significance of the fact that defendant delayed action under the decree, as tending to show fraud, is not disclosed, nor is it apparent. In the absence of averment to the contrary, it will be presumed that no earlier occasion arose for invoking its protection. There is therefore nothing in the facts alleged to sustain the general averments of a fraudulent purpose in the manner of procuring the decree; and such general averments, standing alone, and unaccompanied by facts which in themselves disclose fraud, are insufficient to give the transaction even a colorable aspect of that nature. Such general averments are to be regarded as merely the conclusions of the pleader, embracing no issuable character, and not the averment of substantive facts, which are admitted by the demurrer. Harris v. Taylor, 15 Cal. 349; Oroville & V. R. Co. v. Supervisors of Plumas Co., 37 Cal. 363; Bank v. Hynes, 50 Cal. 202; Pehrson v. Hewitt, 79 Cal. 598, 21 Pac. 950. As said by the supreme court of the United States in passing upon the sufficiency of a bill of similar construction: "It is full of the words 'fraudulent' and 'corrupt,' and general charges of conspiracy and violation of trust obligations. Mere words, in and of themselves, and even as qualifying adjectives of more specific charges, are not sufficient grounds of equity jurisprudence, unless the transactions to which they refer are such as, in their essential nature, constitute a fraud or a breach of trust for which a court of chancery can give relief." Van Weel v. Winston, 115 U. S. 237, 238, 6 Sup. Ct. 22. See, also, Fogg v. Blair, 139 U. S. 127, 11 Sup. Ct. 476.

In the next place, we think the complaint discloses a case in which plaintiffs had a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law, and in such case there is no occasion to resort to equity, and it will not be permitted. Ketchum v. Crippen, 37 Cal. 223; Eldred v. White, 102 Cal. 600, 36 Pac. 944. The judgment was entered April 26, 1892. Plaintiffs aver that they had no notice of this fact until "subsequent to April 26, 1892," but this, under a proper construction of the pleading, is equivalent to the averment that they had such knowledge immediately after that date,—as early as April 27th, if need be. Collins v. Townsend, 58 Cal. 614. Furthermore, it appears that they, at all events, had actual knowledge on July 29, 1892, on which date they were served with an order to show cause why they should not be held guilty of a violation of the decree. Even the latter date was well within the six months from the entry of the decree, within which, under section 473, Code Civ. Proc., they could have moved for its modification or vacation. The fact that, under a misapprehension of their rights, they failed to take advantage of this remedy until too late, affords no ground for equitable relief.

For these reasons, the complaint was bad, and it is unnecessary to consider the further objection that the complaint does not show that any excessive relief was in fact awarded by the decree. As the complaint stated no cause of action, it constituted no proper basis for the injunction, and the motion to vacate should have been granted, and the demurrer should have been sustained. The judgment and orders appealed from are reversed, with instructions to vacate the injunction and sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

NEW TRIAL—TIME FOR MOTION.

1. Time for motion for new trial, which Code Civ. Proc. § 659, provides shall be within 10 days after filing of findings, is not extended by motion to modify and set aside findings; they not having been modified, changed, or added to.

2. An order staying judgment till determination of motion to set aside findings does not extend time to move for new trial.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 659, declaring that a motion for new trial must be within 10 days "after notice of the decision," formal notice of the decision is not necessary, but it is enough that the moving party had actual notice thereof.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. W. Henshaw, Judge.

Action by the California Improvement Company against Mary Baroteau and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chickering, Thomas & Gregory (Chas. Harding Tubbs, of counsel), for appellant. J. W. Goodwin, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The notice of the motion for a new trial is based alone upon "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision," and all the questions raised by the appellant rest upon the insufficiency of the evidence. Respondents contend that there can be here no review of the evidence, because (1) the appeal from the judgment was not taken until more than 60 days after it was rendered; and (2) that appellant's notice of intention to move for a new trial was not given in time. Both of these contentions must be sustained. As to the appeal from the judgment, it clearly appears, and is not denied, that it was not taken until more than 60 days after the rendition of the judgment. The facts as to the notice of intention to move for a new trial are as follows: The findings, which constitute the decision, were filed May 12, 1894. Three days afterwards, to wit, on May 15th, the appellant served and filed a notice of a motion, as follows: "That, the court having filed its findings in this case, plaintiff moves the court to modify and set aside the findings of fact and conclusions of law based thereon, to wit." The notice stated that this motion would be made on the 21st of May, 1894, or as soon thereafter as counsel could be heard. On the 4th of June, 1894, the said motion was heard by the court and denied. Thereafter, on the 11th day of June, 1894, the appellant served and filed his notice of intention to move for a new trial. This was, of course, much more than the 10 days prescribed by section 659, Code Civ. Proc., after the filing of the findings, and was clearly too late. The right to move for a new trial is statutory, and must be pursued in the manner pointed out by the statute. Burton v. Todd, 68 Cal. 489, 9 Pac. 663. The position of appellant, that the motion to modify and set aside the findings extended the statutory period within which a motion for a new trial must be made, is not tenable. If that were so, a party could always extend the time, at his own volition, by giving notice of motion to modify. In this case the findings filed on the 12th of May were never modified or changed in any respect, nor were any new findings ever made; and it is clear that the time for moving for a new trial commenced to run from the date of the filing of said findings. This same principle was applied in Shinn v. Cummins, 65 Cal. 97, 3 Pac. 133, where it was held that "the pendency of defendant's motion to dismiss, vacate, and set aside the pretended service of summons and copy of complaint" did not extend the time specified in the summons for answering the complaint. In the case at bar the judgment was not entered until after the determination of the said motion to set aside the findings, and it is stated in plaintiff's brief that the entering of the judgment was stayed by an order of the court until after the determination of said motion to set aside the findings; and, although we do not observe any statement of that fact in the record, still, if it were so, an order suspending the judgment does not extend the statutory time within which a motion for a new trial must be made.

The appellant contends that there was no notice served on him of the filing of the findings, and that, therefore, the time for making a motion for a new trial had not expired when such motion was made; but section 659 provides now only that the motion must be made within 10 days "after notice of the decision," and it has been definitely settled that, where it appears affirmatively that the party moving for a new trial had actual notice of the decision, no formal service of a written notice is necessary. Gray v. Winder, 77 Cal. 525, 20 Pac. 47; Mullally v. Society, 69 Cal. 559, 11 Pac. 215; Wall v. Heald, 95 Cal. 365, 30 Pac. 551; Dow v. Ross, 90 Cal. 562, 27 Pac. 409. Of course, where a party in whose favor a decision is made has not given formal notice of such decision, and there is a conflict of evidence as to whether the other party had actual knowledge of the same, this court would not look very closely into such evidence; but where, as in the case at bar, a party makes formal written motion to set aside findings, reciting in his motion that the court had filed the same, he will not be heard to say that he had no notice of such findings. Appellant relies somewhat upon Biagi v. Howes, 66 Cal. 469, 6 Pac. 100. That case, however, seems to have been based upon the authority of cases where there was a statutory provision that there must be a written notice of the decision, and upon that ground it was distinguished from the other cases upon the subject in the opinion of the court in Mullally v. Society, 69 Cal. 559, 11 Pac. 215; and, if it cannot be so distinguished, it must be held as overruled by the later decisions above cited. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS—INSTRUCTIONS—DAMAGES—MEASURE—EXCESSIVENESS—NEW TRIAL—APPEAL—REVIEW.

1. Whether a jury rendered their verdict through passion or prejudice is determinable from the evidence without any showing of extrinsic facts.

2. The fact that there was no conflict in the evidence as to the circumstances which the jury had a right to regard in fixing the damages for death by negligence does not preclude the verdict being set aside as excessive.

3. The measure of damages for the death of a man 69 years old, more or less debilitated, and without permanent employment, being the amount that he would in reasonable probability have earned during the rest of his life, minus his probable personal expenses, it was not an abuse of discretion to set aside as excessive a verdict rendered on the theory that deceased's life expectancy would be fully realized, that he would continue to the end with the same earning capacity he had at his death, that he would have constant employment, and that it would never be interrupted by sickness.

4. The rule that the court cannot set aside a verdict as excessive, except when it is so grossly disproportionate to the measure of damages as to raise a presumption of passion or prejudice, does not apply on appeal from the setting aside of a verdict as excessive.

5. Where a car stopped suddenly in the middle of a street intersection, and a wagon crossing at the intersection collided therewith, it was relevant to the question of negligence that in stopping where it did the car company violated an ordinance.

6. The result of an autopsy on the body of one for whose death an action is brought is not privileged (Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 4) as "information acquired in attending the patient which was necessary to enable [the physician] to prescribe or act for the patient."

7. The personal representative of a deceased patient cannot waive the privilege created by Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 4, providing that a physician "cannot, without the consent of his patient, be examined, in a civil action," as to information acquired in attending the patient.

8. A charge that the measure of damages was the amount which deceased would probably have earned in the nine years "which it appears he had yet to live," according to mortality tables in evidence, which the jury might take "into consideration, as they are part of the proof that he might have lived that long," did not virtually tell the jury that the tables established that deceased would have lived nine years.

9. A charge as to measure of damages that the jury should consider "(a) pecuniary loss, if any, suffered by the heirs of the deceased through his death; (b) also the relations proved as existing between the deceased and such heirs at the time of his death, and the injury, if any, sustained by them by his death,"—might have misled the jury into the error of supposing that they could, on account of the widow and children being deprived of the comfort, society, and protection of deceased, include something more than pecuniary loss.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Joseph N. Harrison, administrator, against the Sutter Street-Railway Company and the National Brewing Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order granting a new trial plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William H. Jordan, for appellant. Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, Marcus Rosenthal, and Dunne & McPike, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. Plaintiff had verdict and judgment against defendants for $8,000, as damages suffered by the heirs of his intestate through the death of the latter, resulting from injuries received in a collision between a car of the railroad company, on which he was a passenger, and a wagon of the brewing company, occasioned by the negligence of the defendants. The court below granted defendants a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was excessive; and the plaintiff appeals from such order, urging that it was wholly unwarranted under the evidence, and was an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court.

Certain preliminary objections are interposed by defendants, and reasons suggested why the order appealed from cannot be reviewed; but these objections, while possibly possessed of some merit, being purely technical, and the court being of opinion that the order must be affirmed on the merits, it will prove more satisfactory to both parties, and more in accord with the disposition of the court, to so dispose of the appeal.

That the granting of a new trial is a thing resting so largely in the discretion of the trial court that its action in that regard will not be disturbed except upon the disclosure of a manifest and unmistakable abuse, has become axiomatic, and requires no citation of authority in its support. It is true that such discretion is not a right to the exertion of the mere personal or arbitrary will of the judge, but is a power governed by fixed rules of law, and to be reasonably exercised within those rules, to the accomplishment of justice. But, so long as a case made presents an instance showing a reasonable, or even fairly debatable, justification under the law for the action taken, such action will not be here set aside, even if, as a question of first impression, we might feel inclined to take a different view from that of the court below as to the propriety of its action. More especially is this true where, as here, the question rests largely in fact, and involves the proper deduction to be drawn from the evidence. The opportunities of the trial court in such instances for reaching just conclusions are, as a general thing, so superior to our own that we will not presume to set our judgment against that of the former where there appears any reasonable room for difference.

Appellant does not seriously question the correctness of these principles, but he contends that the record does not disclose a proper case for their application. He contends that there was no room for the exercise of discretion; that the evidence as to the amount of damages suffered was wholly without conflict; that there was nothing to indicate passion or prejudice, except the amount of the verdict itself; and that there was no showing, by affidavit or otherwise, of any improper conduct on the part of the jury. As to the last suggestion, it is impertinent to the inquiry. Granting a new trial for the misconduct of the jury, such as may be shown by affidavit, is something wholly different and apart from the right which the statute gives to grant such relief on the ground of excessive damages. The former contemplates some overt act of impropriety, such as receiving evidence out of court, reaching a verdict by chance, and the like; while an excessive verdict implies no misconduct of the jury necessarily, but simply that the result has been induced through excited feelings or prejudice, of which the jury may not, perhaps, have been even aware, but which has, nevertheless, precluded an impartial consideration of the evidence. Whether the verdict is excessive is to be determined solely from a consideration of the evidence in the case, and whether it will fairly sustain the conclusion of the jury,—a question which cannot be aided by the showing of extrinsic facts, by affidavit or otherwise.

As to the suggestion that the evidence touching "the amount of damages" was without conflict, we are not wholly certain that we appreciate exactly what counsel means. There was no evidence given as to the amount of the damages suffered. The damages sued for were in their nature unliquidated, and no witness pretended to fix the precise amount plaintiff should recover. We presume counsel means that the evidence as to the circumstances which the jury had a right to regard in determining the award of damages, such as age, condition in life, etc., of deceased, was without conflict. But, if this were true, which we do not think can be fairly said, the question as to the proper deduction and conclusion to be drawn from such evidence would still remain for the jury, and whether their consideration of the evidence for this purpose was influenced by passion or prejudice would not necessarily be affected by the fact that the evidence was without conflict. A jury, if excited by prejudice, might as readily award unjust damages where the evidence was uncontradicted as where it was in sharp conflict. The evidence tended to show that deceased was about 69 years of age, but his physical appearance would seem to have indicated more advanced years. Dr. Dorr, one of his physicians, testified that he looked older, that he appeared between 75 and 80 years of age; while Dr. O'Brien, a physician who examined him on behalf of one of the defendants, after the accident and before his death, testified that he considered him a debilitated man; that in his judgment the result of the injury would not have been serious but for his age and debility. According to the testimony of his widow, his health was very good, but he had suffered all his life from sick headache, for which she had been required to nurse him. His income was about $110 per month,—that is, it did not appear that he was in steady or permanent employment, but the evidence tended to show that he was an expert accountant, who straightened out books and tangled accounts when called upon, and that his earnings averaged that sum monthly. According to the Carlisle Mortality Tables, he had an expectancy or probable lease of life of a fraction over nine years and a half. He had dependent on him a wife and an adult unmarried daughter. Upon these facts the jury were instructed, as to the question of damages, in effect, that they should estimate and determine the amount that the deceased would in all reasonable probability have earned in the years yet remaining to him; and, deducting from this the amount which he would reasonably require for his own personal use and maintenance, give a verdict which would pecuniarily compensate the heirs. It is conceded that this instruction gave the correct rule for the guidance of the jury.

In view of this evidence, and the rule of compensation by which the jury were to be governed, we think it quite manifest that we would not be justified in holding that there was an abuse of discretion in setting aside the verdict. The jury would seem to have proceeded upon the theory that the deceased's expectancy of life would be fully realized, and that he would continue to the end with the same earning capacity as that possessed by him at the time of his death, for their verdict implies that he would have earned, over and above the amount required for his personal needs, the large net sum of $8,000. And this would necessarily contemplate constant employment, without interruption from sickness or other cause, and with a rate of earnings in no way diminished; since it will readily be perceived that, according to his income, his utmost gross earnings in the given time would not have exceeded $12,000. Such a result does not accord with ordinary human experience. The deceased's expectancy of life was not a certainty, but a mere probability. It is true he might have lived longer, but the chances were much against it. He might also have retained his vigor and ability to labor to the last, but ordinary experience teaches that the weight of advancing years after the age attained by deceased bears strongly against such result. Under these circumstances we do not think it should be said that the conclusion of the trial judge was without support in the evidence. But appellant urges that it is only where the verdict is so grossly disproportionate to any reasonable limit of compensation warranted by the facts as to shock the sense of justice, and raise at once a strong presumption that it is based on prejudice or passion rather than sober judgment, that the judge is at liberty to interpose his judgment as against that of the jury; and that such an instance is not shown. The rule invoked is correct, as addressed to the function of the trial court, or when asking this court to set aside the verdict where it has been refused by the court below. But when we are asked to review the act of that court, where, in the exercise of its discretionary power, it has seen fit to set aside the verdict on this ground, a very different rule prevails. Every intendment is to be indulged here in support of the action of the court below, and, as elsewhere suggested, it will not be disturbed if the question of its propriety be open to debate.

Among the grounds urged by defendants in support of their motion was that of errors of law occurring at the trial. Some of the exceptions under this head we deem material, and, as they were not noticed by the court below, and the cause is to be retried, the parties are entitled to have them considered. The collision of the two vehicles occurred at a street crossing in the city of San Francisco. The street car was stopped suddenly in its progress, near the middle of the intersection, and the brewery wagon, coming rapidly down a grade on the side street, collided with the car. There was evidence having a tendency to show that, had the car not stopped where and when it did, the collision might have been avoided. This being the case, the defendant brewing company offered in evidence, as against its co-defendant, a municipal ordinance of said city forbidding the stopping of street cars upon any street crossing or cross walk so as in any manner to obstruct travel thereon, except where the grade of the street is such as not to admit of stopping at the further crossing. This evidence was objected to by the railway company, and excluded. The ruling was erroneous. Evidence that the party was acting in violation or neglect of a statute or ordinance regulating the mode of conducting vehicles is always admissible in such a case, as tending to show neglect in the one guilty of the omission. In this instance the evidence bore directly upon the one material question arising as between the defendants,—as to which one caused the collision; and its exclusion was, therefore, prejudicial error.

Plaintiff contends that the ruling did no injury, because it appeared that the stopping of the car was the best thing to do. But whether this was so was for the jury, since the fact was not admitted.

Dr. O'Brien was called by defendants, in rebuttal, upon the question whether the injuries to the deceased were the inducing cause of death. The witness had made a medical examination of deceased after the accident at the instance of the brewing company, and an autopsical examination of the body after death. The court permitted him to give the results of the medical examination, but excluded his testimony as to what was disclosed by the autopsy, upon the theory that the latter was not admissible, under subdivision 4 of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides: "A licensed physician or surgeon cannot, without the consent of his patient, be examined in a civil action as to any information acquired in attending the patient which was necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient." The evidence does not fall within the inhibition of that provision. A dead man is not a "patient," capable of sustaining the relation of confidence towards his physician which is the foundation of the rule given in the statute, but is a mere piece of senseless clay, which has passed beyond the reach of human prescription, medical or otherwise. Moreover, the deceased had not, in life, been the patient of Dr. O'Brien. Freel v. Railway Co., 97 Cal. 40, 31 Pac. 730. The evidence was competent, and, being relevant to the issue, should have been admitted. The testimony which the witness was permitted to give did not cover all that the defendants were entitled to show by the witness.

Defendants excepted to the admission of the testimony of the attending physicians of deceased, to the effect that in their opinion the injuries caused his death; that opinion being based upon facts ascertained by them during such medical attendance. It is contended by respondents that this evidence was within the rule of exclusion announced by the provisions of section 1881, above quoted, and was inadmissible. Under the principles announced in Re Flint's Estate, 100 Cal. 391, 34 Pac. 863, the evidence should have been excluded. While the precise question here presented—whether, after the death of the patient, his legal representative may waive the objection which the statute gives, in terms, to the patient alone—was not there directly decided, it was, nevertheless, fully considered and discussed, and the meaning of the statute in that regard very clearly indicated in the following language: "The question of waiver of the privilege by the personal representative or heir of the deceased is a new one in this state, but the statute of New York bearing upon this matter is similar to the provision of our Code of Civil Procedure, and the decisions of the courts of that state furnish us ample light in the form of precedent. The Code of Civil Procedure of New York (section 836) provides that the privilege is present unless 'expressly waived by the patient.' The California provision contains the words, 'without the consent of his patient.' It will thus be seen that the provisions are, in effect, the same. The courts of New York, under this clause of the statute, have uniformly held that the patient alone can waive the privilege, and when such patient is dead the matter is forever closed. Westover v. Insurance Co., 99 N. Y. 56, 1 N. E. 104; Renihan v. Dennin, 103 N. Y. 573, 9 N. E. 320; Loder v. Whelpley, 111 N. Y. 239, 18 N. E. 374. The decisions of the appellate courts of Michigan, Missouri, and Indiana support respondent's position in this regard. Morris v. Morris, 119 Ind. 341, 21 N. E. 918; Groll v. Tower, 85 Mo. 249; Thompson v. Ish, 99 Mo. 160, 12 S. W. 510; Fraser v. Jennison, 42 Mich. 206, 3 N. W. 882. But the statutes of those states regarding privileged communications vary quite materially from those of New York and California, and, as it said in Thompson v. Ish, 99 Mo. 160, 12 S. W. 510: 'The difference in the statutes may well cause the difference in the rule laid down in New York and Missouri.'" This construction is not unreasonable in view of the peculiar terms of our statute, and is undoubtedly fully supported by the New York authorities referred to in the case just cited; and, since our statute seems to be framed largely after that of New York, the construction given the latter by the courts of that state should have great weight with us in interpreting the meaning of our own.

The court charged the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to "recover the reasonable amount which Mr. Harrison would probably have earned in the nine or ten years which it appears he had yet to live, according to these tables in evidence, and which are also a guide. You may take them into consideration, as they are part of the proof that he might have lived that long." It is objected by defendants that this was virtually telling the jury that the Carlisle Tables established the fact that deceased would have lived nine or ten years. We hardly think the instruction would be so understood, but yet the language is not as clear as it should have been. The jury should have been instructed that in determining the probable length of life the deceased would have enjoyed they were entitled to consider these mortality or expectancy tables as evidence bearing on that question and as tending to show the ordinary experience in like cases.

The jury were also instructed that in determining the amount of damages plaintiff should recover they should consider: "(a) The pecuniary loss, if any, suffered by the heirs of the deceased through his death; (b) also the relations proved as existing between the deceased and such heirs at the time of his death, and the injury, if any, sustained by them by his death." This instruction was too general and indefinite, and was calculated to confuse the jury. Such an instruction should be more carefully limited. Morgan v. Southern Pac. Co., 95 Cal. 510, 30 Pac. 601; Pepper v.

Southern Pac. Co., 105 Cal. 401, 402, 38 Pac. 974. While the jury have the right in such a case to consider the loss suffered by the widow in being deprived of the comfort, society, and protection of her husband, they can regard these things only for the purpose of fixing the pecuniary value of his life. The form of the instruction here was calculated to lead the jury into the error of supposing that they could, on this account, add something more than pecuniary loss. The instruction, while somewhat similar, is less guarded than in Beeson v. Mining Co., 57 Cal. 37. Order granting new trial affirmed.

CORPORATIONS—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS—ENFORCING LIABILITY UNDER STATUTES OF ANOTHER STATE—DEFINITION OF "RAILROAD CORPORATIONS."

1. Const. Kan. art. 12, § 2, secures debts of certain corporations by the individual liability of the stockholders to an amount equal to their stock; and Gen. St. Kan. § 1192, enacted to carry into effect such provision, provides that, after the return of an execution on a judgment against a corporation unsatisfied, execution may, on motion and notice, issue against any of the stockholders to the amount of their stock, together with any amount unpaid thereon, or "the plaintiff in the execution may proceed by action to charge the stockholders with the amount of his judgment." Held, that the liability of a stockholder under such provisions is one of contract, and is not penal, and an action to enforce it may be maintained under the latter clause in the courts of another state having jurisdiction of such stockholder, without first obtaining a judgment against the corporation in such state, but based upon the judgment and return of execution in Kansas.

2. The provision of Const. Kan. art. 12, § 2, excepting the stockholders of "railroad corporations" from the individual liability for corporate debts thereby imposed on stockholders of other corporations for profit, does not include stockholders in street-railroad corporations.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Action by William Ferguson against M. H. Sherman and others to enforce a liability as stockholders in a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Bicknell & Trask, J. S. Chapman, and John D. Pope, for appellants. Wells, Monroe & Lee, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying a new trial. Plaintiff pleaded that the defendant the Electric Rapid Transit Company was a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Kansas, and that it was not a railway, religious, or charitable corporation. He further alleged a judgment obtained against the corporation in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kansas for the sum of $7,717.50, together with costs; that he caused execution to be issued out of the court, to be levied upon the property of the Electric Rapid Transit Company, which execution was thereafter in due time returned wholly unsatisfied. Then follows, in appropriate language, an averment to the effect that, under the constitution and laws of Kansas, if any execution shall have been issued against the property or effects of a corporation, except a railway or religious or charitable corporation, and there cannot be found any property whereon to levy such execution, then execution may be issued against any of the stockholders to an extent equal in amount to the amount of stock by him or her owned, together with any amount unpaid, or the plaintiff in the execution may proceed by action to charge the stockholders with the amount of his judgment, and such plaintiff may maintain an action at law against any one or more of the stockholders of such corporation to recover a debt due by the corporation. The defendants other than the Electric Rapid Transit Company are sued as stockholders of that corporation. The action, then, is an effort upon the part of the judgment creditor of the Kansas corporation to enforce against California stockholders their statutory liability for the judgment debt.

1. On the trial the provisions of the Kansas constitution and statutes bearing upon the questions were introduced in evidence. Section 2 of article 12 of that constitution provides as follows: "Dues from corporations shall be secured by individual liability of the stockholders to an additional amount equal to the stock owned by each stockholder, and such other means as shall be provided by law, but such individual liabilities shall not apply to railroad corporations, nor corporations for religious or charitable purposes." Section 1192, art. 4, c. 23, of the Statutes of Kansas, under the title of "Corporations" and the subtitle of "Miscellaneous Provisions," is as follows: "If any execution shall have been issued against the property or effects of a corporation, except a railway or a religious or a charitable corporation, and there cannot be found any property whereon to levy such execution, then execution may be issued against any of the stockholders to an extent equal in amount to the amount of stock by him or her owned, together with any amount unpaid thereon; but no execution shall issue against any stockholder, except upon an order of the court in which the action, suit or other proceeding shall have been brought or instituted, made upon motion in open court, after reasonable notice in writing to the person or persons sought to be charged; and upon such motion, such court may order execution to issue accordingly; or the plaintiff in the execution may proceed by action to charge the stockholders with the amount of his judg- ment." Plaintiff's action is admittedly an attempt to charge the stockholders under the italicized portion of the statute above quoted. Appellants' contention is that all of the provisions of this act contemplate special statutory remedies given by the laws of another state, and not consonant with the laws and procedure of this state, and that such liability cannot be enforced in this action. It is undoubtedly true that penalties and special remedies provided by the laws of a state will receive no extraterritorial recognition, and may not be imported into the courts of another state. That question has recently received careful consideration at the hands of this court, and it is necessary to do no more than refer to the case of Russell v. Railway Co., 113 Cal. 258, 45 Pac. 323. Upon the other hand, it is equally true that when a statutory liability is not in its nature penal, and does not depend upon remedies whose enforcement is peculiar to the courts of the state which has created the law,—where, in short, the statutory liability is a simple personal liability growing out of the contract of the shareholder,—that liability may be enforced wherever jurisdiction over the particular shareholder may be obtained. It is to be considered, then, whether the statute of Kansas above quoted, in creating the specific liability, designates a mode for its enforcement which may not be exercised without the jurisdiction of its courts, or whether it merely provides for a personal liability, enforceable in an action at law in any of the courts of sister states possessing common-law jurisdiction. It will be noted that the statute in question offers a two-fold remedy to the judgment creditor of a corporation whose execution has been returned nulla bona. It first provides a remedy peculiar to the laws of Kansas and unenforceable in other forums. The second is embraced in the portion of the statute which has been italicized. That this language empowers the judgment creditor to maintain his action at law against a shareholder wherever he may be found, and to do this without first obtaining a judgment against the Kansas corporation in the courts of the state where the statutory liability of the shareholder is sought to be enforced, we entertain no doubt; and, if doubt were to be entertained, the numerous and uniform decisions of the supreme court of Kansas, of the federal courts, and of the courts of sister states, so interpreting this clause, would be sufficient to remove it.

In Howell v. Manglesdorf, 33 Kan. 194, 5 Pac. 759, the court had under review this statute, and, interpreting it, said: "It will be observed that two remedies for enforcing the individual liability of stockholders are prescribed in the statute above quoted. In the one case the judgment creditor of an insolvent corporation may proceed by a summary action on a motion in the court where the judgment was rendered against the corporation; in the other, by an ordinary action, to be instituted wherever personal jurisdiction of the stockholders can be acquired. * * * This ruling does not debar a creditor of the insolvent corporation of a remedy against the stockholder residing in another state, and upon whom service cannot be obtained here. While the liability is statutory, it is one which arises upon the contract of subscription to the capital stock of the corporation, and an action to enforce the same is transitory, and may be brought in any court of general jurisdiction in the state where personal service can be made upon the stockholder. Flash v. Conn, 109 U. S. 371, 3 Sup. Ct. 263; Dennick v. Railroad Co., 103 U. S. 11; McDonough v. Phelps, 15 How. Prac. 372; Seymour v. Sturgess, 26 N. Y. 134." To like effect are the cases of Hentig v. James, 22 Kan. 326, and McClelland v. Cragun, 54 Kan. 601, 38 Pac. 776. In the federal courts, also, the same statute, and the rights of litigants under it, have been frequently the subject of consideration. Thus, in Bank v. Rindge, 57 Fed. 279, the suit was an action at law by a judgment creditor of a Kansas banking corporation against the defendant, as a stockholder in that corporation, to enforce the stockholder's liability under the statute in question. It was held that the action would lie; that, under the interpretation given to the law by the Kansas courts, the stockholder's statutory liability was in the nature of a contract of guaranty; and that a judgment creditor might proceed against the stockholder accordingly. Such, also, was the decision of the federal courts in Rhodes v. Bank, 66 Fed. 512, and McVickar v. Jones, 70 Fed. 754. The same law has passed under the review of the supreme court of Missouri in the case of Guerney v. Moore, 131 Mo. 650, 32 S. W. 1132. It was there held that the judgment creditor might proceed by an ordinary action at law against the stockholder wherever personal jurisdiction of the stockholder could be obtained, and that the statute of Kansas was the measure of the stockholder's liability. Bank v. Rindge, 154 Mass. 203, 27 N. E. 1015, is relied on by appellants as being in opposition to these authorities. In that case the supreme court of Massachusetts regretted that under the pleadings it was not at liberty to determine the case upon an examination of the statute of Kansas, with the assistance of any construction which might have been put upon it by the courts of that state; but, being unable so to do, it held that in the commonwealth of Massachusetts it was well settled that the courts had declined to exercise jurisdiction to enforce a liability imposed upon stockholders in corporations established in other states under statutes of those states. But in the later case of Bank v. Ellis (Mass.) 44 N. E. 349 (decided in 1896), the court, stating that the facts alleged in that case were different from those presented in Bank v. Rindge, supra, receded from its former position, and retained an action such as the one here at bar, brought against a stockholder under the Kansas statute, and there declared "that the liability of the stockholders must be determined according to the laws of Kansas." It may therefore be concluded, with much certainty, that under the Kansas statute the liability is in contract, and is not penal; that the rights of the judgment creditor and the reciprocal rights and duties of the stockholder are measured by this statute, and that under the law the creditor who has obtained judgment in Kansas against a corporation, upon which judgment and execution has been issued and returned nulla bona, may pursue the stockholder in an action at law wherever jurisdiction of his person may be obtained, and secure judgment against him; that he may sue one or many of the stockholders; that he may take judgment against them without first having obtained judgment against the corporation in the state in which his action against the stockholders is commenced; and that the measure of the individual stockholder's liability is the face value of his shares, together with the amount of his unpaid subscription thereon. Flash v. Conn, 109 U. S. 371, 3 Sup. Ct. 263; Hoyt v. Bunker, 50 Kan. 574, 32 Pac. 126; Bagley v. Tyler, 43 Mo. App. 195; Aldrich v. Development Co. (Or.) 32 Pac. 756; Dennick v. Railroad Co., 103 U. S. 18; Paine v. Stewart, 33 Conn. 516.

2. It is next contended by appellants that the Electric Rapid Transit Company, organized under the laws of Kansas, is a railroad corporation, and that its stockholders are therefore relieved from all liability under the constitution of the state. The provision of the constitution bearing upon the question has been quoted. We approach its consideration with reluctance, for the provision has not received judicial interpretation in this regard from the supreme court of Kansas, and it must needs be embarrassing for the courts of another state to be called upon in the first instance to put their own interpretations upon the constitutional provisions of a sister state. There are certain considerations, however, which will go far towards the elucidation of the question, so far as affects this corporation. It may be safely said that the privilege held out to stockholders of railroad corporations organized under the laws of Kansas was not designed as an invitation to foreigners or citizens of other states to take advantage of the Kansas laws, and thus secure immunity to themselves, while equipping and operating railroads entirely without the boundaries of the state. Agriculture was and is one of the most important industries of Kansas. Cheap transportation and a ready market are essential to agricultural success. This the framers of the Kansas constitution well knew, and it is not unreasonable to infer that the exemption held out to stockholders of railroad corporations organized under the laws of Kansas was designed to prompt and stimulate the building of railroads within the state, in aid of one of its greatest industries. It is not so easy to believe that the purpose of that constitution was to exempt from liability the stockholders of street railways, which are designed merely to facilitate travel and communication upon the public highways of a municipality, while at the same time the stockholders of mercantile, manufacturing, and banking corporations, which corporations certainly tend as much to the public convenience and welfare as do street-railroad corporations, should be held to strict accountability. We recognize that the word "railroad" or "railway," as used in a law, is broad enough to include street railroads, and that many cases have arisen where the courts have held that the word does, in its signification, include such corporations; but, when all has been said, each case has been determined upon its own facts, having in view the circumstances of the case, the context, the presumed intention of the lawmakers, and the general policy of the particular state in regard to the matter; and therefore, while a large number of cases may be cited in which the courts have held that the statutes under consideration dealing with "railroads" embraced in their provisions street railroads, an equal number could be instanced in which the courts have, under the facts of the case, narrowed and limited the application of the statute, and held that street railroads were not included. It would be difficult, if not impossible, to formulate any rule to govern the determination. In this state the difficulty is much relieved by the distinction which our Codes make between railroad corporations proper and street-railroad corporations. This consideration, however, is entitled to weight. The exemption from liability of stockholders of railroad corporations under the constitution of Kansas is an immunity in the nature of a grant or privilege. There is no rule of construction which make it mandatory upon a court to hold that "railroad" must include street railroads, and, upon the principle that all grants from the state are construed most strongly in favor of the grantor, it would certainly be proper in this case, no reason to the contrary being shown, to narrow rather than to broaden the meaning of the word, and to limit its applicability to the one class which is necessarily embraced within the term; and we therefore conclude that the provision of the constitution of Kansas here under consideration was not designed to apply to stockholders of street-railroad corporations. In consonance with this view, it is said by the learned authors of the Law of Incorporated Companies (1 Foote & E. Incorp. Cos. p. 668, note): "Whether any of the statutes relating to railways apply to street railways is an undetermined question. It is a question which arises again and again, as can readily be imagined, since the statutes have very little to say about street railways. Still, for various reasons, it is believed that the great body of railroad legislation of this state does not apply to street railways." The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

FASSETT v. WISE et al. (Sac. 9.)

For majority opinion, see 47 Pac. 47.

GAROUTTE, J. (dissenting). The facts may be stated briefly as follows: (1) On March 14, 1894, plaintiff's mortgage was executed, and at that date the mortgagor resided in Kings county, and the mortgaged property was also there situated. (2) The mortgaged property was thereafter, on April 3, 1894, and before the mortgage was recorded anywhere, removed to the county of Tulare, where it was attached by the defendants, on April 28, 1894, after plaintiff's mortgage had been recorded in the county of Kings, but before its recordation in the county of Tulare. (3) After such attachment, and on April 30, 1894, plaintiff's mortgage was duly recorded in the county of Tulare, where the mortgaged property then was.

Upon the foregoing statement of facts, the only question presented is, was the mortgage of plaintiff recorded in the manner required by law, before the levy of the attachment under which the defendants justify? for, if it was so recorded, then plaintiff is entitled to a judgment upon the findings. And the solution of this question is dependent upon the true construction of two sections of the Civil Code. These sections read:

"Sec. 2959. A mortgage of personal property must be recorded in the office of the county recorder of the county in which the mortgagor resides, and also in the county in which the property mortgaged is situated, or to which it may be removed."

"Sec. 2965. When personal property mortgaged is thereafter by the mortgagor removed from the county in which it is situated, it is, except as between the parties to the mortgage, exempted from the operation thereof, unless either,

"(1) The mortgagee, within thirty days after such removal causes the mortgage to be recorded in the county to which the property has been removed; or,

"(2) The mortgagee, within thirty days after such removal, takes possession of the property as prescribed in the next section."

A fair construction of section 2959 is that the mortgage must be recorded in the county where the mortgagor resides at the time of its execution; and, if the property is situated in a different county at that time, then the mortgage must also be recorded in the county where the property is then situated. Jones on Chattel Mortgages (section 251) says: "It is the place of residence of the mortgagor at the time the mortgage is executed, and not his place of residence at the time it is recorded or filed, that determines the place where it should be recorded or filed." Cobbey on Chattel Mortgages (section 573) says: "The place of residence at the time it is executed, and not at the time it is filed, is what governs." While the text of these writers is not fully borne out by cases they have cited, owing to the peculiar language of the various statutes under which these decisions were made, I think the general principle they have stated entirely sound; and the case of Bank v. Weed, 89 Mich. 357, 50 N. W. 864, supports such a construction of our statute. We have statutes authorizing chattel mortgages in nearly every state in the Union. About one-half of these statutes provide, in terms, that the mortgage must be recorded where the mortgagor resides at the time the mortgage is executed, while the remainder are couched in language similar to our own. There does not appear to be a single statute of them all that in terms requires the mortgage to be recorded in the county where the mortgagor resides at the time the mortgage is recorded. And in the decision of many cases under similar statutes, from other states, the courts appear to assume without question that the residence of the mortgagor and location of the mortgaged property at the date of the execution of the mortgage are the all-controlling elements.

It necessarily follows from the foregoing that the fact of the mortgage not having been recorded in Kings county until after the sheep were removed to Tulare county is immaterial. That portion of section 2965 here involved means that the mortgagee had 30 days from such removal within which to record his mortgage in the county to which the property is removed, and that he loses no rights if he records his mortgage within that time. In the present case the mortgage was recorded in Kings county—the county in which the mortgagor resided, and in which the property was situated at the time of its execution—prior to the levy of defendants' attachment; and, although the attachment was levied upon the property in Tulare county prior to the recordation of the mortgage in Tulare county, still it was levied at a time before the 30 days had expired in which the mortgagee had the right to there record the mortgage. If this attachment is binding against the mortgagee, it would have been binding against him if levied the very day the property passed into Tulare county, and thus the purpose of the statute in giving the mortgagee time in which to record his mortgage would be defeated, and the statute rendered unavailing for any purpose. By reason of the foregoing views, the case, then, presents itself exactly as though the property had never been removed from Tulare county, but had remained in Kings county, and this attachment had been levied there as of the time it was actually levied. Under such conditions, the writ of attachment being levied subsequent to the recordation of the mortgage, it should not prevail.

It is urged by respondents that the mortgage must be recorded immediately upon its execution, and, if not so recorded, it is void; but I find no law for such a conclusion. The statute has no provision requiring immediate recordation, and it would be judicial legislation for this court to so declare the law. Section 2957 of the Civil Code declares: "A mortgage of personal property is void as against creditors of the mortgagor and subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers of the property in good faith and for value, unless: (1) It is accompanied by an affidavit of all the parties thereto that it is made in good faith and without any design to hinder, delay or defraud creditors; (2) it is acknowledged or approved, certified and recorded, in like manner as grants of real property." Under the statutes of other states which, like ours, contain no provision fixing a definite time in which a chattel mortgage must be recorded in order that it may not be void, it has been held that mere delay in such recordation in no way invalidates the mortgage, and that the holder of the mortgage, in not recording it, simply assumes the perils and risks of losing his security by the intervention of other liens or subsequent purchasers. Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 237; Wilson v. Leslie, 20 Ohio, 166; Hicks v. Williams, 17 Barb. 527; McVay v. English, 30 Kan. 368, 1 Pac. 795; Mitchell v. Black, 6 Gray, 100; Crooks v. Stuart, 2 McCrary, 13, 7 Fed. 800. I believe such to be the law in this state.

Respondents rely, both directly and by analogy, upon section 3440 of the Civil Code, which declares that all transfers of personal property are void, unless accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession. But this section cannot be invoked to any degree in this case. It is not applicable, for in terms mortgages upon personal property, when allowed by law, are exempted from its provisions. Neither is there any analogous principle of law which will aid respondents' contention. Berson v. Nunan and like cases declare that the recordation of the mortgage is an equivalent of an immediate delivery and continued change of possession, but there the court only meant to say, and the language can have no other reasonable interpretation, that the recordation of the mortgage, when had, from that time was the equivalent of the immediate delivery and continued change of possession referred to in section 3440 of the Civil Code. The recordation of the mortgage is no part of the execution, no more than recordation would be an element in the execution of a deed. It is substantially so stated in Berson v. Nunan, 63 Cal. 551. I think the judgment should be reversed.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS.

In re BLYTHE'S ESTATE. (S. F. 657.) (Supreme Court of California. Jan. 8, 1897.) Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge. H. T. Blythe and others appeal from the decree of final distribution in the matter of the estate of Thomas H. Blythe. Dismissed on motion. Holliday & Holliday, for appellants. W. H. H. Hart (Garber, Boalt & Bishop and W. W. Foote, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to dismiss the appeal of H. T. Blythe and others from the decree of final distribution in the matter of said estate, upon the ground that said appellants are not parties in interest in the proceeding. The appellants are concluded by the decision of this court upon their other appeals. They are no longer parties in interest. The motion is granted, and the appeal dismissed.

SCHMIDT et al. v. MESMER. (L. A. 166.)

FRAUD—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—WAIVER.

In an action by tenants of an hotel against the landlord to recover damages for false representations as to the income of the hotel, it appeared that, over a year after plaintiffs had knowledge of the alleged fraud, they asked to have the rent reduced, without any intimation of the alleged fraud; that afterwards they obtained an extension of time for payment of rent, without any such intimation; and that they had failed to pay the rent. Held, that plaintiffs waived the alleged fraud and their right to damages.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by G. L. Schmidt and Ivar A. Weid against Louis Mesmer. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Bicknell & Trask and D. K. Trask, for appellants. Murphy & Gottschalk, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought to recover damages for an alleged false and fraudulent representation made by the defendant to the plaintiffs with respect to a certain lease executed between the parties. The jury found a verdict for the defendant, and judgment was entered accordingly. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. On December 30, 1893, the defendant was the owner of certain real property in Los Angeles, described generally as the "United States Hotel." On that day the parties executed a written instrument by which the defendant leased said property to plaintiffs for a term of three years, commencing January 1, 1894, at the monthly rent of $800, payable on the first day of each month; and the plaintiffs agreed to pay said sum of money as rent on the first day of each month, and entered into certain other covenants not necessary to be here mentioned. The upper floors of the building on the premises had been used, and were intended to be used, as an hotel; and there were two storerooms on the first story, and also rooms used as a barroom, barbershop, laundry, etc., which were included in the lease. The gist of the complaint is that the defendant falsely and fraudulently represented to plaintiffs that the income of the hotel for the year preceding had been at least $750 a month, whereas in truth said income had not exceeded the sum of $350 a month. There was a conflict of evidence upon the point as to whether or not defendant had ever made said representation. There was also evidence that on the day upon which the lease was executed the son of the defendant, who was managing the hotel, informed the plaintiffs that they could not afford to pay $800 a month for the property, and showed them the register and other books of the hotel, which were to some extent examined by one of the plaintiffs. There was a conflict of evidence as to whether this information was given to plaintiffs an hour or two before the execution of the lease, or an hour or two afterwards; but it was given on that day, and before the plaintiffs took possession of the premises. Quite a number of instructions were given by the court to the jury as to the effect of this notice given to them by the said son of the defendant, and as to the duty of plaintiffs, under the circumstances, to have informed themselves fully upon the subject, and also as to the correct measure of damages; and it is upon these instructions, and certain rulings made by the court with respect to evidence upon these subjects, that appellants base their contention for reversal. We do not think, however, that it is necessary for us to pass definitely upon the alleged errors in these respects, because, under our view of the case, the acts of the appellants, as hereinafter stated, constitute a waiver of the alleged fraud, if any such there was, and prevent appellants from recovering in this action, without regard to said alleged errors.

The appellants took possession of the premises on the 1st of January, 1894; and, if the respondent made the representation alleged, the falsity of that representation must have been discovered, and it was admitted that it was discovered, immediately after the plaintiffs took possession. The averments of the complaint show that. Nevertheless, they occupied the premises until the commencement of this suit, which was about 17 months afterwards, without making any complaint whatever as to said false representations, or giving respondent any notice whatever that such false representation was claimed. Some time in January, 1895, or later, the appellants asked the respondent to reduce the rent, but without any intimation whatever that any alleged false representation, as charged in the complaint, had been made by respondent. Respondent refused to reduce the rent. Appellants failed to pay all the rent for the month of February, 1895, and failed to pay any of the rent for the months of March and April, but asked further time to pay said rent, and were allowed by respondent's agent to give their note for said rent, payable six months thereafter, which note they gave. Said note was not paid when due, nor was the rent for said months of March and April paid. This suit was commenced in the month of May, 1895. It is, no doubt, the law that while, where a party seeks to rescind a contract into which he was induced to go by the fraudulent representations of another party, he must rescind at once upon the discovery of the fraud, and restore the other party, as near as may be, to his former condition, yet he may elect to go on with the contract, and sue to recover damages for the deceit, without giving any warning to the other party that he intends at some future time to charge him with fraud. This rule, when applied to a continuous contract which runs through a series of years, sometimes, no doubt, works an injustice to the party charged with fraud. It is true that one actually guilty of fraud is not entitled to much consideration; but the real difficulty usually is to determine whether or not the alleged fraud actually existed, and the issue has generally to be determined upon conflicting testimony, and in accordance with the preponderance of evidence. In such a case it is evident that the party who keeps his intended charge of fraud secret for years has a great advantage, in preparing for a future, intended action, which he alone anticipates, over his adversary, who has had no intimation of such action or such charge of fraud, and has had no reason to preserve or discover evidence concerning it. But this rule, which relieves a party, when he chooses to sue for damages, from many of the acts required of him when he elects to rescind, is subject to some just limitations. If, after his knowledge of what he claims to have been the fraud, he elects not to rescind, but to adopt the contract and sue for damages, he must stand towards the other party at arm's length; he must, on his part, comply with the terms of the contract; he must not ask favors of the other party, or offer to perform the contract on conditions which he has no right to exact, and must not make any new agreement or engagement respecting it; otherwise he waives the alleged fraud. Cooley says: "The fraud may be waived by an express affirmance of the contract. Where an affirmance is relied upon, it should appear that the party having the right to complain of the fraud had fully, and with a full knowledge of his rights, in some form clearly manifested his intention to abide by the contract and waive any remedy he might have had for the deception." Cooley, Torts, 505. In Doherty v. Bell, 55 Ind. 205, the court say: "If the appellee, with full knowledge of all the facts, as we think it fair to presume, from the allegations in the reply, it was intended to charge he had, and after the appellants became the owners of it, agreed to pay the note, provided a certain extension of time was allowed him, and, in consideration thereof, such an extension was given him, we must regard him as having ratified the execution of the note, and as having waived whatever objection or defense he may have had to the manner of its execution." In St. John v. Hendrickson, 81 Ind. 350, the court say: "We fully recognize and approve the rule that a party may retain what he receives, stand to his bargain, and recover for the loss caused him by the fraud. We do not mean to run counter to this rule. We neither hold nor mean to hold that affirmance by retention of the thing bargained for cuts off an action for damages. We do hold that where a party, with full knowledge of all the material facts, does an act which indicates his intention to stand to the contract and waive all right of action for fraud, he cannot maintain an action for the original wrong practiced upon him. Where the affirmance of the contract is equivalent to a ratification, all right of action is gone. * * * Nor are we unmindful of the settled rule that the defrauded party has an election of remedies. * * * We do decide that where a party with full knowledge declines to repudiate a transaction known to him to be fraudulent, and fully and expressly ratifies it, he can neither rescind, nor maintain an action for damages." In Edwards v. Roberts, 7 Smedes & M. 544, the court say: "If a party has a knowledge that he has been defrauded, and yet subsequently confirms the original contract by making a new agreement and engagement respecting it, he thereby waives the fraud and abandons his claim to equitable relief." In Negley v. Lindsay, 67 Pa. St. 217, the court say: "Judge Baldwin, who may be regarded as belonging to our judiciary, in Blydenburgh v. Welsh, Baldw. 338, Fed. Cas. No. 1,583, held that if, after a party has acquired a knowledge of facts tending to affect a contract with fraud, he offers to perform it, on a condition which he has no right to exact, he thereby waives the fraud, and cannot set it up in an action on the contract. This, said he, is a waiver of the objection to the contract on the ground of fraud, if he was informed of all matters which bore upon that question." See, also, Blydenburgh v. Welsh, Baldw. 338, Fed. Cas. No. 1,583; Kerr, Fraud & M. 298; People v. Stephenson, 71 N. Y. 527; Nounnan v. Land Co., 81 Cal. 1, 22 Pac. 515.

Under the foregoing authorities, and upon principle, we think that the acts of the appellants in the case at bar constitute a waiver of the alleged fraud, and an abandonment of the suit for damages. After the expiration of more than a year subsequent to their knowledge of the alleged fraud, they ask to have the rent reduced, without any intimation of the alleged fraudulent conduct of the respondent. Subsequent to that time they solicited and obtained an extension of the time for the payment of the rent, still without any intimation of the alleged fraud; and they themselves have failed to comply with their part of the contract, by failing to pay the rent as provided therein. This conduct of the appellants clearly brings them within the principle declared in the authorities above cited, and, this being so, the alleged errors of the court, with respect to other matters, become immaterial. Under no view of the case could a verdict in favor of plaintiffs be maintained. Judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SUPERIOR COURT — JURISDICTION — CONTROVERSY.

A complaint alleged that defendant sheriff demanded certain fees, which were paid him under protest; that he also demanded a further sum, all of which sums he agreed to return to plaintiff if the demands were not legal; and that the charges were illegal; and prayed judgment for the aggregate amount. It was not stated on what pretext defendant made the additional demand, nor wherein its illegality consisted, nor that it was paid. The complaint was not verified, and the answer was a general denial. The court made findings reciting that the parties agreed on the same as true, and showing that the amount first mentioned was paid defendant, and judgment therefor was rendered for plaintiff, but no reference was made to any additional demand or any other payment. Held, that there was no controversy as to the additional demand, and, the other demand being less than the jurisdictional amount of the superior court, the judgment was reversed, with directions to dismiss the action.

[1] Rehearing granted.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. Pierce, Judge.

Action by Emil Lehnhardt against Frank S. Jennings, sheriff, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed and dismissed.

A. H. Sweet, for appellants. Trippet & Neale, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Plaintiff sues, as the assignee of one Hinton, to recover from defendant Jennings (who is sheriff of the defendant county) money paid by Hinton to Jennings, as fees demanded by the latter for official services in the levy of a writ of execution. Allegations appear in the complaint showing with considerable detail that the question arose between Hinton and the sheriff whether, in levying an execution issued on an ordinary money judgment, which judgment has become a lien on real property of the debtor, lands subject to the lien must be attached in the manner in which a writ of attachment is levied, under section 542, Code Civ. Proc., the sheriff claiming that course to be proper. It is averred that the sheriff demanded "the fees hereinafter specified, which fees were paid the said Jennings under protest." The fees so specified were for proceedings taken by the officer in accordance with said section 542, and amounted to $117.40. Then occur the following allegations: "That said defendant demanded of said Hinton the sum of $200, in addition to said sums heretofore stated, all of which sums the said Jennings agreed to return to said Hinton if said demand was not legal. * * * And plaintiff alleges that all of said charges and sums paid as aforesaid are illegal," etc. The prayer is for judgment in the sum of $317.40. The complaint was not verified, and the answer was a general denial. The court made findings containing a recital that the parties agreed upon the same as true. These show that the sheriff, in executing the writ, attached numerous parcels of land in the manner alleged by plaintiff, and charged and was paid therefor the sum of $117.65; and for this amount the court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff. No reference is made in the findings to a demand by the sheriff, or payment to him, of anything beyond said sum of $117.65.

In our opinion, the record discloses no cause of action of which the superior court has original jurisdiction. In order that jurisdiction may be exercised by that court in an action at law for the recovery of money only, the constitution requires that the demand in suit shall amount to $300. Article 6, § 5. It is well settled that in such actions the amount sued for determines the jurisdiction of the court. But in the cases pertaining to the subject an actual dispute concerning an amount within the jurisdiction of the court to consider appeared prima facie from the record (Dashiell v. Slingerland, 60 Cal. 653; Bailey v. Sloan, 65 Cal. 387, 4 Pac. 349; Lord v. Goldberg, 81 Cal. 596, 22 Pac. 1126; and others); and it has never been held that the prayer of the complaint should conclude the question of jurisdiction, regardless of the allegations on which it is founded. See Jackson v. Whartenby, 5 Cal. 94. In this case there is no semblance of real controversy over any sum greater than that for which the court gave judgment. It is alleged in the complaint that the sheriff demanded $200 in addition to the specified fees for attaching the land; but it is not stated upon what pretext he made such additional demand, nor wherein its illegality consisted, if it was illegal, nor that it was paid. Both the contents and the omissions of the findings tend to confirm the inference that the only substantial purpose of the statement relating to an additional demand of $200 by the sheriff is to give color to the prayer for a sum sufficient to authorize the court to take cognizance of the action. If it was deemed desirable to have an authoritative decision of the question of the sheriff's duty under the writ, the law has provided methods competent for that purpose, and not obnoxious to any provision of the constitution. We recommend that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to dismiss the action.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

O'NEILL v. REYNOLDS, Judge. (S. F. 712.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 11, 1897.)

INSOLVENCY—ASSIGNEE—MANDAMUS—WHEN LIES.

1. In the election of an assignee in insolvency under Insolvent Act, § 15, the majority in amount of claims entitled to vote prevails.

2. A mandate will not issue out of the supreme court to require a lower court to set aside its order, whether the order be merely erroneous, or in excess of jurisdiction.

3. Conceding that a mandate would issue out of the supreme court to require a lower court to admit to the office of assignee of an insolvent's estate one other than such court's appointee, it will not issue where appellant has not qualified for the office.

In bank. Petition by Hugh O'Neill against John Reynolds, judge of the superior court of Santa Clara county, for a writ of mandate. Peremptory writ denied.

N. H. Castle and Daniel W. Burchard, for petitioner. John H. Dickinson and Eugene Deuprey, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. One Corkery filed his petition in insolvency. At the time set for the election of an assignee by the creditors, claims in the amount of $3,940.32 were voted for O'Neill for assignee, and claims in the amount of $3,705.80 were voted for Fleming for assignee. The total of these two amounts constituted substantially all the claims that were entitled to vote at the election. A further claim in the amount of $16,000 was on file at that time, but, by virtue of proceedings taken under section 8 of the insolvency act, the court held that said claim was not entitled to be voted. Upon the foregoing facts, the court decided that no person received a majority in amount of claims for assignee, and, declaring no election, appointed the sheriff assignee. This proceeding was thereupon inaugurated, in the form of an application for an alternative writ of mandate from this court, asking that, if good cause to the contrary be not shown, the order appointing the sheriff assignee be vacated, and that said O'Neill be admitted to the use and enjoyment of the office of assignee of the estate of Corkery, insolvent, upon his qualifying as such assignee. No showing of any kind has been made to this court by respondent in answer to the writ, and there has been no appearance.

The true construction of section 15 of the insolvent act is that the majority in amount of claims entitled to vote shall prevail in the election of an assignee; and, if the court in this instance pursued a course based upon some contrary construction of the statute, its action was wrong. But conceding the election of the petitioner, O'Neill, as assignee, and further conceding that the court should have so declared, still we do not see how this petitioner is entitled to the relief here demanded. He desires a mandate requiring the lower court to set aside an order appointing a certain person assignee of an insolvent estate. Surely, mandates are not usually issued to set aside orders of courts. If the order is one made in excess of the court's jurisdiction, mandate is not the remedy. If the order is erroneous, then, certainly, mandate will not lie. Again, this court is also asked by the writ to command the trial court to admit O'Neill to the use and enjoyment of the office of assignee upon his duly qualifying as such assignee. Conceding that, under section 1085 of the Code of Civil Procedure, mandate would lie to the lower court, requiring it to admit O'Neill to the office of assignee if such court was unlawfully precluding him from that office, still such a case is not this case. It is not apparent that he is precluded by the court from the office. It is apparent that up to the present time he is not entitled to the office, for he has not qualified by giving bond and taking oath. In substance, he asks for a conditional mandate; that is, for an order which is to have force and effect, provided he (petitioner) in due time qualifies by giving bond and taking oath. Perchance he is financially unable to give the bond, and possibly might never take his oath of office. Under such circumstances the mandate of the court would be an idle act, and made so by petitioner himself. For these reasons, and others which possibly could be suggested, we conclude that mandate is not the road to be traveled in reaching the relief sought. The application for the peremptory writ is denied.

KOSHLAND et al. v. SPRING et al. (S. F. 439.)[1]

SALE OF LAND—CONTRACT—TITLE OF VENDOR.

1. A contract by S. to sell to K. all the land conveyed by deed to G., S. "now being the owner thereof," provided the title prove good, excepting any lots, streets, or parts of streets "heretofore sold and conveyed, or in writing contracted to be sold," by S., for "$400 per acre of all the lands in said tract now owned by" S. (the premises conveyed by deed to S. being therein described by monuments, courses, and distances), "containing 304 acres, more or less," excepting therefrom a strip owned by a railroad, and 22 blocks "situate in the town of D.," designated by numbers on a certain map of D., is not a contract to sell only so much as S. owned at the time, but all the land within the exterior bounds specified in the deed to G., less the exceptions in such deed and the contract; and K. need not complete the purchase, there being streets (other than those which by use and improvement had obviously and notoriously become highways) throughout the tract, which was chiefly used for agriculture, in which the public had rights through dedication, though K. knew a town site had been laid out on the tract, and had seen copies of the map.

2. One need not complete his purchase of a tract of land, the vendor having obligated himself to make good title as a condition of sale, where litigation with grantees of various lots deeded according to a map which embraces the tract agreed to be sold, and shows streets thereon, is necessary to determine their rights in such streets.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Action by Simon Koshland and others against F. S. Spring and another. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Edward J. Pringle and P. G. Galpin, for appellants. Daniel Titus and I. B. L. Brandt, for respondents.

BRITT, C. Plaintiffs agreed with defendants for the purchase of certain land, and deposited with the latter $5,000 as earnest money pending investigation of the title. This action was brought to recover such deposit, plaintiffs claiming that the title was not good or satisfactory. Defendants denied the defects alleged, and filed a cross complaint to compel specific performance of the contract. The court below held with the plaintiffs. The facts of the case are numerous, and have not much interdependence. A somewhat extended statement of them is necessary to an understanding of the dispute.

The contract of the parties bore date August 27, 1887. By its terms, F. S. and J. R. Spring, the defendants, agreed to sell to plaintiffs all that tract of land in Alameda county which was conveyed by the sheriff of said county to one Grogan by deed dated October 24, 1876, reference being made to such deed for description of the bargained premises, "said parties of the first part [the Springs] now being the owners thereof: provided, however, that the title to said lands and premises shall prove good or satisfactory to said parties of the second part [Koshland et al.], and not otherwise; excepting and reserving from said lands and premises any lots or parts of lots, streets or parts of streets, that may have been heretofore sold and conveyed, or in writing contracted to be sold, by said parties of the first part, or either of them, for the price or sum of $400.00 per acre of all the lands in said tract now owned and belonging to said parties of the first part, or either of them." Within the time allowed for examination of title and ascertainment of the acreage in the tract, the purchasers stated their objections to the title and demanded return of their deposit. The premises conveyed by the deed of the sheriff to Grogan were therein described by monuments, courses, and distances, "containing 304 acres, more or less," excepting therefrom (1) a strip of land 100 feet wide, in the middle of which ran the track of the Central Pacific Railroad, extending across the tract a distance of more than half a mile; (2) another piece, 50 feet wide and 1,000 feet long, in the eastern part of the tract, adjacent to the strip first reserved, and which had been conveyed to the railroad company for purposes of a station; (3) 22 blocks of land "situate in the town of Decoto," and known and designated by numbers and letters upon a map of Decoto entitled "Plan of Decoto Land of the Decoto Land Company, Alameda Valley." It is thus seen that the subject of the treaty between plaintiffs and defendants was a tract containing 304 acres, less the portions owned by the railroad company, and 22 specified blocks, excepted in the deed of the sheriff to Grogan, and diminished also by a further exception in the contract of "any lots or parts of lots, streets or parts of streets, that may have been heretofore" (i. e. before August 27, 1887) "sold and conveyed, or in writing contracted to be sold," by defendants or either of them. The map of Decoto mentioned in the Grogan deed showed the whole tract platted into lots, blocks, and streets, traversed by the line of railroad, bounded east, north, and northwest by county roads, and two of such blocks marked as "parks." The controversy here concerns mainly the streets delineated on the map exterior to those parts of the tract reserved from the contract of sale. Such streets included an area of about 90 acres, and plaintiffs contend that the same had become, in consequence of the acts of defendants and their predecessors in estate, impressed with an easement in favor of the public and of individuals tantamount to dedication thereof for public use, to the serious impairment of the title. Defendants deny that such easement exists to any extent incompatible with their contract, and claim ability to make good title to about 238 acres, and that plaintiffs should pay them therefor the stipulated price of $400 per acre. On November 6, 1869, the tract—by which term we designate the entire body of 304 acres—was owned by Ezra, John, and Adolphus Decoto, brothers; and on that day they entered into a written contract with one Brown, by which they authorized him to enter on the land and lay out the same in lots, blocks, and streets, and to negotiate sales of lots, reserving several of the blocks to the Decotos. They agreed to execute deeds to the purchasers of lots from Brown; they to receive the proceeds of sales up to the sum of $42,000, and convey to Brown the remaining land after sales of that amount had been made. Brown, on his part, agreed, among other covenants, that he would "cause said lands to be platted and divided into lots and blocks and streets, for sale." January 18, 1870, Brown assigned his interest in such contract to the Decoto Land Company, a corporation, the instrument of assignment providing that the latter should fulfill Brown's engagements with the Decotos. Such corporation entered upon the land, and surveyed and staked it into lots, blocks, streets, and parks, and made the aforesaid map thereof, and on July 9, 1870, filed such map in the office of the county recorder. It also planted many thousand trees on the tract, disposing them around the blocks along the curb line of the prospective sidewalks. There were 131 blocks in all, many of them fractional.

The only sale made in the year 1870 was evidenced by a deed to one Hastings, in which the Decoto Land Company and the three Decoto brothers joined, of four lots in block C "in the town of Decoto," as laid down on the said map. Block C was one of the 22 blocks excepted from the contract between plaintiffs and defendants. On January 10, 1871, the Decotos conveyed by deed to said company the entire tract, described by metes and bounds, excepting therefrom in favor of the railroad the strips of land already mentioned, and reserving also said 22 blocks. The excepted portions were described by reference to said map in the recorder's office. Contemporaneously with this deed, and to secure a portion of the purchase money unpaid, the company executed to the Decotos a mortgage on the premises, described in the same manner and with like exceptions as in the deed. About the same time the Decotos and said company joined in a deed of 9 of such excepted blocks, described by reference to the map, to F. S. Spring, one of the appellants here. Such 9 blocks lay in an oblong body on both sides of the railroad, intersected by several cross streets, and extended from the eastern boundary of the tract westerly about half the width thereof, and included a majority of the lots afterwards sold in the nascent town. All the deeds and contracts above mentioned were recorded in the county recorder's office at or near the respective times of their execution. July 28, 1871, the Decoto Land Company conveyed 88 blocks, as shown on the map, to F. S. Spring. The deed was not recorded until April 26, 1875. Meanwhile the appellant J. R. Spring had become the assignee of said mortgage, and on April 24, 1875, he began a suit for its foreclosure. In due course the land described in the mortgage was sold under decree of foreclosure, and Grogan became the purchaser thereof, and received the sheriff's deed referred to for description in the contract which gave rise to this action. On February 2, 1877, Grogan conveyed the same premises to said J. R. Spring. Prior to the action for foreclosure, F. S. Spring made divers sales of lots in the 9 blocks conveyed to him in January, 1871. His deeds of such lots described them as being in the town of Decoto, or by reference to said map. Neither he nor any of the purchasers from him were parties to that suit. After the sheriff's deed, J. R. Spring made or agreed to make conveyances, seven in number, to as many different purchasers, of lands in the tract outside the excepted 22 blocks. Some of his deeds described the premises conveyed by reference directly to the map, others by metes and bounds, and some of the latter included portions of streets marked on the map. One may be noted specially. It was executed July 3, 1883, by J. R. Spring to the trustees of a school district, and granted block 102 "marked on a sketch map made for the late Decoto Land Company, * * * together with the right of way on H street to the railroad, and a right of way to the Bell Ranch road." The latter road bounded the Decoto tract on its easterly side. On this block a public school house was built, and school was kept. Said deeds of J. R. Spring appear to have covered all or nearly all the parcels excepted from the contract with plaintiffs as "lots or parts of lots, streets or parts of streets, heretofore conveyed and sold, or contracted to be sold." F. S. Spring in the years from 1875 to 1887 also made a number of sales out of his excepted blocks near the railroad station, his conveyances referring more or less directly to the map for description. In 1887 about 40 families resided on lots sold and reserved within the tract, and there were some business houses near the station. "Railroad Avenue" (so called on said map) was the main thoroughfare across the tract from east to west, and was graveled and maintained as a highway by the county. Portions of two other streets were in like manner maintained as highways. Parts of a few streets outside the limits of the excepted blocks were traveled to some extent, and more or less marked by narrow wagon roads or trails. In some instances purchasers of lots extended their fences across adjacent streets, and all the western portion of the tract (perhaps one-third or more of its area) was for many years before 1887 fenced, plowed, and cultivated. The two blocks marked as "parks" on the map were in a barley field. It seems from the foregoing that Decoto was a town site laid out in a rural district on a tract of land nearly half a square mile in extent, having a railroad station within and near its eastern boundary, around which grew a straggling village. The town failed to attract population as its projectors hoped, and a large —it may be, the greater—part of the site reverted to its original state of agricultural fields.

1. It is said by defendants that the contract recognizes some dedication of streets, but provides for the sale of all the land owned by them; that the case "does not involve the sale of a certain ranch, farm, or parcel of land, with boundaries defined or definable. * * * This was not a contract to sell all the land within the outside boundary of the sheriff's deed. It was a contract to sell within that boundary only so many acres as the appellants owned at the time of the sale." And upon this view of the contract it is claimed, as we understand the defendants, that they have the right to an ascertainment by the court of the acreage to which their title may be proved perfect, whether little or much, and to be paid therefor by plaintiffs at the contract rate. We dissent from such a construction of the contract. We are disposed to think it doubtful, on the facts appearing, whether specific performance could be had in any event, if the agreement is so indefinite as to its subject-matter. But we see no uncertainty as to the premises which defendants agreed to sell. These were all the land conveyed by the sheriff's deed of October, 1876, except "any lots or parts of lots, streets or parts of streets, that may have been heretofore sold by the parties of the first part," etc. All the exceptions within the exterior boundaries specified in the deed of the sheriff were susceptible of exact ascertainment, and so the residue on which the contract was to operate was capable of like definition, and was within the requirement of the contract for good title.

2. The owners of the land offered to dedicate all the streets marked on the plat. Appellants contest this conclusion with much vigor, but it seems to result from the evidence. The Decoto brothers, by their contract with Brown in 1869, expressly assented to the platting of the land into lots, blocks, and streets, for sale; provided for their own participation in the benefits of the scheme, and the reservation to themselves of some of the platted blocks. When Brown's assignee had fulfilled Brown's agreement relative to the survey and plat, the owners signified their approval of such performance by joining in the conveyances to Hastings, to the railroad company, and F. S. Spring, all referring to the map for purposes of description. The intent of the owners to dedicate was fairly apparent, whether or not Brown was, in strictness, their agent. People v. Beaudry, 91 Cal. 213, 27 Pac. 610; Griffiths v. Galindo, 86 Cal. 192, 24 Pac. 1025.

3. We think, also, that the evidence does not bear out the further contention that the offer made was "repudiated as a whole by the owners, and was afterwards renewed only as to the special streets expressly contemplated by the terms of the contract." Although, in the deed made by the Decoto brothers to the Decoto Land Company, the tract was described as a whole by its exterior confines, a mode of description regarded as indicative of a design to revoke an offer of dedication (Archer v. Salinas City, 93 Cal. 53, 28 Pac. 839), yet the circumstance loses its importance when we consider that it was by a similar description, adopted before any map was made, that the Decotos had bound themselves to convey the land to Brown, to whose interest the land company succeeded, and that in the same deed 22 blocks, as well as other parcels, were excepted by reference to the map. No greater effect can be allowed to the foreclosure of the mortgage executed simultaneously with such deed, and which contained the same description of premises. The foreclosure may have rendered nugatory the deed of 88 blocks made by the land company to F. S. Spring in July, 1871; but it did not affect the precedent steps towards dedication taken by the Decotos alone and jointly with the land company, nor the consequence of sales by F. S. Spring to purchasers who were not parties to that suit, and had succeeded ratably to his interest in all the streets. Regarding the conveyances made by J. R. Spring out of the land acquired by him as the result of the foreclosure, they cannot be said to evince a design for any general revocation of the previous offer to dedicate. Rather, for the most, they treat the streets as present utilities for access to the lots sold, with a potential character of public ways. For example, the deed of block 102 to the school district, "together with the right of way on H street."

4. It is said that, if any of the deeds of lots made by either J. R. Spring or F. S. Spring operate indirectly towards a dedication of streets in other parts of the tract, "such dedication must be accepted by respondents as a necessary part of the exceptions of the contract of sale." This is a corollary of the proposition that the parties agreed for the sale of whatever land within exterior limits defendants had good title to, and falls with that theory of the contract, for reasons already stated. But it remains to consider whether those conveyances, and the concomitant formation of a village community, did have such tendency; it being borne in mind that there had been an offer to dedicate all the streets marked on the map of the tract, and that such offer was, to some extent, accepted. Appellants claim that there was no dedication to public use except of Railroad avenue and parts of two other streets, and that "no rights of purchasers extended beyond these streets, unless it be to such rights of way as were attached 'of necessity' to the reserved blocks," all of which were within the exceptions of the contract; and, by way of illustration, they say it is "preposterous to presume that the man who bought a lot near the depot contracted for an immediate right of way through streets half a mile off, upon which he could not walk without destroying growing grain of his vendors." They cite Civ. Code, § 1104, and various cases claimed to be in consonance with their view. Plaintiffs urge, on the other hand, that by platting the land into streets, etc., and the sale of lots by reference to the map, there was an irrevocable dedication of all the spaces called "streets" on the map to the use of the public; also, that the grantors impliedly covenanted with each purchaser of a lot bounded upon a street represented on the map that the street should be permanent of the width and length depicted on the plan. Language is used in San Leandro v. Le Breton, 72 Cal. 170, 13 Pac. 405, which justifies the contention of respondents regarding the effect of a plat exhibiting streets, and sales of lots with reference thereto, but the doctrine has been modified by subsequent decisions. Cerf v. Pfleging, 94 Cal. 131, 29 Pac. 417; Schmitt v. San Francisco, 100 Cal. 302, 34 Pac. 961. The present attitude of this court upon the question is reflected in Archer v. Salinas City, 93 Cal. 52, 28 Pac. 841: "Whether the owner, by making sales according to such map or designation, has made the offer with reference to other streets than those by which the lots sold are bounded, is a fact which the court must determine from the circumstances of each case, such as the number of sales; their proximity to the street claimed to have been dedicated; the use to which the land has been put; the means by which, or the extent to which, the streets have been brought into connection with other streets or highways." Necessarily, similar considerations must govern when the inquiry concerns the extent to which the offer has been accepted, or the extent of the rights of purchasers of lots in the tract. This doctrine is decisive of the present case. Plaintiffs were not bound to complete the purchase unless defendants' title was found to be free from litigation, palpable defects, and grave doubts. Turner v. McDonald, 76 Cal. 177, 18 Pac. 262; Sheehy v. Miles, 93 Cal. 288, 28 Pac. 1046. As to many streets marked on the plan of Decoto, it may be that any offer to dedicate them has been withdrawn, and they are no qualification of defendants' title, but there are many others of which this cannot be affirmed. Take for example F, G, and H streets. They extend lengthwise of the tract and crosswise of the principal reserved area. It is conceded that portions of them are affected by rights of way in favor of purchasers of lots bounded on them, and that a part of H street has become an undoubted highway. It cannot be affirmed on the evidence here, even if it were the province of this court to determine, that the rights of the public and of the owners of abutting lots in these streets are confined to those portions thereof within the excepted blocks, etc., mentioned in the contract. There is ground for serious argument whether they ought not to be kept open throughout their length, or, if some portions of them may be lawfully closed, it is hard to see how those portions are to be ascertained except by agreement or litigation with more or less numerous persons interested in such ascertainment as owners of neighboring lots. The circumstances in pais mentioned in Archer v. Salinas City, 93 Cal. 53, 28 Pac. 839, need to be invoked.

5. Appellants further maintain that, even allowing the dedication of all the streets laid out on the map, yet respondents had notice of the fact, and contracted to buy subject to that easement. This is asserted on the evidence that, in the course of the negotiation, Koshland, one of the purchasers, was shown copies of the map; knew that a town site had been laid out on the tract by the Decoto Land Company, and that "there was a piece of land called 'Decoto.' It was the town of Decoto that was to be sold." Since defendants were, in express terms, obligated to make good title, as a condition of the sale, we do not concede that actual knowledge by the purchasers of dedication to public use of the extensive street surface exhibited on the map—the tract being mainly or largely agricultural, and to be sold as acreage—could be deemed, while the contract remained executory, to imply a waiver of substantial fulfillment of the condition for title. Sugd. Vend. *390; Speakman v. Forepaugh, 44 Pa. St. 363, 374. Compare Devl. Deeds, §§ 911, 913, and cases cited. But, without passing on that question, we think the contract itself forbids the construction that plaintiffs made a chancing bargain relative to streets other than those which had, like Railroad avenue, become, by use and improvement, obviously and notoriously public highways. It provided for the sale—let us say—of the Decoto town site, excepting "all lots or parts of lots, streets or parts of streets, that may have been heretofore sold and conveyed, or contracted to be sold," etc. These terms, by excepting streets and parts of streets previously sold, imply that the vendors assume the right now to sell the remaining streets. If one contract to sell a piece of woodland, excepting so much of the standing timber as he had previously conveyed by proper writing, we suppose the fair inference would be that he undertook to sell all the timber which he had not so conveyed; and if it turned out that he owned none of the timber, because it had been reserved in the deed under which he claimed the land, or for other reason, this fact would be good cause to the purchaser for refusing to take the title. So, here, the reasonable construction of the contract is that defendants, the map before them, agreed to make title to plaintiffs of unconveyed streets as well as lots; but it is found that there are at least grave doubts whether they have right to convey many of the streets, and the result is that they cannot enforce specific performance of the contract, and plaintiffs are entitled to return of their deposit. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SHOEMAKER v. ACKER. (L. A. 108.)[1]

BREACH OF CONTRACT — DAMAGES — PROSPECTIVE PROFITS—EVIDENCE.

1. One who agrees to "devote his whole time and attention to the management" and cultivation of an orchard commits no breach of contract by occasionally absenting himself from the premises, at times when his presence is not necessary.

2. Prospective profits are recoverable as damages for breach of a partly-executed contract, whereby plaintiff was to plant and cultivate an orchard for five years, and share in the profits.

3. In estimating such profits, evidence of the value of a similar orchard at the time of the trial, if matured as contemplated by the contract, was admissible.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Waldo H. York, Judge.

Action by R. H. Shoemaker, Jr., against David D. Acker, to recover for breach of contract. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John D. Pope, for appellant. Wm. D. Stephens and Ben. Goodrich, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought to recover damages in the sum of $35,000 for an alleged breach of a written contract between the parties. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $2,000, for which judgment was entered; and defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The contract out of which the litigation arises was executed on the 4th day of October, 1892; and, as appellant relies mainly upon two points for a reversal, the parts of said contract necessary to be considered may be briefly stated as follows: The contract recites that the appellant was about to invest from $5,000 to $7,500 in the purchase of unimproved land, to be selected by the parties; that the land should be cultivated, improved, and planted in lemon or orange trees, or partly in each, as the said appellant might elect; that the respondent was to have charge of the improvements and cultivation of the land, and was to have an interest in the income and profits that might be derived from the sale of the land or its products, and in the increase and value of said land from said improvements or otherwise. It is then agreed that the respondent "will devote his whole time and attention to the management, care, cultivation, and improvement of said land, and the sale of said land, and the products thereof"; that the appellant would provide for respondent a suitable dwelling house upon the land, and give him a certain amount monthly for his maintenance; that the appellant should furnish the necessary funds for the purchase of trees, implements, labor, etc.; that the appellant would not sell any portion of the land within five years from the date of the contract, except with the consent of the respondent; that, whenever any portion of the land should be sold, the profit derived therefrom should be ascertained by a method particularly stated in the contract; that, whenever any income should be derived from the land in any one year, certain deductions of expenses should be made, and the balance should be considered as profits, and all profits should be equally divided between the parties; that the respondent should keep an account of all moneys received by him from the sale of the products of the land; and that, if any portion of the land should remain unsold upon the expiration of five years, the value thereof should be ascertained by certain appraisers to be selected by the parties; and, if from such valuation there should appear to be any profit, that the respondent should be entitled to receive a deed for such portion of the land as would, according to said appraisal, represent in value his share of the profits; and that "this agreement shall continue for five years, unless all the land should be sold in the meantime, whereupon it shall cease and determine." In accordance with this contract, about 110 acres of land was purchased, at the price of $5,750; and immediately thereafter the respondent entered upon the performance of his obligations under said contract, and under his management, down to the 17th day of January, 1894, about 70 acres of said land had been cultivated. improved, and planted in lemon trees, as determined upon by the appellant. On said January 17, 1894, the appellant notified the respondent that for certain reasons he elected to consider the contract annulled, after which the respondent, in accordance with the appellant's demand, left the ranch, and gave up its management. It is not contended by appellant that he did not prevent the further execution of the contract, or that the respondent had not the right to consider it rescinded by the act of appellant, provided the appellant was not justified by the conduct of the respondent in putting an end to the contract.

Appellant's contention that he had a right to put an end to the contract is based upon an alleged violation by respondent of his covenant to "devote his whole time and attention to the management, care, cultivation, and improvement of said land." The facts as to that contention are these: The respondent did faithfully and well manage the cultivation of said land, and the planting of same in trees, the care of the trees, etc.; but on several occasions he left the land on Saturday afternoon, and did not return until about noon on Monday, and, upon the remonstrance of the appellant, the respondent claimed that he had the right to so absent himself from the ranch when he could do so without any damage or loss occurring through such absence; and it fully appears that there was no defect in the management of the land, and no loss of any kind occasioned by such absence. Appellant contends, however, that the said agreement in the contract that appellant would devote "his whole time" was violated by his occasional absences, as above stated. We do not think that this contention can be maintained. A contract must be construed with reference to the subject-matter, to the circumstances under which it was made, and to the evident intention of the parties, as made apparent by all the language used, keeping in view the said subject-matter and circumstances. In the case at bar the most literal construction of the contract would not include a requirement that the respondent should positively remain on the land all the time. Indeed, his continuous personal presence there would have prevented the performance of many of his duties under the contract. His duty was the "management, care, cultivation, and improvement of said land, and the sale of said land and the products thereof"; and as he performed this duty faithfully and well, until he was prevented by appellant from doing so any longer, and as his short absences from the land were when he was "not needed there," and when his "presence was not necessary," and did not result in any loss or injury, or constitute any defect in management, we think that the jury were entirely warranted in finding that he had not by such absences committed any breach of the contract.

2. The second point made by appellant on the question of proper damages, although not as elaborately argued as the first point, is, in our opinion, one of graver import. "Prospective profits," as damages, present one of the most difficult subjects with which courts have to deal. It is not the law, however, that they can never be recovered. Our own Code states the rule to be that the measure of damages for the breach of a contract is "the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom." Civ. Code, § 3300. An examination of the authorities will show that the cases in which future profits were rejected as "speculative" or "too remote" were cases where the asserted future profits were entirely collateral to the subject-matter of the contract, and not consequences flowing in a direct line from the breach of such contract. Familiar instances of profits which are thus speculative and remote are those which might have been realized on a new contract with a third person, which could have been consummated with the proceeds of the contract sued on if the latter had not been broken; for in such a case the profits on the new contract are wholly collateral to the one broken, do not directly flow from it, and are not stipulated for or contemplated by the parties to the contract sued on. But, where the prospective profits are the natural and direct consequences of the breach of the contract, they may be recovered; and he who breaks the contract cannot wholly escape on account of the difficulty which his own wrong has produced of devising a perfect measure of damages. Suth. Dam. (2d Ed.) §§ 64, 72, 107, 120; Masterton v. Mayor, etc., 7 Hill. 61; U. S. v. Behan, 110 U. S. 344, 4 Sup. Ct. 81; Rice v. Whitmore, 74 Cal. 619, 16 Pac. 501; Hale v. Trout, 35 Cal. 229; Stoddard v. Treadwell, 26 Cal. 308; Cederberg v. Robison, 100 Cal. 98, 99, 34 Pac. 625; Tahoe Ice Co. v. Union Ice Co., 109 Cal. 242, 41 Pac. 1020. In Suth. Dam. § 64, the author, after speaking of profits which are too remote, says (quoting from a decided case): "But profits or advantages which are the direct and immediate fruits of the contract entered into between the parties stand upon a different footing. These are part and parcel of the contract itself, entering into and constituting a portion of its very elements; something stipulated for, the right to the enjoyment of which is just as clear and plain as to the fulfillment of any other stipulation. They are presumed to have been taken into consideration and deliberated upon before the contract was made, and formed, perhaps, the only inducement to the arrangement." We think that the damages claimed in the case at bar are of the kind which are recoverable under the principles above stated. Contracts for the purchase and sale of future crops running through a series of years have been recognized as valid (Civ. Code, § 1768; Blackwood v. Packing Co., 76 Cal. 212, 18 Pac. 248; Brown v. Anderson, 77 Cal. 236, 19 Pac. 487); and actions have frequently been maintained for damages for the destruction of growing crops, although, of course, there was no absolute certainty that they would have matured (Suth. Dam. § 120, and cases there cited).

Appellant particularly objects to certain questions asked by respondent of his witnesses, of which the following is a fair specimen: "What, in your opinion, is the present value of a lemon orchard, situated as this is, and of the varieties of which this orchard is composed,—that is, of Eureka, Villa Franca, and Lisbon varieties,—supposing the orchard to be of the age of four and a half years, or to have been planted out four and a half years?" It is contended that this question involved matters too remote and speculative, but we do not think so. As appellant, by his own wrong, forced respondent into the strait of proving damages, he cannot complain that the latter used the best methods left him for accomplishing the result. Of course, all property is somewhat vacillating in value, but land is usually as little so as any other kind of property; and certainly, as against a wrongdoer, there is no presumption that land will be of less value in a year or two hence than at the present time. Upon the breach of the contract by appellant, in manner as hereinbefore stated, respondent was entitled to sue at once, and to recover the entire damages resulting from the breach (Hale v. Trout, 35 Cal. 241); and the questions objected to would have been admissible if they had been asked immediately after such breach; but the trial at which the questions were asked did not take place until 1895, which was much nearer the time when, "in the ordinary course of things," the trees would mature, and the land would be in the condition which the parties contemplated it would be at the expiration of five years. This rendered the offered evidence more valuable; for in an action upon a contract which contemplates a long period of time for performance, if the trial be delayed, the conditions existing at the time of the trial, as affecting the prospective profits, may be shown. In such a case "parties are entitled to the benefit of any facts transpiring subsequently to the bringing of the action which show more clearly the gains prevented by the breach complained of, or the damages sustained from such a cause of action, or any other, the injurious effects of which extend into the future." Suth. Dam. § 107. See, also, Tahoe Ice Co. v. Union Ice Co., 109 Cal. 248, 249, 41 Pac. 1020. As was said in Cederberg v. Robison, supra, a party to such a contract "is not to be deprived of all profits because they are not susceptible of exact measurement." In Sutherland on Damages, the author, speaking of an action for damages for the destruction of growing crops, and basing his text upon authorities cited, says: "The jury may estimate, with the aid of testimony, the value of the crop at the time of its destruction, in view of all the circumstances existing at any time before the trial, favoring or rendering doubtful the conclusion that it would attain to a more valuable condition, and all the hazards and expenses incident to the process of supposed growth or appreciation." And within that principle, under the circumstances of the case at bar, the jury had the right to know the present value of an orchard like the one here involved, if matured as contemplated by the contract. Of course, they were also to consider "all the hazards and expenses incident to the process of supposed growth or appreciation"; and this they evidently did, for while the testimony of respondent, based upon calculations which supposed the most favorable outcome, and took no accounts of "hazards," placed his damages at over $25,000, the jury gave him only $2,000. We have examined the case of Rhodes v. Baird, 16 Ohio St. 573, cited by appellant. That action was to recover damages for the breach of a covenant to make a lease of land for a term of years upon which a peach orchard was to be planted; and it was held that the measure of damages was the value of the lease. The contract was therefore essentially different from the one in the case at bar. There are expressions in the opinion which are somewhat favorable to appellant's contention; but, if it was there intended to hold that deprivation of future crops can in no instance be ground for damages, the case is in that respect not in accord with the current of authority.

In our opinion, the court below did not commit error in admitting the said evidence objected to, or in instructing the jury upon that subject. Moreover, it is evident that the jury were not carried away by those exaggerated estimates of future profits and value which in such a case can be so readily figured with pencil and paper. The verdict was apparently the result of a fair consideration of the issues involved by reasonable men, who were probably well informed about the subject-matter of the suit. A verdict for a very large amount would naturally have aroused distrust; but, if respondent was entitled to recover damages at all for the breach of this very important contract,—and we have held that he is,—it cannot be said that the amount awarded was in any sense excessive, or the result of any irrelevant or improper considerations.

We have considered the two main points made by appellant, and there are no others calling for special notice. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

VENTURA & O. V. RY. CO. v. HARTMAN.

CORPORATIONS—SUBSCRIPTION TO CAPITAL STOCK—LIABILITY OF SUBSCRIBER.

A mere agreement to "subscribe and take" the amount of capital stock set opposite the subscriber's name does not bind him to pay an assessment levied before one-fourth of the capital stock has been subscribed, in violation of Civ. Code, § 331.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; B. T. Williams, Judge.

Action by the Ventura & Ojai Valley Railway Company against F. Hartman to recover on a subscription to the capital stock of plaintiff corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Blackstock & Ewing, for appellant. Barnes & Selby, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The Ventura & Ojai Valley Railway Company was incorporated under the laws of this state April 21, 1892. Its capital stock, as provided in its articles of incorporation, was $250,000, divided into 2,500 shares, of $100 each. Of this amount only 260 shares were subscribed at the commencement of this action. Prior to its incorporation a preliminary agreement therefor had been entered into between several individuals, which was to become operative in the event that $20,000 should be subscribed to its capital stock. This amount having been subscribed, the necessary steps for its incorporation were taken, and subsequently thereto the defendant, with others, subscribed the following agreement, which appears to have been annexed to the original subscription paper:

"Whereas, under and pursuant to the foregoing agreement and subscription, there was incorporated the Ventura & Ojai Valley Railway Company, to the capital stock of which there was subscribed the amounts above named by the parties named respectively: Now, therefore, we, the undersigned, subscribe and agree to take the number of shares set opposite our names respectively, and thereon pay the amount in cash named, to wit, ten per cent. of the amount of stock by us subscribed, to A. Bernheim, treasurer of such corporation:

Subscribers.	Stock Subscribed.	Amount of Cash.
F. Hartman.	$2,000.	$200. Pd.'

Of the amount thus subscribed by the defendant, he paid to the plaintiff two installments of $200 each. It is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff had incurred certain obligations in building its road above the amount received by it from its stockholders, and that, to provide funds to meet the same, it had demanded from each of its stockholders an additional payment of 40 per cent. of the amount of their several subscriptions respectively; and that on or about the 6th day of June, 1895, it demanded from the defendant the payment of the sum of $800, being said 40 per cent. of the amount of the capital stock for which he had subscribed; and that the defendant had refused to pay the same. The present action was brought to recover this amount. The defendant demurred to the complaint, and, his demurrer having been overruled, judgment was entered against him, for the amount demanded by the plaintiff, from which he has appealed.

The right of the plaintiff to a recovery from the defendant depends solely upon the terms of the agreement of subscription made by him. Aside from the absence of all averments in the complaint of a compliance by the plaintiff with the statutory requirements for an assessment, it affirmatively appears therefrom that the plaintiff had no authority to levy an assessment upon its capital stock. Section 331, Civ. Code, gives authority to a corporation to levy such assessment only when one-fourth of its capital stock has been subscribed, and it is alleged that only 260 out of 2,500 shares of its capital stock had been subscribed. See Investment Co. v. Merrill, 108 Cal. 490, 41 Pac. 487. That a subscriber to the capital stock of a corporation may by the terms of his subscription vary his liability from that which exists merely by virtue of the statute, has been frequently decided in this state (West v. Crawford, 80 Cal. 19, 21 Pac. 1123; Electric Light & Power Co. v. Johnson, 93 Cal. 538, 29 Pac. 126); but, as in the case of all other obligations arising from contract, the liability of the subscriber in such cases is measured by the terms of his agreement. As a copy of the subscription agreement which the defendant signed is annexed to the complaint, the averment in the complaint that he thereby agreed to pay his subscription "when and as it might be demanded by said plaintiff," not being contained therein, must be disregarded, and the liability of the defendant is to be determined by a construction of the language used in the agreement. The agreement to "subscribe and take" the shares set opposite his name bound him as a stockholder in the corporation, but not to pay for the stock otherwise than as assessments therefor might be legally made. Cook, Stock, Stockh. & Corp. Law, § 105. The further agreement, "And thereon pay the amount in cash named, to wit, ten per cent. of the amount of stock by us subscribed, to A. Berheim, treasurer of said corporation," is shown by the complaint to have been complied with. As the defendant's liability to the plaintiff in the present action is based upon the terms of his agreement, the plaintiff's right to enforce the agreement was not affected by the indebtedness it had incurred in constructing the road, and the averments thereof in the complaint are immaterial. The court should have sustained the demurrer to the complaint, on the ground that no cause of action is alleged against the defendant. The judgment is reversed, and the superior court is directed to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

DUFF et al. v. RANDALL et al. (S. F. 443.)[1]

FORECLOSURE SALE — BONA FIDA PURCHASER — NOTICE.

A bona fide purchaser of mortgaged premises at foreclosure sale, who pays the price and takes a certificate of sale, is not affected by subsequent notice of adverse rights, though received before execution of the sheriff's deed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; E. W. Wilson, Judge.

Ejectment by Julia Duff and another against one Randall and others. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed

W. L. Duff and J. W. Turner, for appellants. Buck & Cutler, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. Ejectment for certain lands in the county of Humboldt. The title to the property in question was vested in William R. Duff in 1863, and upon his death, in 1875, the plaintiffs herein succeeded to his interest in the property as his heirs at law. In 1869 he, by his attorney, conveyed the property to Robert P. Duff, who mortgaged it to Huntoon, July 19, 1877. In an action by these plaintiffs against Robert P. Duff (the facts of which are found in Duff v. Duff, reported in 71 Cal. 513, 12 Pac. 570), it was determined that by reason of the fraud of the attorney this conveyance did not have the effect to divest William R. Duff of his title thereto. William R. Duff had, however, given to his attorney authority to convey the property, and, although the conveyance was invalid as against William R. Duff and the plaintiffs herein, it was not absolutely void, and a bona fide purchaser for value from the grantee would hold the title as against William R. Duff, or as against the plaintiffs herein. The facts relating to the controversy between the parties hereto are substantially the same as those presented in the case of Randall v. Duff, 79 Cal. 115, 19 Pac. 532, and 21 Pac. 610. The material difference between the present action and that is that in that action it was shown that the suits for the foreclosure of the mortgages executed by Robert P. Duff to Ritchie and Fiebig were not commenced until after the commencement of the action of Duff v. Duff, supra, and after a notice of the lis pendens had been filed in the office of the county recorder, whereas, in the present case, it was shown that the suit of Duff v. Duff was not commenced until after the property involved herein had been sold to the defendant Randall under the judgment in the foreclosure suit. The suit of Duff v. Duff was commenced by the plaintiffs herein December 30, 1880. The action to foreclose the Huntoon mortgage was begun August 14, 1880, and judgment was rendered therein October 28, 1880. November 30, 1880, the sheriff sold the property under this judgment to the defendant Randall, who paid the purchase price therefor, and received a certificate of sale the same day. The sheriff's deed was executed to Randall, August 18, 1881, and on August 8, 1882, Randall conveyed the property to the defendants Murphy and McAleenan. Neither Randall nor either of the other defendants herein had any notice of the plaintiffs' claim to the property until after the filing of the notice of lis pendens in the suit of Duff v. Duff. The present action was begun December 12, 1894.

The decision in Randall v. Duff, 79 Cal. 115, 19 Pac. 532, and 21 Pac. 610, was given in favor of the plaintiffs herein upon the ground that, by reason of the commencement of the action of Duff v. Duff before the commencement by Ritchie of his action to foreclose, the purchaser under the judgment in that action had notice of the plaintiffs' claim, and purchased subject to their rights; but it was said in the opinion given upon a rehearing in that case (page 121, 79 Cal., and page 611, 21 Pac.): "If Ritchie had foreclosed without notice of William Duff's interest in the mortgaged estate, the foreclosure would have cut off his right of redemption, for precisely the same reason that the mortgage subjected his estate to a lien,—for the reason, that is to say, that no man can be allowed to mislead another to his injury." It is contended by the appellants herein, however, that this expression in the opinion is not conclusive of the present appeal, for the reason that the foreclosure of a mortgage is not complete until the time for redemption has expired and the sheriff's deed has been executed to the purchaser, and that Randall did not receive the sheriff's deed until after the commencement of the action of Duff v. Duff. In support of this proposition counsel for appellants have cited expressions in some opinions to the effect that the term "foreclosure" implies the execution of the sheriff's deed, as well as the sale under the judgment, and argue therefrom that in the present case the Huntoon mortgage was not foreclosed at the time the suit of Duff v. Duff was commenced. An examination of these cases, however, will show that in none of them was such a proposition decided by the court, and that the language used in the opinions was merely in the nature of an illustration. In Goldtree v. McAllister, 86 Cal. 104, 24 Pac. 801, it was used for the purpose of showing that when proceedings are instituted for the foreclosure of a mortgage, where the mortgaged property is situated in more than one county, the sale, as well as the deed to be executed thereunder, is to be made by the sheriff of the county in which the judgment was given, rather than that there should be several sales by the sheriffs of the different counties. The case of National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co. v. Union Ins. Co., 88 Cal. 497, 26 Pac. 509, merely holds that if a mortgagee buys in the property at the foreclosure sale, and a loss by fire occurs before the execution of the deed, there is not such a change of title as to deprive him of the right to the insurance money. It was said in Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 600, 29 Pac. 220: "The effect of the sale is of itself to extinguish the right and claim of all the defendants in the action, acquired subsequent to the date of the mortgage, and to vest in the purchaser the title of the mortgagor at the date of the mortgage, discharged of all such right and claim;" and in Randall v. Duff it was said: "The apparent title being in Robert P. Duff, a defendant in the foreclosure suits, we think that a purchaser at the sheriff's sales for value, and without notice, would take as good a title as if he had purchased directly from Robert P. Duff and taken a deed from him."

Although the right of a mortgagor to redeem the mortgaged premises is not cut off until the expiration of the time allowed for redemption, yet the purchaser at a sale under the judgment rendered in the foreclosure suit acquires the same interest in the property sold as does a purchaser in property sold under an ordinary money judgment. "Upon the sale the purchaser acquires all the right, title, interest and claim of the debtor thereto" (Code Civ. Proc. § 700), and only the right to redeem from this sale is left in the mortgagor. If a redemption is made by the mortgagor it is not from the lien of the mortgage, but from the sale under the judgment, and the amount which he is required to pay under such redemption is not the amount of the mortgage, but the amount for which the property was sold. Prior to the entry of the judgment the mortgagor holds the title to the property subject to the lien of the mortgage, and after the judgment is entered, and before the sale, he holds it subject to the lien of the judgment; but after the sale he has only a right of redemption, while the purchaser has the entire beneficial interest in the property, subject to be defeated by a redemption from the sale. "The execution of the deed gives to the purchaser at the sale no new title to the land purchased by him, but is merely evidence that his title has become absolute." Robinson v. Thornton, 102 Cal. 680, 34 Pac. 121. "The purchaser obtains an inchoate right, which may be perfected into a perfect title without any further act than the execution of a deed in pursuance of a sale already made. It is not a mere right to have a certain sum charged upon the property satisfied out of it. The sum before charged upon the land has already been satisfied by the sale to the extent of the amount bid and paid by the purchaser. The purchaser has already bought the land and paid for it. The sale is simply a conditional one, which may be defeated by the payment of a certain sum by certain designated parties within a certain limited time. If not paid within the time, the right to a conveyance becomes absolute without any further sale, or other act to be performed by anybody." Page v. Rogers, 31 Cal. 301. The purchaser is entitled to all the rents and profits of the property sold, or the value of its use and occupation from the time of the sale until the redemption (Code Civ. Proc. § 707), and if no redemption is made he is entitled to retain these rents and profits without any obligation to account therefor to the mortgagor.

Strictly speaking, however, there could have been no "foreclosure" of the plaintiffs herein in the suit upon the Huntoon mortgage. A foreclosure is limited to the mortgagor and those claiming under him, while the plaintiffs herein claim by title superior to both the mortgagor and the mortgagee in the action on the Huntoon mortgage, and in the respect that their title is paramount thereto it would not be affected by that suit; but, to the extent that they are estopped as against the mortgagee or the purchaser at the sale under his judgment from questioning the validity of the mortgagor's title, they are bound by the judgment as fully as if they had been made parties to the suit, and the extent of this estoppel is measured by the notice of their claim, given by them or by their predecessor. This is the purport of the decision in Randall v. Duff. To the extent that William R. Duff held his attorney out to the world as authorized to convey the land, these plaintiffs are as much estopped as he would have been to assert their rights against a bona fide purchaser for value, under a conveyance made by the attorney. A purchaser of real property at an execution sale stands in the same position as any other purchaser from the judgment debtor, and the certificate of sale which he receives from the sheriff is a conveyance, within the meaning of the recording act, by which he is protected from the unrecorded claims of others, of which he did not have notice. In Foorman v. Wallace, 75 Cal. 552, 17 Pac. 680, certain property standing of record in the name of a judgment debtor had been purchased by the defendant at a sale under execution against him, but more than two years prior to the sale the judgment debtor had conveyed the property to the plaintiff. At the time of the purchase by the defendant this conveyance had not been recorded, but was recorded prior to the execution of the sheriff's deed. To the contention of the plaintiff that the sale by the sheriff was inoperative as against his unrecorded deed, the court said: "The transfer is not perfect until the execution and delivery of the sheriff's deed, but by the doctrine of relation the deed when thus executed is to be deemed and taken as though executed at the date when the lien, of which it is the sequence, originated;" and held that the defendant's title obtained at the sheriff's sale was superior to that of the plaintiff under his unrecorded deed. See, also, Stewart v. Freeman, 22 Pa. St. 120; Atwood v. Bearss, 45 Mich. 469, 8 N. W. 55; McMurtrie v. Riddell, 9 Colo. 497, 13 Pac. 181; Byers v. Engles, 16 Ark. 543. By virtue of the principles thus declared, the title acquired by Randall under his purchase at the sheriff's sale must prevail over that held by the plaintiffs, of which he had no notice until after he had paid the purchase money and received the certificate of sale. He is fully protected in this purchase, and his right to this protection is the same whether he received the notice of the plaintiffs' claim before or after the execution of the sheriff's deed. He was a bona fide purchaser for value before the notice was given, and his rights cannot be affected by any notice given thereafter. The judgment and order are affirmed.

Cancellation of Deed—Inadequacy of Price—Ratification.

1. Mere inadequacy of price is insufficient to warrant setting aside a sale.

2. Where a person sick in the hospital makes a deed to it for a certain sum paid and an agreement for further care, and recovers, and for several weeks is able to transact business, and up to the day of his death is satisfied with the transaction, it amounts to a ratification thereof.

3. In a suit to set aside a sale made in consideration of a promissory note and board and care, plaintiff cannot recover unless she offers to return the note, and pay for the board and the care.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. Pierce, Judge.

Action by Margaret J. Barry, adminstratrix of John M. Little, against the St. Joseph's Hospital and Sanitarium of the Sisters of Mercy and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Trippet & Neale and C. F. Holland, for appellant. Parrish & Mossholder and Deney & Wright, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of John M. Little, deceased, brought this action to have a deed of three pueblo lots in the city of San Diego, executed by the decedent to the defendant St. Joseph's Hospital and Sanitarium, on February 5, 1895, canceled and set aside, upon the ground that at the time of its execution the grantor was sick and infirm, and mentally incompetent to attend to any kind of business, and that there was no sufficient consideration for its execution. At the trial certain issues were submitted to a jury, and the court made other findings, and gave judgment in favor of the defendants. From that judgment the plaintiff appealed, and has brought the case here on the judgment roll.

It appears from the findings that on February 5, 1895, Little was sick and confined to his bed in defendant's hospital, and was then in a condition of imbecility or great weakness of mind; that the deed was procured by no undue influence; that the consideration for the deed was not grossly inadequate; and that at the time of its execution the value of the property conveyed was $2,000. It further appears that the consideration for the deed was a written agreement entered into by the parties, under and in pursuance of which the defendant corporation executed and delivered to Little its promissory note for $500, and agreed to furnish him a private room in its hospital, and to support and maintain him for and during the term of his natural life, to furnish, provide, and prepare for him proper and sufficient food, and to give him proper care, nursing, and medical attendance in sickness, and, upon his death, to provide a respectable burial of his remains. The agreement also provided that, in case of the rescission thereof for any good and reasonable cause by either party, $40 per month from its date to the date of the rescission should be a just compensation for the board, lodging, and medical attendance furnished during said period. It further appears "that on the 26th day of February, 1895, said Little had so far recovered from his said sickness as to be able to be out of doors and walk about; and that on said 26th day of February said Little knew he had signed said deed and said contract for a home; and that for several weeks thereafter said Little was able to be out of doors, and to walk about, and to go into the business portion of said city, and able to transact business"; and that on the 27th day of May, 1895, he died. It also appears that on June 22, 1895, the defendant corporation sold and conveyed the said lots to the defendant Mary J. Moulton; and, as a defense to the action, it is alleged that she purchased the lots for the consideration of $1,450, without any notice or knowledge of the facts set out in the complaint; and it is admitted by appellant that, under these circumstances, the cancellation of the deed of February 5th had become impossible; but it is claimed that the court below could and should have awarded to the plaintiff the alternative relief of damages, and that the amount of damages should have been the difference between the value of the lots, $2,000, and the amount actually paid therefor by the grantee, namely, $500, evidenced by its promissory note, and $40 per month for the board, lodging, and medical attendance furnished the grantor during the 3 months and 22 days that elapsed between the date of the deed and his death.

It is argued for appellant that the consideration paid for the deed amounted to only $649.33, while the value of the property conveyed was at that time $2,000; and that such consideration must be held to have been grossly inadequate, notwithstanding the finding to the contrary; and hence that the judgment is not supported or justified by the findings, and should be reversed. But the consideration cannot be limited to the sum named. The agreement was that Little should be furnished with a private room, and board, care, and medical attendance in sickness, during the term of his natural life. He was then only 70 years old, and it may have been, and probably was, anticipated by both parties to the agreement that he would live for several years; and, if he had lived a little more than three years longer, the cost of his board, care, and medical attendance, at $40 per month, with the said $500, would have equaled the full value of the land. Besides, mere inadequacy of price is not alone sufficient to warrant a court in setting aside a sale. Hammond v. Wallace, 85 Cal. 522, 24 Pac. 837. Moreover, it appears that, shortly after executing the deed, Little recovered from his sickness, and was on the streets, and for several weeks was able to go into the business part of the city, and transact business, and knew that he had signed the deed and contract for a home; and, so far as appears, he was during all that time, and up to the day of his death, fully satisfied with the transaction. Under these circumstances, he must be held to have ratified and confirmed it. Under our statute, a contract may be rescinded for various reasons; but the party desiring to rescind must act promptly, and must restore, or offer to restore, to the other party, everything of value received from him under the contract. Civ. Code, §§ 1689, 1691. Here, conceding that the plaintiff acted with sufficient promptness in commencing the action, still it does not appear that she restored, or offered to restore, the promissory note received by Little, or to pay for the board, care, etc., which he received up to the time of his death. She cannot therefore avail herself of the statute. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

1. Where there was evidence that buildings were, in effect, completed before the claim of lien was filed, a finding to that effect will not be disturbed, though there was evidence of trifling imperfections remedied after such time.

2. Where the owner of a lot gives permission to his tenant to erect a building thereon of a certain character, and the tenant does so, he had such knowledge of the intended construction of the building as to render a notice posted by him after the lien was filed, on visiting the premises, too late, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1192, providing that buildings constructed on lands with the owner's knowledge shall be held to be constructed at his instance, and liable for a lien, unless, within three days after knowledge of the construction, he post notices thereon.

3. In an action to enforce a material man's lien, plaintiff can recover only for the materials furnished between the dates stated in the claim of lien, though the proof shows that materials were furnished on other dates. Goss v. Strelitz, 54 Cal. 640, followed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by the Santa Monica Lumber & Mill Company, a corporation, against J. H. Hege and William Naumann, to enforce a material man's lien. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant Hege appeals. Reversed.

Clarence A. Miller, for appellant. Tanner & Taft, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to foreclose a lien for materials furnished for and used in the construction, alteration, and repair of certain buildings on a lot of land in the town of Santa Monica, county of Los Angeles. Defendant Hege was the owner of the lot, and defendant Naumann was the lessee thereof. The materials were furnished by plaintiff upon the order of Naumann, and were of the alleged value of $244.59. Naumann suffered his default to be entered. Hege demurred to the complaint, and, his demurrer being overruled, answered. The case was tried, and the court found, among other things, that all the allegations of the complaint were true, except that $75 instead of $100, as stated therein, would be a reasonable attorney's fee, and, as conclusions of law, that there was "due to the plaintiff from the defendants the sum of $244.59, and the further sum of $1.45, expenses of recording said lien, and the further sum of $75, hereby allowed as attorney's fees; that defendant Dr. Wm. Naumann is personally liable therefor, and that the amounts aforesaid are, and each of them is, a valid lien against the real property described in the complaint, and of every part and parcel thereof, and plaintiff is entitled to a decree foreclosing its said lien against said real property." Judgment and decree were accordingly so entered, from which and from an order denying a new trial defendant Hege appeals. Several grounds for reversal are urged by appellant, but only the following need be noticed:

1. It is insisted that the claim of lien was prematurely filed, and hence that it conferred no rights. The statute provides that any person, save the original contractor, claiming the benefit of the chapter in regard to liens of mechanics and others upon real property, must "within thirty days after the completion of any building, improvement or structure, or after the completion of the alteration, addition to or repair thereof," file for record his claim of lien, etc., and that "any trivial imperfection in the said work, or in the construction of any building, improvement or structure, or of the alteration, addition to or repair thereof, shall not be deemed such a lack of completion as to prevent the filing of any lien," and also that "cessation from labor for thirty days" shall be deemed equivalent to a completion. Section 1187, Code Civ. Proc. It has been held that the filing of a claim of lien before the time authorized by the statute is premature, and no right to enforce the lien is thereby acquired. Roylance v. Hotel Co., 74 Cal. 273, 20 Pac. 573; Schwartz v. Knight, 74 Cal. 432, 16 Pac. 235; Willamette Steam Mills Lumbering & Manuf'g Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., 94 Cal. 229, 29 Pac. 629. It was alleged in the complaint and the court found that "the said buildings and repairs were completed on the 23d day of July, 1894," and that on the 11th day of August, 1894, the plaintiff duly filed its claim of lien, etc. We find in the record no evidence tending to show that the buildings and improvements were fully completed on the day named, or at what particular time they were completed. Plaintiff's witness Emerson testified that he worked as a carpenter on the buildings, and that he finished work in the latter part of June, "and the buildings were completed shortly after." And on cross-examination he testified that what he knew of matters that occurred after he quit work was what he saw on passing by the property, which was nearly every day; that he did not see any person working on the buildings after the date he stated they were completed; and that he did "not know whether on August 11, 1894, any sidewalks had been laid on the premises, or whether the ridge of the roof had been closed, or was watertight. The windows were puttied on the inside, but whether they were also puttied on the outside I do not know, or whether any cleats were on the windows, or whether the windows were rain tight, or whether all the battens were on the building, nor whether the bathtubs were entirely finished." Dr. Naumann testified for defendant that when the claim of lien was filed the buildings were unfinished in the particulars spoken of by Emerson, and in some other particulars, and that after August 11th he employed two or three workmen on the buildings for five or six days in all. Respondent contends that it is a case of conflicting evidence, and that under the settled rule in such cases the finding of the court cannot be disturbed, and also that the defects relied on were trivial imperfections, which could not prevent the filing of the lien. This contention, we think, should be sustained. The court below saw and heard the witnesses, and could determine better than we can whether the defects were in fact trivial imperfections, and the buildings were in effect completed before the claim of lien was filed.

2. The statute provides that every building constructed upon any lands with the knowledge of the owner shall be held to have been constructed at the instance of such owner, and the interest owned shall be subject to any lien filed in accordance with the provisions of the Code, unless such owner shall, within three days after he shall have obtained knowledge of the construction, or the intended construction, give notice that he will not be responsible for the same, by posting a notice in writing, etc. Section 1192, Code Civ. Proc. The court found that "the said constructions and repairs were made and the said timber and materials were furnished by plaintiff with the full knowledge and consent of defendant Hege from their inception, and the said Hege gave no notice, by posting a notice in writing to the effect that he would not be responsible for the same, nor did he give any notice at all, either by posting or otherwise." Appellant contends that this finding was not justified by the evidence, but we think it must be sustained. It appears that Naumann was a practicing physician, and that he leased the premises and took possession of them, with his family, consisting of his wife and six children, early in May, 1894. Appellant lived in Los Angeles, about 16 miles away, and a week or 10 days later he visited the place, and Naumann then asked of him permission to build another house on the lot. Appellant gave him permission to build a small shanty, half of wood and half of glass, far enough away from the dwelling already on the place not to interfere with it in any shape or manner, to be perfectly detached, in the rear of the lot, and without fire in or about it. And in the latter part of July, or first of August, Naumann wrote to appellant and asked permission to put up another building; and the latter answered that he might do so, but it must have no fire, and must not be attached to the house. Naumann proceeded to erect the buildings in controversy, and placed them in the rear of, and in part adjoining, the dwelling house on the lot. A day or two after the claim of lien was filed, appellant again visited the place, and then posted notice that he would not be responsible. Under these circumstances, we think it must be held that appellant had knowledge of the construction or the intended construction of the buildings, and that his notice was not posted in time. And the fact that the buildings were not placed on the rear end of the lot, and perhaps were not constructed as appellant intended they should be, cannot be availed of, as against the respondent, that knew nothing of his intentions in these respects.

3. It is stated in respondent's claim of lien that "on or about the 1st day of July, 1894," Dr. Naumann, as lessee of said premises, entered into a contract, not in writing, with the Santa Monica Lumber & Mill Company, under and by which said company furnished said lumber and materials, and that said contract was fully performed on the part of said company, and was completed on July 14, 1894. It is alleged in the complaint that the contract was entered into on the 1st day of July, but in the findings the language used is the same as in the claim of lien. At the trial it was proved, on behalf of the plaintiff, that its first charge for materials furnished was made on May 24th, and its last on July 14th; that the aggregate of its charges was $419.59, of which sum $175 had been paid, leaving still due and unpaid $244.59; and that after June 25th there were only four charges, which were made in July, and amounted to $29.02, and the payments after that date amounted to $115. Appellant contends that, at most, he could be held responsible only for the materials furnished between the dates named in the claim of lien; and in support of this contention he cites the case of Goss v. Strelitz, 54 Cal. 640. That was an action to foreclose a lien for materials furnished for the construction of a building, and in the claim of lien it was stated that the materials were furnished between February 20 and April 14, 1877. It appeared that some of the materials were furnished before February 20th, but it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover only for the materials furnished between the dates stated in the claim. That case seems to be directly in point here, and under the law as there declared the respondent was not entitled to recover for materials furnished before, "on or about the 1st day of July." The words "on or about" leave the time when the contract was made somewhat indefinite and uncertain, but we think the language used cannot be held to extend back to the 24th of May, and that it should be limited to time alleged in the complaint. It follows that the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BRITT, C.

Ex parte O'BRIEN. (Cr. 255.)

DIVORCE—ALIMONY.

Where, on rendering a decree of divorce, the question of alimony is reserved, a subsequent order awarding alimony is not void.

Application by one O'Brien for a discharge on habeas corpus. Denied.

Beatty & Beatty, for petitioner. Henley, Bigelow & Costello, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. In this proceeding the order of the superior court amending the original decree in the case of O'Brien v. O'Brien is conclusive upon me, and the decree as amended shows that the question of alimony was reserved. This being so, the subsequent order or supplemental decree awarding alimony is not void, and the court did not exceed its jurisdiction in imprisoning the petitioner for his refusal to pay the sums decreed to be paid. The prisoner is remanded.

MASON v. LUCE et al. (L. A. 116.)

LIMITATIONS—ACCRUAL OF CAUSE—MORTGAGES—RIGHT TO FORECLOSE—WAIVER—BILLS AND NOTES—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

1. Where a mortgage provides that on default in payment of interest the whole sum of principal and interest shall become due, and the mortgage may be foreclosed, limitations begin to run only when the note matures according to its terms, and not on default in payment of interest. Pelloc v. Davis, 38 Cal. 242, followed.

2. Where a mortgage provides that on default in payment of interest the whole sum of principal and interest shall become due, the mortgagee, by accepting payment of interest after default, waives the forfeiture. Belloc v. Davis, 38 Cal. 242, followed.

3. Though a mortgage does not secure attorney's fees stipulated for in the note secured, a personal judgment for such fees may be rendered in the suit in which the mortgage is foreclosed.

4. A stipulation in a note for attorney's fees in case of suit is valid.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. Pierce, Judge.

Action by John Mason against M. A. Luce and another to foreclose a mortgage. From a decree of foreclosure, and from a personal judgment against defendants for attorney's fees, they appeal. Affirmed.

M. A. Luce, for appellants. William H. Fuller and Clarence L. Barker, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff commenced this action on January 29, 1895, to foreclose a mortgage executed by the defendants, M. A. Luce and Adelaide M. Luce, on February 18, 1890, to secure payment of their promissory note for $4,000, made on the same day, and due one year after date. The note bore interest at the rate of 13 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly, and, if not so paid, then to become part of the principal and bear a like rate of interest. It also contained the following clause: "And we further agree that, in the event of suit being brought against us, then there shall be added to any judgment against us rendered in said suit, as counsel fees, an additional sum of five per centum, in like gold coin, upon the amount of the principal and interest thereof accrued at the time of the entry of such judgment; or, if paid before judgment, and after action commenced, then on the amount at the date of payment." The mortgage stated that it was given to secure the payment of the principal and interest of the said promissory note, a copy of which was set out, and then contained the following clause: "And the mortgagor hereby covenants with the mortgagee that if default be made in the payment of the interest, or any part thereof, according to the tenor of said note, then the whole sum of principal and interest shall become immediately due, and the mortgagee may proceed with suit of foreclosure, and sell the mortgaged premises in the manner provided by law." The answer of defendants alleged—First, that the provision in the note in regard to counsel fees "was in the nature of a penalty imposed upon said defendants in case they should fail to pay the note when the same should become due," and that 5 per cent. was not a reasonable counsel fee, or any other sum over and above $50; and, second, it set up the provision above quoted from the mortgage, and alleged "that on November 18, 1890, there was due and payable upon said note a quarter of a year's interest, but that said defendants failed to pay the same at that time, and made default in the payment of the interest provided in said note and mortgage, and that the same thereupon became due." It then alleged that the cause of action stated in the complaint was barred by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. To the second defense set up in the answer the plaintiff interposed a general demurrer, and the same was sustained. Subsequently the case came on for trial, and was submitted. The court found that all the allegations of the complaint were true, and all the denials and allegations of the answer were untrue; that there was due and owing to the plaintiff from the defendants the sum of $5,632.47 for principal and interest of the said promissory note, and $14 costs of suit, aggregating $5,646.47, which was secured by the mortgage, and the further sum of $281.62 as and for an attorney's fee, as provided in said note, which was not secured by the mortgage. A decree in the usual form was accordingly entered, foreclosing the mortgage and directing a sale of the mortgaged premises and the application of the proceeds, after paying the expenses of the sale, to the payment of the said sum of $5,646.47 and interest thereon, and also directing that in case of a deficiency a judgment for the deficiency be docketed against the defendants. A personal judgment against the defendants was also entered for the said sum of $281.62. From this decree and judgment the defendants appealed, and have brought the case here without any statement or bill of exceptions.

1. Appellants contend that the action was barred by the statute of limitations, and that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to their answer. It was alleged in the complaint that payments of interest due and accrued were made from time to time, and indorsed on said promissory note, and that the date of the last payment was January 7, 1895. The answer did not deny this allegation, but simply alleged that a quarterly installment of interest was due and payable upon the note on November 18, 1890, and "that said defendants failed to pay the same at that time." From all this the natural and necessary inference is that the installment of interest referred to was subsequently paid by defendants. In Belloc v. Davis, 38 Cal. 242, the action was brought to foreclose a mortgage given to secure payment of a promissory note for $16,000, executed and delivered on the 11th day of October, 1861, payable six months after date, with interest payable monthly, and with the following clause in the note, to wit: "And, in case default be made in any payment of interest when the same shall become due as aforesaid, then the whole amount of principal and interest to become due and payable immediately upon such default." The monthly interest which became due from February, 1862, to November, 1862, was not paid as stipulated in the note. The plaintiff commenced his action on the 7th of April, 1866, to foreclose the mortgage, and the defense relied upon was the statute of limitations. The note became due and payable, on its face, on the 11th of April, 1862, and the action was commenced four days less than four years from the maturity of the note, but more than four years after the first default was made in the payment of interest. The court said: "Our statute of limitations requires that an action to foreclose a mortgage shall be commenced within four years from the time 'when the cause of action accrues.' The question for our decision, therefore, is, when did this cause of action accrue, in the sense of the statute? Did the statute commence to run from the time of the first default in the payment of interest, or only on the expiration of the term of credit specified in the note, to wit, six months from its date? The question is novel, and somewhat embarrassing; but our conclusion is that the cause of action, within the true meaning of the statute, accrued at the expiration of the credit fixed by the note, to wit, six months after its date. The provision in the note to the effect that in case of default in the payment of interest the whole amount of principal and interest shall 'become due and payable immediately upon such default' is evidently in the nature of a penalty, inserted for the benefit of the creditor." It was also held that, by accepting the payment of the interest after default has been made, the creditor waives all benefit from the default, and thereafter the rights and obligations of both parties continue, without regard to the forfeiture. That case is directly in point here, and we think it correctly declares the law applicable to such cases, and should be followed. See, also, Watts v. Creighton, 85 Iowa, 154, 52 N. W. 12; Richardson v. Warner, 28 Fed. 343; Plow Co. v. Webb, 141 U. S. 616, 12 Sup. Ct. 100; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 192. It follows that the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to defendants' answer.

2. Appellants also contend that the court erred in rendering a personal judgment against them for the amount found due for attorney's fees, for the reason that the stipulation in the note for attorney's fees was void. It has been several times held by this court that such a stipulation in a promissory note renders the note nonnegotiable. Adams v. Seaman, 82 Cal. 636, 23 Pac. 53; Bank v. Babcock, 94 Cal. 96, 29 Pac. 415; Bank v. Falkenhan, 94 Cal. 141, 29 Pac. 866. In so holding, the court could not have considered the stipulation void, since, if it were void, it could not have the effect attributed to it. This contention cannot, therefore, be sustained. But, if this be so, it is still insisted that no judgment for the attorney's fees could be entered in this action for foreclosure, and that plaintiff must recover the same, if at all, in an action at law brought for that purpose. Clemens v. Luce, 101 Cal. 432, 35 Pac. 1032, was an action similar to this, and the court, speaking upon the point in hand, said: "As the obligation for the payment of attorney's fees, although not secured by the mortgage, was included in the instrument by which the secured debt was evidenced, and provided that judgment might be entered for counsel fees in such suit, it was properly included in the same action; but the right to a judgment for such fees was the same as it would have been in an action upon a promissory note with such a clause, of which no part was secured by mortgage." If in that action the obligation for the payment of attorney's fees was "properly included," then it was so in this action, and we see no reason why the relief demanded and awarded might not be granted. See, also, Hildreth v. Williams (Cal.) 33 Pac. 1113. We advise that the decree and judgment be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

VENDOR'S LIEN—LIMITATIONS.

In consideration of the transfer of lands, the purchaser agreed to pay an outstanding note of the vendor. It was agreed that, in case of default at the maturity of the note, the vendor might collect from the purchaser the amount of the defaulted payment. The purchaser failed to pay the note. Held that, since the right to collect the purchase money accrued at the maturity of the note, the vendor's lien was barred after four years from that date, under Civ. Code, § 2911, which limits the life of a lien to the time within which an action can be brought on the principal obligation.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by the California Savings Bank of San Diego against W. Parrish, D. Choate, and others. From a decree giving defendant Choate a superior lien, and from an order refusing a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

N. J. Pillsbury, D. Collier, Jr., and D. L. Murdock, for appellant. T. Z. Tucker, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage made by the defendant W. Parrish to the plaintiff on certain lots in the city of San Diego. Defendant D. Choate answered, and filed a cross complaint, in which he set up and asked to have foreclosed, a vendor's lien upon the lots described in plaintiff's mortgage. Plaintiff demurred to the cross complaint, upon the ground, among others, that the lien set up, if any existed, was barred by sections 339 and 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The demurrer was overruled, and thereupon plaintiff answered the cross complaint, alleging in substance that the said lien had been waived by Choate. The case was tried, and the court found the facts, and, among other things, the amount due from defendant Parrish to the plaintiff and to the defendant Choate, and, as a conclusion of law, that Choate had a vendor's lien on each and every part of the lands involved in the action, and had not waived the same, and that said lien was not barred by the statute of limitations. A decree was accordingly entered that the mortgaged premises be sold, and the proceeds of the sale, after paying the costs and expenses thereof, be applied—First, to the payment of the amount found due to Choate and his costs; and, second, to the payment of the amount found due to plaintiff and its costs. From this decree, and an order refusing a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

The only question in the case is: Did Choate have a vendor's lien, which was prior to the lien of plaintiff's mortgage, and was he entitled to be first paid out of the proceeds of the sale? The facts of the case are in substance as follows: On September 12, 1888, defendants Choate and Parrish executed to one Lillian M. Cullen their joint promissory note for $3,000, payable two years after date, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, payable monthly, and, if not so paid, to be compounded. This note was given for a balance due to Cullen from Choate for the transfer by her to him of an interest claimed by her in certain lands, including those involved in this action. On September 29, 1888, Choate was the owner in fee of all the lands involved herein, and on that day he sold and transferred the same, by a grant deed to said Parrish, for the sum of $2,500; but no part of this purchase price was then or has ever since been paid by him. At the time of the transfer, and as a part of the transaction, Parrish executed and delivered to Choate a written agreement by which he undertook to pay for Choate $2,500 of the Cullen note, and he stipulated that "in case I shall fail at any time to pay the interest on $2,500 of said note when it falls due, or shall fail to pay the $2,500 of the principal of said note when it falls due, then and in that case the said D. Choate, his heirs or assigns, shall be entitled to collect of me on this agreement the sum I am so in default of paying." Parrish failed to pay any part of said sum or the interest thereon, and on September 1, 1892, Choate was compelled to pay, and did pay, the whole thereof. Prior to August 5, 1891, Parrish was indebted to the National Bank of San Diego in a large sum of money, for which he had given to the bank his promissory notes. This indebtedness one J. W. Collins had assumed and undertaken to pay, and at his request, for the purpose of paying it off and transferring the indebtedness to the plaintiff savings bank, Parrish obtained from the savings bank a loan of $8,500, for which, on the day last named, he executed the note and mortgage in suit. At the time of making the loan, Collins was a director of the savings bank, and acted as its general manager. He attended to the business of making its loans, and all negotiations and conversations in regard to this loan were had with him; and, before the mortgage was executed, he was informed by Parrish of the condition of the property to be mortgaged, and that its purchase price had not been paid. Prior to February 13, 1892, Choate learned that Parrish had mortgaged the property to the savings bank, and made complaint to him about his having done so before he had paid the purchase price of said lands. Parrish then informed Choate that he was fully protected by his vendor's lien, and that the mortgage was subject to such lien. Choate was not satisfied with this, but, fearing that purchasers or incumbrancers in good faith and for value might intervene, he insisted on having a mortgage executed by Parrish to himself. Thereupon Parrish executed to Choate a mortgage, bearing date February 13, 1892, on the lands mortgaged to the plaintiff and certain other lands, which were also subject to a prior mortgage, to secure payment by him of that part of the Cullen note which he obligated himself to pay by his written agreement of September 29, 1888. When that mortgage was executed, it was expressly agreed between the parties to it that Choate would not, and did not thereby, waive his vendor's lien; and at that time the value of the land involved in this action did not exceed the sum of $1,500, and the value of the other lands covered by the mortgage did not exceed a like sum. On August 28, 1894, Choate, fearing that the Cullen note was about to be barred by the statute of limitations, filed a complaint to foreclose his said mortgage, making Parrish and the savings bank parties defendant, but no summons was issued, and nothing further was done in the case. On May 26, 1895, plaintiff filed its complaint in this action, and on July 27, 1895, Choate filed his answer and cross complaint.

The first question to be considered is: Did it appear upon the face of Choate's cross complaint that his right to foreclose his vendor's lien, if any existed, was barred by the statute of limitations? If it did so appear, then the demurrer to the cross complaint upon that ground should have been sustained, and the other questions discussed by counsel as to the waiver of the lien may be disregarded. The facts are set out in the cross complaint, and it appears, therefore, that when, on September 28, 1888, Choate conveyed the land in question to Parrish, the latter was to pay the purchase money ($2,500) on the Cullen note, which was to become due two years after its date; and he obligated himself to so pay the money by a written agreement which provided that if he should fail to pay the interest as it fell due, or the principal sum when the note fell due, then Choate should be entitled to collect from him the money which he had neglected to pay. The purchase money, therefore, became due and payable when the note matured, and a cause of action to recover it then arose in favor of Choate. It was not necessary for him to wait, before he could institute such an action, till he paid the note himself. But the note matured, and the cause of action accrued, more than four years before this action was commenced and the cross complaint was filed.

Our Civil Code contains the following provisions:

"Sec. 3046. One who sells real property has a vendor's lien thereon, independent of possession, for so much of the price as remains unpaid and unsecured otherwise than by the personal obligation of the buyer."

"Sec. 2911. A lien is extinguished by the lapse of the time within which, under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, an action can be brought upon the principal obligation."

Here it appears that the time within which, under the provisions of the Code, an action could have been brought upon the principal obligation, had expired before the cross complaint was filed. The lien was therefore extinguished, and the demurrer should have been sustained. The decree and order appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to sustain the demurrer to the cross complaint.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BRITT, C.

McFARLAND and HENSHAW, JJ. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the decree and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to sustain the demurrer to the cross complaint.

TEMPLE, J. I concur in the judgment.

PEOPLE v. DURRANT. (Cr. 196.) [1]

Murder—Selection of Jury List—Special Venire—Impaneling of Jury—Review of Verdict—Proof of Motive—Contempt Proceedings—Evidence—Trial—Argument of Counsel—Grounds for New Trial—Newspaper Articles.

1. The minutes of the secretary of the judges of the superior court of San Francisco county, showing the selection and return of the jury list, as required by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 204–208, may be amended, when incomplete, to conform to the facts.

2. On a challenge to the panel, on the ground that the jury list was not legally selected by the judges, the testimony of the presiding judge is admissible to supplement the record when incomplete, and to show the action actually taken.

3. The fact that some of the persons selected as jurors in making up the jury list do not possess the necessary qualifications is not a ground for challenge to the panel.

4. Under the provision of the present constitution (article 22, § 11) retaining in force all existing laws relative to the judicial system, and making them applicable to the new system, Code Civ. Proc. § 204, providing for the selection of jurors in San Francisco county, did not become unconstitutional, and the subsequent amendments to make it conform to the present system are valid.

5. The fact that jurors were summoned by special venire, without having first exhausted all the names upon the regular list, is not ground for challenge to the panel.

6. The action of the court in disallowing a challenge to a juror for cause will not be reviewed where the defendant did not challenge the juror peremptorily, nor exhaust his peremptory challenges.

7. Under Pen. Code, § 1068, providing that a court may for cause permit a challenge to be taken to a juror after he is sworn, and before the jury is completed, a court may permit the re-examination of a juror by either the people or the defendant on a matter coming to their knowledge after his acceptance, and before the completion of the panel, and may, in its discretion, allow a peremptory challenge to be taken, though such examination discloses no ground of challenge for cause.

8. The allowance of a peremptory challenge to a juror by the prosecution is without prejudice to the rights of the defendant, where none of the jurors subsequently selected are challenged by him, and he has not exhausted his peremptory challenges.

9. The correctness of a verdict which has been sustained by the trial court will not be reviewed on appeal on arguments directed to the credibility of the witnesses or the weight to be given to their testimony.

10. A verdict of conviction will not be disturbed on appeal, as unsupported by evidence, unless the evidence to sustain it is so slight as to make clear the inference that it must have been rendered under the influence of passion or prejudice.

11. While absence of proof of a motive for the commission of a crime is a circumstance in favor of the defendant, such proof is not indispensable to a conviction.

12. The issuance of process for contempt charged to have been committed by the publishers of newspapers during the progress of a cause rests entirely in the sound discretion of the court, and cannot be controlled by the parties, nor have they any right of appeal from the court's action in the matter.

13. Proof that a witness is a practicing physician and surgeon, and that he performed an autopsy on the body of a dead person, qualifies him to give an opinion as to the means used to produce death, it being conceded that the question is a proper one for expert testimony.

14. The use of a dressmaker's frame in court for convenience in exhibiting the clothing of a murdered woman, which was introduced in evidence, and in regard to which much testimony was taken, was not prejudicial to the defendant, no claim being made that the frame represented the height, size, or figure of the deceased.

15. It is the right and duty of a trial court, on its own motion, to curtail the cross-examination of a witness on a collateral matter, which is wholly irrelevant, and as to which the witness could not be impeached.

16. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2066 (which gives a witness the right to be protected from irrelevant, improper, or insulting questions), where a lady as a witness had stated that she had seen the defendant since a date named, a following question, "That is, you imagine you have?" was properly excluded by the court.

17. A photograph of a person charged to have been murdered, though taken two years before her death, is admissible in evidence when shown to be a fair representation of her as she appeared at the time of her death.

18. Where a witness has given testimony in apparent variance with his testimony on the preliminary examination, it is not improper for the party calling him to call his attention to his former testimony, for the purpose of refreshing his recollection.

19. It is not error to overrule an objection to a question the answer to which may be relevant, though, when given, it proves not to be.

20. While a hypothetical question must be based on facts in evidence, it need not embrace all the facts shown, nor be limited to such facts, but may be addressed to any reasonable theory which may be drawn from them.

21. While an opinion is not admissible on a matter of common knowledge or experience, its admission is harmless error where it accords with such common knowledge.

22. A witness for the prosecution testified that he fitted certain tools, found apparently in the possession of another than defendant, in marks on a door, which they did not fit, after which defendant introduced the tools in evidence. Held, that it was proper to permit the prosecution to introduce the door in evidence on rebuttal, and to have the witness fit the tools to the marks in the presence of the jury.

23. A question to a defendant as a witness, asking if he had not prepared a statement, which he sealed and delivered to his attorneys, with certain instruction as to opening it, is not subject to objection on the ground that such statement would be privileged, the question being merely preliminary, and such contents not being privileged as to any one acquiring a knowledge of them otherwise than through the attorneys.

24. Where a question to a witness by the prosecution is admitted over objection, on the ground that it is preliminary, with a statement by the court that, if not followed up, the testimony will be stricken out on motion, and, the answer being adverse to the prosecution, the matter is dropped, the defendant is not prejudiced, and will be presumed to have been satisfied to allow the testimony to remain unless he moves to strike it out.

25. The fact that a person was brought before the court for contempt during the trial of a defendant for murder, charged with having said to a juror in the case, "If you don't hang him [defendant], we will hang you," and was given a hearing in the presence of the jury, and punished for the contempt, was not prejudicial to the rights of defendant, who did not instigate nor conduct the proceeding, and made no request that the jury be excluded.

26. The use by a district attorney, in argument, of an empty box, to illustrate the quantity of gas which could leak in a given time and under circumstances testified to, was not error prejudicial to the defendant; the jury being cautioned by both the attorney and the court that the box was not in evidence, nor any proof of its capacity, and that the statements of the attorney were merely by way of argument.

27. The fact that the newspapers of a city where a murder was committed continued to publish sensational articles in regard to the crime, and after defendant's arrest, both before and during his trial, treated him as the undoubted criminal, and aroused public sentiment strongly against him, does not alone show that he did not have a fair trial, and will not require the granting of a new trial, where a satisfactory jury was obtained without defendant's having exhausted his peremptory challenges, and each juror makes affidavit that he neither read nor heard read any of the publications during the trial, and at all times obeyed the injunctions of the court, and was not influenced in any way by anything outside the evidence, and where it does not appear that defendant was prevented from making his full defense.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. Murphy, Judge.

W. H. T. Durrant was convicted of murder, and, from the judgment and an order denying a new trial, appeals. Affirmed.

John H. Dickinson and Eugene N. Deuprey, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and W. H. Anderson, for the People.

HENSHAW, J. The defendant, convicted of the murder of Blanche Lamont, prosecutes these appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying him a new trial.

Reviewing the specifications of error in their natural sequence, rather than in the order of their presentation in argument, the first which invite attention are defendant's challenges to the panel. He contended that the list of trial jurors had not been selected or returned as required by sections 204 to 209 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In support of this contention, he offered the record of the proceedings of the judges of the superior court in the matter. This record, kept by the secretary of the judges, was incomplete. Under direction of the presiding judge, the secretary amended his record, and, as amended, his minutes showed a compliance with the law. The presiding judge was permitted to testify to the facts attending the selecting and listing of the trial jurors, from which it appeared that the proceedings of the judges were due and regular. Defendant's objection that the original minutes of the secretary were the sole evidence admissible upon the question cannot be sustained. It was the inherent right of the court to correct its records to make them comport with verity. Kaufman v. Shain, 111 Cal. 16, 43 Pac. 393. The secretary's minutes are not made exclusive evidence of the proceedings they undertake to record. It was the duty of the trial judge to determine the facts, and no better evidence could have been offered than that of the presiding judge, himself an actor in and creator of them.

The further objection that the judges failed to comply with the law, in that, of the jurors selected, some did not possess the requisite qualifications, is equally untenable as a ground of challenge to the panel. People v. Young, 108 Cal. 12, 41 Pac. 281. To hold mandatory the provisions of section 205 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and thus to require of the judges the strictest compliance with the law in the matter of the selection of jurors, would be to the last degree unreasonable. They would then be obliged to lay aside all other business, and devote their time for days, and perhaps weeks, to personal inquiry, inspection, and examination of 3,600 men (the number of jurors called for), and, after this labor, to decide, at the peril of a rejection of the whole panel, that to the final name upon the list each man possessed all the qualifications of a juror. The provisions of the section are directory, and a substantial compliance with them is here shown, and is all that may be demanded.

Section 204 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that in counties, and cities and counties, of more than 100,000 inhabitants, the judges of the superior court shall select and return trial jurors. Though the section was amended in 1881, and again in 1893, the provisions relative to cities and counties of over 100,000 inhabitants continued unchanged so far as affects this consideration. Before the present constitution went into operation, the jurors were selected by the district judges of the several judicial districts within the city and county of San Francisco, the county judge, the probate judge, and the judge of the municipal criminal court. The amendments to the section made after the adoption of the present constitution were designed to meet the new judicial system provided for by that instrument. This section was a part of the Code before the adoption of the existing constitution, and by that instrument (article 22, § 11) all laws relative to the judicial system then in force were made applicable to the new system therein provided for. Section 204 of the Code of Civil Procedure was not unconstitutional under our earlier organic law, and did not become unconstitutional by virtue of the present one. To the contrary, the section was expressly retained in force.

The court summoned jurors by special venire. To the panel thus formed, defendant objected. The objection was not based upon section 1064 of the Penal Code, but upon the ground that the regular jury list had not been exhausted. This is not a ground for challenge. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 226, 227; Levy v. Wilson, 69 Cal. 111, 10 Pac. 272; People v. Vincent, 95 Cal. 425, 30 Pac. 581. The court may summon jurors by special venire without exhausting all of the names upon the regular list.

To the jurors Crocker and Nathan challenges were interposed for actual bias, under subdivision 2 of section 1073 of the Penal Code. The challenges were disallowed. Whether or not the jurors Crocker and Nathan, or either of them, were shown to be disqualified by actual bias against the defendant, and, therefore, whether or not the trial court erred in disallowing the challenges interposed to them, is not, under the facts presented by the record, a subject for consideration by this court. The challenges for cause having been disallowed, the defendant did not see fit to exercise his right of peremptory challenge upon either of the jurors, but accepted them both. When the jury was completed, defendant still had in reserve, and unemployed, 8 of his 20 peremptory challenges. It has in this state been held in numerous instances that if the judge errs in disallowing a challenge for cause, and the defendant thereafter excuses the obnoxious juror under a peremptory challenge, and the jury is completed without the exhaustion by the defense of all of its peremptory challenges, the error of the court will not be reviewed upon appeal, because no injury could have resulted to the defendant. People v. Gatewood, 20 Cal. 146; People v. Gaunt, 23 Cal. 156; People v. Weil, 40 Cal. 268; People v. McGungill, 41 Cal. 429. The situation here differs somewhat from that presented by the cases last above cited. But the reasoning which governed those decisions is strictly applicable to present consideration. The defendant may not have reviewed an error which he has invited or has failed to avoid by the legal means at his command. If the defendant feared to put himself upon trial before the jurors whom he had challenged, it was his duty to have availed himself of the liberal aid which the law affords, and to have excused them from the box. If, in so doing, he lessened the number of his peremptory challenges to such an extent that it appears they were exhausted before the completion of the jury, he may well be heard to urge in argument that, by reason of the erroneous ruling, the number of his peremptory challenges was improperly curtailed, and he was deprived of a legal right; but if it is shown, as here, that the two jurors in question were accepted and allowed to remain, when the defense could have exercised peremptory challenges upon them, and, further, that, at the time when the jury was completed, there was still held in reserve by the defense nearly half of its peremptory challenges, if, under these circumstances, error was committed by the trial court, it was either permitted by the defense, or acquiesced in by its failure to exercise its legal right, and the ruling will not be reviewed. There will be found in the cases some slight diversity of opinion upon the question, but the great weight of authority is in support of the view above expressed. Thompson on Trials (section 120) thus declares the principle: "It is a rule of paramount importance that errors committed in overruling challenges for cause are not grounds of reversal, unless it be shown an objectionable juror was forced upon the challenging party after he had exhausted his peremptory challenges. If his peremptory challenges remain unexhausted, so that he might have excluded the objectionable juror by that means, he has no ground of complaint." The rule above stated finds overwhelming support from the authorities, of which a few may be cited: State v. Gooch, 94 N. C. 987; Williams v. State, 30 Tex. App. 354, 17 S. W. 408; State v. Le Duff, 46 La. Ann. 546, 15 South. 397; State v. Yetzer (Iowa) 66 N. W. 737; State v. Hartley (Nev.) 40 Pac. 372; People v. Aplin, 86 Mich. 393, 49 N. W. 148; Brumback v. Bank, 46 Neb. 540, 65 N. W. 198; Prewitt v. Lambert, 19 Colo. 7, 34 Pac. 684; Spies v. People, 122 Ill. 1, 12 N. E. 865, and 17 N. E. 898.

Nine jurors had been sworn to try the case. At this stage of the proceedings the district attorney sought and obtained permission of the court to reopen the examination of one of these (Brown), and to question him upon matters which had come to his knowledge since his acceptance as a juror. Permission was granted over objection and exception of defendant. At the conclusion of the examination, the district attorney asked leave to interpose a peremptory challenge to the juror. Leave was given, and this ruling is assigned as error. Section 1068 of the Penal Code provides that a challenge (either peremptory or for cause) must be taken when the juror appears, and before he is sworn to try the cause; but the court may, for cause, permit it to be taken after the juror is sworn, and before the jury is completed. It was not error, therefore, for the court to permit a re-examination of the juror upon matters coming to the knowledge of the people or defendant after his acceptance, and before the completion of the jury. The course here pursued was that followed in People v. Bemmerly, 87 Cal. 117, 25 Pac. 266, and approved by this court.

The new matter upon which the juror Brown was questioned touched his connection with the case of one Howell, who had been tried in a federal court for passing counterfeit money. Brown had been a juror in the case, and, with others, had voted for Howell's acquittal. The result was a disagreement of the jury, and a mistrial. Rumors that the Howell jury had been approached and corrupted were current, and the next federal grand jury instituted an investigation. Brown was summoned before it, and interrogated as to his knowledge of the matter; but, in justice, it should be added that the record before us does not disclose that his own integrity was under assault. There was undoubtedly not enough in this to warrant the interposition of a challenge for cause; but section 1068 of the Penal Code contemplates also the taking of a peremptory challenge, as was done in this case. When the Code says that the court may, for cause, permit the challenge to be taken, it means, as the language has been interpreted, that it is not a matter of right to either party, but may be permitted in the exercise of a sound discretion (People v. Reynolds, 16 Cal. 128; People v. Montgomery, 53 Cal. 576; People v. Bemmerly, 87 Cal. 117, 25 Pac. 266); and, as said in People v. Montgomery, in granting or refusing permission it will not be presumed that the court has abused its discretion. In all matters not ordered by inflexible rule, no set formula applicable to every case may be laid down to govern and measure the exercise of discretionary power. As each case arises, its determination must rest upon its peculiar facts, and what might be an abuse under one set of circumstances might be a fair exercise under another. In every case careful regard will be had to see whether or not the substantial rights of a defendant have been jeoparded or impaired, but, if they have not, then the ruling is not to be disturbed, for, at the worst, it could be but a technical error, which the courts are commanded to disregard. Pen. Code, § 1404. Having in view the nature of the district attorney's inquiry, and his manifest suspicion that the juror was or had been approachable and venal, it might well be that, as a result of the inquiry, the juror was left in a state of extreme hostility to the prosecuting officer. He, upon his part, had failed to establish ground for a challenge for cause, and, if he could not exercise a peremptory challenge, would be compelled to try and to argue his case before a juror whose attitude naturally was one of bitter antagonism to him. It may safely be said that, however disinterested a juror might be as between the litigants, no advocate cherishing his client's interests would willingly accept one whom he believed to be his personal enemy. These obvious considerations were in the mind of the trial judge. Moreover, the defendant had not exhausted his peremptory challenges. Four other jurors were obtained, to none of whom was any challenge taken by the defense: and, as has been said, when the jury was finally completed, there remained to the defense, unexercised, 8 of its 20 peremptory challenges. The ruling by which the prosecution was allowed to interpose the peremptory challenge worked no hardship to the defendant. His right was to a fair and impartial jury, not to a jury composed of any particular individuals. When it appears that a fair and impartial jury was obtained, it is the general rule that an error of the court in allowing a challenge, and permitting a juror to be excused, is not subject to review. Territory v. Roberts, 9 Mont. 12, 22 Pac. 132; State v. Klauseman, 53 Minn. 541, 55 N. W. 741; State v. Chin Ling, 16 Or. 419, 18 Pac. 844; Snow v. Weeks, 75 Me. 105; Tompson v. Douglass, 35 W. Va. 337, 13 S. E. 1015; John D. C. v. State, 16 Fla. 554; State v. Ward, 39 Vt. 225; Watson v. State, 63 Ind. 548; Tatum v. Young, 1 Port. (Ala.) 298; Richards v. State (Neb.) 53 N. W. 1028. It cannot be said, under the circumstances shown, that any injury resulted to defendant from the ruling, or that any abuse of discretion is shown. People v. Arceo, 32 Cal. 40; People v. Murray, 85 Cal. 350, 24 Pac. 666; People v. Murphy, 45 Cal. 137.

The contention of appellant next to be considered is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, and that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, in this: that the evidence fails to show how, when, or where Blanche Lamont was murdered, or that the defendant in any way was instrumental in causing her death. No small part of appellant's argument herein is devoted to an attack upon the credibility of the witnesses for the prosecution. In this attack the personal characters of many are assailed, and the unreliability of the evidence of nearly all is insisted upon. It here again becomes necessary to repeat that arguments touching the credibility of witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony—arguments eminently proper to be addressed to the jury or to the judge upon motion for a new trial—are not for our consideration. This court sits in criminal cases solely for the correction of errors at law. If, in any criminal case, there be evidence adduced logically tending and legally sufficient to prove the guilt of a defendant, this court cannot and will not disturb the jury's determination, even under a claim that there is conflicting evidence which might have raised a reasonable doubt of his guilt. The province of the jury in weighing evidence, and determining the degree of credibility to be accorded the testimony of witnesses, is, under the rules of law, exclusive. A judge may not instruct upon matters of fact. If a witness should absolutely discredit his own testimony by swearing to opposite statements, so that one or the other must be false, under our laws his testimony is not of necessity to be rejected. It is still evidence in the case. Under such circumstances, the jury must receive and weigh it. They are bound to look upon it with suspicion and distrust, and may reject it. But, upon the other hand, they may, as they determine, accept as true one or the other of the contradictory asseverations. Thus, upon a review of the evidence by this tribunal, we may not examine with minuteness claims that witnesses are discredited, or that their evidence is unworthy of belief, or look to see whether some other conclusion might not have been warranted by the evidence. Blythe v. Ayres, 102 Cal. 254, 36 Pac. 522. "Ad questionem juris respondent judices, ad questionem facti respondent juratores;" and than this no maxim of the old law has been more carefully preserved in its integrity under our system. Where it is not clear that the verdict must have been rendered under the influence of passion or prejudice, our examination of the record is only to determine whether legal evidence has been offered sufficient to warrant a conviction, for the verdict of the jury is their declaration that it is this evidence which has been by them accepted. Mayes, 66 Cal. 597, 6 Pac. 691; People v. Ah Jake, 91 Cal. 98, 27 Pac. 595; People v. Freeman, 92 Cal. 359, 28 Pac. 261.

The following facts were presented in evidence:

Upon April 3, 1895, Blanche Lamont was living with her aunt, Mrs. Noble, in the city and county of San Francisco. She was in person rather tall and slight, and weighed about 120 pounds. Her age was 21 years. She was a school girl, attending the High School and Normal School, and, upon the morning of April 3d, left her home, with her strap of books, to join her classes. She met defendant while on the way (such is his testimony), and he accompanied her for a part of the journey. She was at school during the day's session, and at its close, about 3 p. m., left with the other pupils. She did not return home, and never after that day was seen alive. Shortly after 9 o'clock upon the morning of April 14th, two police officers and the janitor attempted to open the door leading to the belfry of the Emmanuel Baptist Church. They were prosecuting a search for Blanche Lamont. The knob of the door was gone, and the lock mutilated, so that the janitor's key could not open it. They forced the door, and one of the officers, ascending the stairs, found the body of a girl lying on the top landing, in the southeastern corner of the belfry. It was that of Blanche Lamont. The body was naked, lying upon its back, the feet close together, the hands folded upon the breast, the head inclined a little to the left. There were two small blocks, apparently employed to hold the head in an upright position. Decomposition was well advanced, and, by medical testimony, life had been extinct for about two weeks. An examination and autopsy of the corpse revealed seven fingernail incisions upon the left side of the throat, and five upon the right, a depression of the larynx, and a congestion of the trachea, larynx, lungs, and brain. Strangulation was the cause of death. A search brought to light the clothing and apparel of the girl, hidden in and about the rough woodwork of the belfry, and also her book strap and schoolbooks.

Upon April 15th the defendant was arrested, and charged with this murder. At that time, Durrant was a young man, 24 years of age, a student of the Cooper Medical College of San Francisco, and a member of the signal corps of the National Guard of the state. He was interested in religious work, was an attendant, if not a member, of the Emmanuel Baptist Church, was a member of the Christian Endeavor Society, was assistant superintendent of the Sunday school, and was librarian of the church library. As is abundantly testified to, he bore the esteem of his fellows as a zealous, earnest, and upright young man, of commendable character, and of sincere Christian life. When arrested, he was upon service of the signal corps to which he was attached. Upon the trial his defense was an alibi. He declared that he had seen Blanche Lamont in the morning of April 3d, when she was on her way to school, but never again thereafter; that he himself had gone to his medical college, and there had attended a lecture at the time when, under the contention of the prosecution, the girl had been by him murdered in the church. By the prosecution it was shown that Blanche Lamont was a regular attendant of the Emmanuel Church, and belonged to the Society of Christian Endeavor, of which Durrant was also a member. The two were well acquainted. Indeed, they seem to have stood in their intercourse upon terms of cordial and trusting friendship. They met at religious and social gatherings, to or from which Durrant frequently escorted the girl, in company with her sister and others of their social circle. Durrant had a key to the side door of the church, and was thoroughly familiar with the building and premises. Mrs. Mary Vogel lived across the street from the school which Blanche Lamont was attending. She saw defendant a little after 2 o'clock of the afternoon of April 3d in front of the schoolhouse, walking up and down, apparently in waiting. When school closed, she noticed two girls coming out together. One of them carried books in a strap. They walked to the corner of the street, where they stopped for a car. The defendant joined them as they were about to board it. One of the girls went inside. The other sat outside upon the dummy. The defendant joined this girl, and seated himself beside her. Minnie Edwards testified that it was she who accompanied Blanche Lamont from school that afternoon. They were joined by Durrant at the corner. Blanche Lamont and he sat together outside, while she found a seat within the car. Blanche Lamont had her schoolbooks with her. Mrs. Alice Dorgan, at the time of these occurrences, was a pupil of the same school. Upon that afternoon, she, too, saw Blanche Lamont upon the dummy in company with the defendant. May Lanigan, another of the schoolgirls, also saw the two upon the dummy. This was from 5 to 10 minutes after 3 o'clock. Mrs. Elizabeth Crossett had known the defendant for about 4 years. Between half past 3 and 4 o'clock of this afternoon, while she was upon a Valencia street car, traveling towards Twenty-Fifth street, she saw defendant. He was seated upon the dummy of her car, in company with a young lady whom she did not know, but whose description answered to that of the murdered girl. The two were in conversation, and left the car at Twenty-First or Twenty-Second street, and walked in the direction of Bartlett street. The Emmanuel Baptist Church is situated upon Bartlett street, between Twenty-Second and Twenty-Third streets. Martin Quinlan, between 10 and 20 minutes after 4 o'clock of this afternoon, saw the defendant and a young lady, whose description corresponded to that of the girl, and who carried a loose package in her hand by a string or strap, walking along Bartlett street, from Twenty-Second street, towards Twenty-Third street. They were upon the same side of the street as the church, and were walking towards it. Mrs. Caroline Leake lived upon Bartlett street, almost directly opposite the church. She had been an attendant there at divine service for many years. She had known defendant for the past 3 or 4 years. She also knew Blanche Lamont. Between 4 and half past 4 of this afternoon, she saw Durrant and a young lady pass through the gate into the churchyard, and on towards the side door. His companion she could not identify positively, but from her appearance thought at the time that it was Blanche Lamont, or another young lady of similar size and height. This young lady testified that she was not with defendant at any time upon that day, and no pretense is made that she was. George King was a member of the church, and its organist. He knew defendant, and the two were very friendly. At 5 o'clock on this afternoon, he entered the church by the front door, letting himself in with his key. He noticed a strong smell of gas, and went forthwith to the library, to see if it was escaping there. He failed to find the leak. Thence, closing the library door, he proceeded directly to the Sunday-school room, and, sitting at the piano, began to play. He played for two or three minutes, when defendant came through the folding doors to the rear, and stood looking at him. "I asked him what was the matter, because of his pale condition. He had his coat off, and his hat off. His hair was somewhat disheveled. He came through, and then told me that he had been fixing the gas above the auditorium, and had been overcome by it to such a degree that he could hardly descend the ladder. He seemed ill. He handed me a fifty-cent piece, and asked me to go and get some bromo seltzer." Witness procured the seltzer, and upon his return found the defendant either standing in the lobby or lying upon the platform in the Sunday-school room. He thinks, however, that defendant was lying down. Defendant took a dose of the seltzer, which seemed to nauseate him somewhat. The two sat, and talked together for a few minutes; then went upstairs to the choir loft, and carried down a small organ. Defendant appeared weak, and had to stop two or three times to rest. Then they went to the library door, which Durrant unlocked, and, entering, put on his hat and coat, which were lying on a box in the corner. Witness had not seen the hat or coat when he went into the library the first time that afternoon. They then left the church, and, walking some distance together, separated, and went to their respective homes. It was then about 6 oclock.

Upon the morning of April 13th, ten days after the disappearance of Blanche Lamont, and one day before the discovery of her body, her aunt, Mrs. Noble, received through the mail a package which contained all of the rings worn by her when she left her home. The rings were inclosed in a copy of a daily newspaper, the Examiner, and upon the paper were written the names of George King and Prof. Schernstein. King was a common friend of Durrant and Blanche Lamont. Prof. Schernstein was her music teacher. Neither of the two wrote the names. The paper and wrapper were exhibited to the jury, together with admitted exemplars of defendant's writing. Upon a morning between the 4th and 10th of April, Adolph Oppenheimer, a pawnbroker, was offered for sale a gold ring containing a diamond chip. The ring was identified as one worn by Blanche Lamont at the time of her disappearance, and subsequently returned to her aunt through the mail. The person offering the ring for sale was the defendant. William Phillips testified that, upon a day in the first part of April, he saw defendant standing in front of Oppenheimer's place, between 10 and 11 o'clock in the morning. Dr. G. F. Graham was a student and classmate of Durrant's at the Cooper Medical College. From 3:30 to 4:15 p. m. of April 3d, Dr. Cheney, of that college, delivered a lecture to his class upon the sterilization of milk. Dr. Graham attended that lecture, and took notes of it. The defendant, in support of his alibi, claimed to have attended the lecture, and likewise to have taken original notes, which were admitted in evidence. Dr. Graham testified that after Durrant's arrest, and before the trial, he visited him with a friend. Durrant requested his companion to withdraw, that he might talk to Dr. Graham alone. When he had done so, defendant informed Dr. Graham that he had no notes of the lecture, and requested the doctor to lend him his, saying that, if he could get them, he could establish an alibi. Defendant told him that he could take the notes to Durrant's house, get his book, and put them in it, and the book could be brought to him in jail, or that the witness could commit his notes to memory, come to the jail, and repeat them to him.

This summarization of the evidence is not designed to be exhaustive. Much that is cumulative upon the part of the people is omitted. No analysis is made of the alibi of the defense, nor of the claim of the prosecution that, when not completely demolished, it stands upon the unsupported word of the defendant. Enough has been set forth to show that the verdict and judgment find support from legal and sufficient evidence, and, when that point is reached, the inquiry of this court comes to an end, saving in those exceptional cases (of which this is not one) where the evidence against the defendant is so slight as to make clear the inference that the verdict must have been rendered under the influence of passion or prejudice. People v. Vance, 21 Cal. 400; People v. Manning, 48 Cal. 335.

By this evidence, the defendant and Blanche Lamont (she with her strap of books) entered the Emmanuel Church at about half past 4 o'clock in the afternoon of April 3d. At 5 o'clock defendant is seen there, and explains his distressed condition as caused by the inhalation of gas. At 6 o'clock he leaves the church. Blanche Lamont is never again seen alive. Two weeks after, her nude and decomposing body is found in the church. She had been strangled, and her corpse dragged to the belfry. The clothes which she wore on leaving home are secreted about the floors and rafters. Her books are found, still tightly strapped. These facts, with the others set forth, are sufficient to justify the hypothesis of defendant's guilt, and to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis than that of his guilt. Such evidence is clearly sufficient to warrant and uphold the determination that the girl was strangled to death at the hands of the defendant upon the afternoon of April 3d.

The evidence of defendant's previous good character, so fully established, was a circumstance making strongly in his favor. We are asked to say that the jury disregarded it in reaching their verdict, but this we cannot do. They were fully and fairly instructed upon the matter, and it must be presumed that the instructions were regarded.

Appellant further urges that the evidence fails to disclose any motive for the crime; that proof of motive is essential to support a conviction; and that, therefore, the judgment must be reversed. If by this is meant that proof of a particular motive must be as clear and cogent as proof of the crime, the proposition finds no support in either reason or authority. To the act of every rational human being pre-exists a motive. In every criminal case proof of the moving cause is permissible, and oftentimes is valuable; but it is never essential. Where the perpetration of a crime has been brought home to a defendant, the motive for its commission becomes unimportant. Evidence of motive is sometimes of assistance in removing doubt, and completing proof which might otherwise be unsatisfactory; and that motive may either be shown by positive evidence, or gleaned from the facts and surroundings of the act. The motive then becomes a circumstance, but nothing more than a circumstance, to be considered by the jury; and its absence is equally a circumstance in favor of the accused, to be given such weight as it deems proper. But proof of motive is never indispensable to a conviction. People v. Bennett, 49 N. Y. 137; Pointer v. U. S., 151 U. S. 396, 14 Sup. Ct. 410; Johnson v. U. S., 157 U. S. 320, 15 Sup. Ct. 614; Clifton v. State, 73 Ala. 473; Sumner v. State, 5 Blackf. 579. The wellsprings of human conduct are infinite, and infinitely obscure. An act may owe its performance to complex and multitudinous promptings. Who > Knows each chord its various tone,

> Each spring its various bias?

Or the deed may be due to a single dominant impulse. In this case, what the motive may have been it is not the province of this court to inquire.

During the impanelment of the jury, the defense made application for citations against certain newspaper editors, to show cause why they should not be punished for contempt because of their publications relative to the trial. The court refused to interrupt the proceedings to consider the matter then, and postponed action, stating that at a proper time it would, upon request, take such steps as might be contemplated by law. Again, during the impanelment of the jury, the application was renewed, and the court's response was the same. No further request was made, and there the matter was allowed to stand. This is urged as reversible error. While a contempt proceeding, for convenience, is presented in the cause out of which it grows, it is a separate and distinct matter, and no part of the original case. Ex parte Ah Men, 77 Cal. 198, 19 Pac. 380. Power to punish for contempt is vested in courts for their own protection. Its object is to insure respect for their rules and orders, obedience to their processes, and freedom from disturbance or interference with the due and regular course of their proceedings. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 780; Thomp. Trials, § 124. A publication during the course of a trial which reflects on the court, or assails the litigants, or seeks to intimidate witnesses, or spreads before the jury an opinion upon the merits of the controversy, or threatens them with public odium, or attempts to dictate the decision, or in any improper way endeavors to influence the determination, is unquestionably a contempt of court (In re Shortridge, 99 Cal. 532, 34 Pac. 227); but at the same time a litigant has no appeal from the action of the judge in dealing with the matter. The litigant may not control this process, which is designed for the protection of the court, and which is to be invoked or not, as its discretion may dictate, but which should be employed freely where the interests of justice and the rights of litigants demand it. "The doctrine is well nigh without exception that the issuance vel non of contempt proceedings lies in every instance in the sound discretion of the court." 4 Enc. Pl. & Prac. p. 774. If, by the failure of the court to proceed against the editors or any of them, defendant has failed to obtain the fair and impartial trial to which the law entitles him, he may make that appear upon his motion for a new trial, and the question will thus come before us properly for review. In this case the question is raised in the manner indicated, and it will be considered upon its merits in the proper place.

Numerous objections were made and exceptions reserved to the court's rulings in admitting and rejecting evidence. These rulings have been subjected to critical examination, including those which in appellant's brief receive no discussion, but are grouped by number, and collectively assigned as error. While none, therefore, have been ignored, we will here consider only such as merit particular mention.

(a) Dr. Barrett was shown to be a practicing physician and surgeon. He performed the autopsy upon the body of the dead girl, gave evidence of its condition, and expressed his judgment that the cause of death was strangulation. He was then asked, "What, in your judgment, was the means used for the strangulation?" Objection was made, upon the sole ground that no proper foundation had been laid for the question. The objection was properly overruled. The objection does not present the point that the fact sought to be elicited was not the subject of expert inquiry; nor is that proposition argued in the briefs. That being conceded, the objection that a proper foundation for the question had not been laid could not be sustained, when the witness was a physician and surgeon, whose competency had been abundantly shown. The witness answered: "I think the means used were hands." The appellant insists that the court erred in refusing to strike this answer out, as the question called for the witness' judgment, and he only gave his thought. The expressed thought of the expert was clearly his judgment.

(b) The clothing of Blanche Lamont, admitted in evidence, was draped upon a dressmaker's frame, which itself was not in evidence. It was not claimed that the frame represented the height, size, or figure of the girl. Error is predicated upon the use of the frame and the refusal of the court to order the garments removed from it. The frame afforded a convenient mode for displaying the wearing apparel, concerning which much testimony was taken. We can discern no more impropriety or irregularity in the plan pursued than would have existed if the garments had been hung upon a clothesline, or huddled into a corner.

(c) Mrs. Vogel, cross-examined by the defense, and asked how she fixed the date upon which she saw Durrant as being April 3d, replied that it was because of a postal card which her husband received that day, and which had been directed to 732 Natoma street. "That place we own, but is occupied by tenants. I have never lived there. Q. Well, is that your property, or your husband's property? A. What he got is mine; what I got is his. Q. Do you understand my question? I asked you, in whose name does the title to this property on Natoma street stand?" Here the judge interposed, and, stating that he could see no possible materiality or relevancy to the question, instructed the witness that she need not answer. There was in this no error. Indeed, it is the duty of a court, and one not often enough performed, to expedite business by curtailing cross-examinations upon immaterial and irrelevant matters. We cannot perceive the slightest pertinency to the inquiry. No question of right or title to property was even collaterally or remotely involved, and, had the witness answered, the subject being immaterial matter educed on cross-examination, the defense would have been bound by her statement, without right to impeach it, even had it been false. Code Civ. Proc. § 2048.

(d) Mrs. Crossett declared that, to the best of her recollection, the young lady whom she saw with defendant wore a broad-brimmed hat, light, with large bows and feathers in front. She did not recognize the hat exhibited to her, which had been proved to be the one worn by the dead girl. She was then asked: "Can you tell whether it was a hat similar to that, this young lady wore?" Objection was made that the witness had already stated that she could not recognize it. The court permitted the question, saying: "I think they have a right to ask whether there is any similarity, and, if so, what similarity there is, between the hat shown to her and the hat she saw the young lady wear." The manifest soundness of the ruling renders comment unnecessary.

The same witness was interrogated on cross-examination as follows: "Q. Have you seen him [Durrant] at all since last September, 1894? A. Yes, sir. Q. That is, you imagine you have? Mr. Barnes: I object to the question. The Court: That would not be proper. The lady is telling what she has seen. I do not think, when a lady says, 'I have seen him since September,' that counsel has a right to say, 'You imagine you did?' * * * It disconcerts the witness, and throws a very serious doubt upon the statement. You should have the right to cross-examine this witness and all other witnesses, but I do not concede that this is a proper way to do it. Mr. Deuprey: We will have to take an exception. The Court: You have your exception, certainly, to every ruling of the court; but I say that this and all witnesses in this court are to be treated fairly. Mr. Deuprey: I did, sir, treat this witness fairly. The Court: The court does not believe you have. Mr. Deuprey: I take an exception to the court's remarks." Upon this ruling and these remarks error is affirmed. It is the right of a witness to be protected from irrelevant, improper, or insulting questions, and from harsh and insulting demeanor; to be detained only so long as the interests of justice require; to be examined only as to matters legal and pertinent to the issue. Code Civ. Proc. § 2066. The protection which the Code thus affords to witnesses could be more often extended by judges with a salutary effect upon judicial proceedings. The witness (a lady) had testified courteously and positively that she had seen defendant since the date named. The interjection of counsel was not legitimate cross-examination, and justified the interposition of the court.

(e) Blanche Lamont's sister Maud was living with her at the time of her disappearance. She was shown a picture of Blanche taken about three years before the date of her testimony, and was asked whether or not the photograph was a fair representation of her sister as she was upon April 3d. Over objection and exception, she was permitted to answer. It is a general rule, without contradiction, that, where the photograph is shown to be a faithful representation of what it purports to reproduce, it is admissible as an appropriate aid to the jury in applying the evidence, and this is equally true whether the photograph be of persons, things, or places. Rice, Cr. Ev. p. 154; Whart. Cr. Ev. (9th Ed.) § 544; Thomp. Trials, § 869. The fact that the photograph was taken two or more years before the date of the girl's death did not justify its exclusion after the testimony of the sister that it fairly represented Blanche at the time of her disappearance.

(f) George E. King, upon direct examination for the people, testified that, when he returned to the church after buying the bromo seltzer for Durrant, he found him either standing in the lobby or lying on the platform in the Sunday-school room, but in which place he could not remember. For the purpose of refreshing his memory, the district attorney, over objection and exception by the defense, was permitted to read the following question and answer from the testimony of the same witness upon the preliminary examination in the police court: "Q. When you returned, what occurred then? A. I met Durrant in the vestibule of the church by the front door, and he took the seltzer, and took a dose of it. He went into the kitchen to do that." The witness responded: "I did so testify. I don't think that testimony was correct. In the cross-examination I was asked if he was not lying on the platform, and that created a doubt in my mind, and now I am not sure either way." The witness would have had the undoubted right to have read his testimony given upon the examination for the purpose of refreshing his memory. Code Civ. Proc. § 2047. Such a transcript may at least be regarded as a private memorandum. Reid v. Reid, 73 Cal. 206, 14 Pac. 781. When a witness called by a party fails to testify to matters previously within his recollection, or gives evidence in apparent variance with that formerly given, it is not incumbent upon the party producing the witness to wait for the assaults of the cross-examination to expose seeming inconsistencies and discrepancies. While he may not impeach his witness (saving under certain exceptional circumstances), he may with propriety refresh his recollection, to the end that the witness and his present evidence may both be put fairly and in their proper light before the jury. The answer above quoted affords a good illustration of this. The witness admits the discrepancy between his former and his present testimony, and candidly explains it as arising from a doubt created by his former cross-examination. There was here no impropriety and no injury to defendant.

(g) The janitor of the church was asked upon direct examination if any one beside himself had a key to his room. He replied: "I have sometimes left my room door locked, and found it open. Therefore I conclude that some one had a key to it." The refusal of the court to strike this answer out is assigned as error, "because, by its nature, the answer only had a tendency to cloud the minds of the jury," and "necessarily injured the case of defendant." We are unable to perceive any force in these objections.

(h) The body of Blanche Lamont was found nude and prone upon its back, with a small wooden block upon each side of the head, apparently used to hold it in an upright position. Dr. Charles E. Farnum was called for the people, and testified that he was the demonstrator of anatomy at the Cooper Medical College, which defendant attended, and that wooden blocks were employed for purposes in relation to dead bodies. He was next asked: "For what purpose are they used?" Objection was made that the question was irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent for any purpose. The line of proof sought to be established by the prosecution was quite apparent. It was an endeavor to show, by the demonstrator of anatomy under whom defendant was studying, some technical or peculiar use of wooden blocks in connection with dissecting room corpses, similar to the use made of blocks about the head of the body of the dead girl. The court could not foresee the answer, and properly overruled the objection; for, if the proposition could be established, it was clearly competent for the people to do so. In this, however, there was a signal failure. The answer disclosed no possible connection between the facts in the case of the dead girl and the custom of the dissecting room. While the question was pertinent, the answer thereto failed to furnish the required proof. It would unquestionably have been stricken out on motion of the defense. But no motion was made; doubtless because the answer not only worked no injury to the defense, but was an affirmative advantage to it.

The record next discloses the following question, objection, exception, and answer: "Q. Let me put a hypothetical case to you for a moment: Suppose you had in your custody or care a body which had but recently died, and it was still almost warm with life. You are acquainted with anatomy and surgery, and you know that in a certain length of time rigor mortis would set in, when the body and the members of the body would become stiff. Now, if you wanted to keep the head—the face and neck—in an upright position, in a straight position, not turned to one side or the other, what would you do in order to keep it in that position? Mr. Deuprey: We object to that, as not a hypothetical question involving any elements in this case. (Objection overruled. Defendant excepts.) A. I would place it first in the position in which I wanted it, and, if it did not remain there, I would prop it by supports in the desired position. * * * My last answer is what I, as an individual, would do." The objection, it will be noted, is not upon the ground that the inquiry is not a subject of expert evidence, but is based upon the one proposition "that the hypothetical question does not involve any elements in the case." In strictness, therefore, this consideration might begin and end with a disposition of the single ground of objection urged; and when it appears, as by fair inference it does, that some one had murdered the girl, and that some one was present with her still warm body, and that some one placed the blocks for the purpose of holding the head upright, it certainly cannot be said that none of the elements of the case were involved in the hypothetical question. Indeed, while counsel for the appellant, arguing this proposition, strenuously insist that "there is no evidence in the record that any person wanted to keep the head, the face, or the neck in an upright or any position, or in a straight position, not turned to one side or the other; there was nothing in the way of circumstance or in the way of fact established that would permit the presumption of the conditions forced into the so-called 'hypothetical question,'"—we need but turn back four pages of their brief to find the curiously destructive declaration that "the fancy struck the murderer of this girl to place the head in a certain position, and he did the most natural thing in the world,—picked up a couple of small blocks, evidently lying near, to hold the head in the position desired."

Moreover, a hypothetical question need not embrace all the facts in evidence, or even be limited to facts proved. It must be based upon facts in evidence, but may be addressed to any reasonable theory which may be taken of them. In Filer v. Railroad Co., 49 N. Y. 46, it is well said: "It is the privilege of counsel to assume, within the limits of the evidence, any state of facts which he claims the evidence justifies, and base the opinion of experts upon the facts thus assumed. The facts are assumed for the purpose of the question, and for no other purpose." In Thompson on Trials (section 604) the rule is thus aptly and succinctly stated: "The rule, then, is that the hypothetical questions must be based either upon the hypothesis of the truth of all the evidence, or upon a hypothesis specially framed of certain facts assumed to be proved for the purpose of the inquiry. Such questions leave it for the jury to decide, in the first case, whether the evidence is true or not, and, in the second case, whether the particular facts assumed are or are not proved."

But as in criminal cases, and particularly in cases of capital crime, the law is reluctant to deny a defendant a full consideration of his points because of technical errors or omissions of his counsel, upon whom he must rely, we pass to the consideration of the proposition that the hypothetical question and its answer were not the subject of expert evidence,—a ground of objection not presented to the trial judge. Upon this proposition the defense is undoubtedly correct. A juryman would be absolutely deficient in common sense and common knowledge who did not know that the way to keep an inanimate object in a given position would be to support it by props or stays in that position. And the physician's answer gives expression to this when he says: "That is what I, as an individual, would do." There was here no question of professional, scientific, or technical skill or knowledge. But the question and answer were absolutely without injury. Not all matters improperly made the subject of expert evidence work harmful error. Where the ultimate conclusion is one to be reached by the jury itself from the facts before it, and so-called "expert evidence" is allowed, which presents to a jury a conclusion other than that to which they might have arrived, the admission of this improper evidence is tantamount to a declaration by the court that they may set aside their exclusive right of judging, and accept the judgment of the expert. In such cases injury is apparent. But it frequently happens that, under the form of expert evidence, answers are given which are so clearly a part of common knowledge that no injury could have resulted. The answer under consideration is one of them. Had the witness been asked: "If you throw a stone into a pond of water, will it float, or sink? If you strike a man on the head with an ax, will it injure or benefit him?"—while the questions do not call for expert evidence, their answers, particularly when, as in this case, they are correctly given, could, in the nature of things, have worked no harm.

(i) The defense showed by Police Officer Reynolds that, two days after the discovery of the body, he found a chisel and hammer in the pastor's study in the church, and that he tried the chisel upon the marks. He testified: "My recollection is that there were two marks I tried to fit the chisel to. There was no mark that filled it exactly. There was a little play. You could move the chisel up and down. I could not tell if there was any more play than would ordinarily have occurred in using a chisel for prying. * * * I saw a mark on the jamb of that door, as if at some time a blow had been struck with a hammer. * * * At some time the hammer was tried in that mark." The defense then introduced the hammer and chisel in evidence. The plain purport of this evidence was to direct suspicion to the minister. In rebuttal, the belfry door and jamb were offered in evidence by the prosecution, after testimony from the officer that they were in the same condition as when previously he had made the test, saving for the absence of the lock plate. The evidence was permissible. The witness was then asked to see if he could fit the chisel to the marks. It was objected that it was for the jury to satisfy themselves upon this matter without the intervention of the witness. It is true, the jurors could have made the experiment to their satisfaction without the aid of the officer; but, he having testified to his former experiment, the prosecution was entitled to have him repeat it before the jury. The result would be, as the jury determined, either to support or to disprove his oral testimony.

(j) The defendant offered himself as a witness, and told with much circumstantiality and detail how he had spent his time upon April 3d. Many objections were interposed to questions propounded him upon cross-examination. A minute examination fails to disclose any error in the court's rulings. The questions allowed and the scope of the cross-examination are strictly within the rule expressed in People v. Gallagher, 100 Cal. 466, 35 Pac. 80. One or two of the rulings should, perhaps, receive more particular consideration.

The defendant testified upon direct examination that, when he parted with Blanche Lamont upon the morning of April 3d, it was the last time that he ever saw her, dead or alive, and was asked upon cross-examination if he had not prepared a statement, which was put into a sealed envelope, addressed to his counsel, with the instruction: "To be opened if I am convicted, and to be returned unopened if I am not convicted." To this and several like questions objections were interposed, upon the ground that the statement, if made, was privileged. The court ruled, and properly, that the questions were preliminary. It was the fact, and not the contents of the statement, which was the subject of inquiry, and no effort was made to extort from the witness any information of the latter. The court further declared that, if the people failed to follow this preliminary inquiry by proper proofs, it would, on motion, strike out the evidence. The witness answered that he had made no such statement, and there the matter rested, presumptively to the advantage of the defendant, certainly not to his injury. From the fact that no motion was made to strike out the evidence, it must be concluded that defendant acquiesced in its remaining in the case. Cederberg v. Robison, 100 Cal. 93, 34 Pac. 625. The court was further justified in its ruling by the consideration that it could not foretell the line of proof which the people might take in rebuttal. The contents of the statement, while privileged matter between the client and attorney and all who had acquired knowledge of it through a relation of legal confidence, would not be privileged if known to one who had acquired his knowledge under other circumstances. The court could not know that it was not some such evidence which would be proposed at the proper time.

The prosecution then asked the witness, with specifications of time, place, and circumstance, if he had not told Miss Carrie Cunningham that he saw Blanche Lamont upon the second landing, and that she was murdered upon the second landing. This was in rebuttal of defendant's testimony that he had never seen the girl after the morning of April 3d. It is argued by appellant's counsel that the communication, if made, was privileged. But considering that Miss Cunningham was a newspaper reporter, and is not shown to have been the wife or to have stood to the defendant in any other relation of legal confidence, the claim scarcely merits comment.

(k) Miss Cunningham, called in rebuttal, was asked whether defendant did or did not make to her the statement above mentioned. It is asserted that the allowance by the court of these questions was a "gross outrage," and "bore down to the ground all the rules of evidence." It was strictly rebuttal evidence, by way of impeachment, under well-settled rules of law, and under the express declaration of section 2052 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The foregoing are all of the alleged errors in receiving and rejecting evidence which call for especial comment.

It came to the knowledge of the court, during the progress of the trial, that one H. J. McCoy had said to a juror: "If you don't hang him [meaning defendant], we will hang you." For this flagrant contempt, McCoy was at once cited to appear. An examination was held. By this it was disclosed that the language was used jocularly, and without serious significance. At least, so the juror to whom it was addressed testified that he received and understood it. For this contempt, McCoy was promptly and properly punished. The proceedings were conducted in the presence of the jury. This circumstance is now for the first time charged as error. Doubtless, had the defense desired the jury excused during the investigation, the court would have acceded to the request, but no such suggestion was made. We fail to see how the defendant could have been injured by this. The mode pursued, we think, had a salutary, rather than malign, effect. The claim that defendant could have been prejudiced in the minds of the jury is completely answered by the facts—First, that it was not the defense which either instituted or conducted the contempt proceedings; and, second, by the affirmative declarations of each of the jurors under oath that he reached his verdict from a consideration of the evidence in the case, and from that alone.

We perceive no abuse of his office or unfairness to defendant in the argument of the district attorney. In showing an empty box to illustrate the amount of gas which, under the evidence, would leak in a given time, both the district attorney and the judge were careful to inform the jury that the box was not an exhibit; that no proof of its capacity was before them; and that they were not to accept the district attorney's statement as evidence. The box was used simply for purposes of illustration, and, while the practice is not commended, its exhibition to the jury could have worked no injury in this case, under the cautions of the court, and, in strictness, could no more be regarded as error than would have been the like employment of any ordinary physical object in the courtroom.

Error is assigned for the court's refusal to give certain instructions proposed by the defense, in number 36. Argument is addressed to but few of them. These will be considered. The others not argued have not been overlooked, but they either contain manifest errors of law, or are so completely covered by those given of the court's own motion that it may with safety be concluded that counsel's failure to discuss them is a tacit recognition that as to them no error was committed.

Of the proposed instructions, No. 6 was refused because substantially given in the charge of the court. It was so given.

No. 8 deals with the danger to be avoided and the caution to be exercised in reaching a conclusion upon circumstantial evidence. Upon this subject, also, the jury was fully and fairly advised by the court.

The propositions of law contained in the first portion of No. 10 were given by the court with more elaboration and exactness than appear in the proposed instruction. It was not error for the court to decline to give the last portion. It is quite true that the law never requires the sacrifice of a victim. But the jurors had been carefully instructed as to their duties, and had been repeatedly told that unless, upon clear and cogent proof, satisfying their minds beyond a reasonable doubt, they believed defendant guilty, it was their duty to acquit him. It was not incumbent upon the court to instruct the jury, as matter of law, that "it is safer to err in acquitting."

Proposed instructions 11–16, upon the subject of alibi, were fully embraced in those given by the court, as was also the law upon the matter of identification. Of the remaining instructions the same may be said.

It may here be noted that the appellant does not make serious complaint that any of the instructions actually given by the court were erroneous in point of law, but contends that in some instances the propositions which he sought to have laid before the jury were not adequately presented. The jury, however, was ably, carefully, and elaborately instructed and we can discern no just ground of complaint in this regard.

The grounds for a new trial presented by defendant have for the most part been covered by what has been said. One of them, however, still remains for consideration. This is that the proceedings were so conducted as to deprive defendant of his constitutional right to a fair and impartial trial. Under this head it is urged that, by the repeated publications in the newspapers of San Francisco, public feeling was unjustly aroused to bitter hostility against the defendant; that witnesses who would otherwise have given valuable testimony in his favor were so intimidated that either they refused to testify, or, in testifying, gave colorless and worthless evidence; and that the jury itself, impelled by fear, yielded to the public clamor and demand that the defendant should be convicted. Many hundreds of pages of the transcript are given over to a presentation of the newspaper articles complained of.

The murder of Blanche Lamont was a crime of so atrocious a character that the community was greatly aroused. Its ghastly and sensational features were seized upon with avidity by the newspapers, and daily paraded and exploited before their horrified readers. When Durrant was arrested for the crime, there was no reservation of judgment upon their part, but they proceed with unanimity to hold him up to the public as the guilty man. During the trial of the case they vied with each other in sensational discoveries and prophecies concerning new evidence and strange witnesses. They maintained throughout the attitude which they originally assumed, and from first to last continued to treat defendant as the undoubted criminal. All this the record presented by appellant abundantly establishes. But when a community is deeply stirred over the commission of some appalling crime, and the public and the public prints are clamoring that punishment shall be meted out for it, unless we must say that, under such circumstances, as matter of law, a defendant cannot have the trial guarantied him by the constitution, such a showing does not conclude the question. Under these circumstances, all men do not forsake reason; some still preserve a dispassionate judgment; and if it be made to appear that the defendant was tried by a jury of such, uninfluenced by aught save the evidence, then in this regard none of his rights has been violated. After rigorous examination by prosecution and defense, it appears that such a jury was obtained without exhausting more than three-fifths of defendant's peremptory challenges. Each juror makes solemn affidavit that he did not at any time during the trial of the cause, and while he was impaneled and sworn as a juror, read or hear read any of the articles, statements or comments published in any of the newspapers concerning this case; that he at all times heeded the admonition of the court given at each adjournment thereof, and was at no time influenced in any way, shape, or manner by any extraneous matter whatever while a juror, either by newspapers, conversations, or public sentiment, if any such sentiment existed; that he received no impression as to the defendant's guilt or innocence outside of the court room, but decided the case, after deliberation, solely according to the law and the evidence, to the best of his ability and understanding, and not otherwise. It cannot be said that there was any error in refusing a new trial under such a showing.

The claim that witnesses for the defense were intimidated, and kept from testifying, is not supported. It was expected to prove by a witness (Clark) that in the afternoon of April 3d he saw, upon a Market street car, Blanche Lamont, with a young man, not the defendant. Clark was in one of the Eastern states during the trial, and his deposition was there taken. It was to the effect that he saw Blanche Lamont and a young man, not answering the description of defendant, together upon a car upon a day in the latter part of March or the first part of April, but the date he could not fix with positiveness. He said that he believed that he had told a lawyer that it was upon April 3d, but that subsequent consideration had convinced him that he was mistaken in this. There is here no suggestion of undue influence or intimidation.

The witness Lenahan, called for the defense, testified, from all that appears, precisely as the defense expected.

Mrs. Monnier, it is claimed, was expected to testify that, upon the afternoon of April 3d, she saw a young man, whom she would identify as defendant, enter the Emmanuel Church alone; that, because of newspaper publications and interviews with her, her husband became afraid that his business would be injured, and, between fear and anger, so talked with his wife, and had others do so, "that she became uncertain as to the time." This declaration is made upon the information and belief of defendant. It is not supported or corroborated. Even the source of affiant's information is not mentioned. It does not appear that Mrs. Monnier was not at all times within reach of process; yet no attempt was made to introduce her testimony. This showing is certainly insufficient to call for a reversal of the case.

Upon a consideration of the whole case, we discern no error to the prejudice of any of the substantial rights of defendant; wherefore the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; HARRISON, J.; TEMPLE, J.; VAN FLEET, J.

McFARLAND, J. (concurring). I have signed the opinion of Mr. Justice HENSHAW, and thereby concurred in his opinion and in the judgment of affirmance. But, while I can see no legal ground for a reversal of the judgment, I desire to say that the conviction of appellant would have been much more satisfactory if he had been tried in some county far beyond the reach of the threatening atmosphere which surrounded him at the place of his trial, and where the active and long-continued attempts to forestall judicial inquiry, and compel a hostile decision, could not possibly have had much force. As the case stands, it is somewhat difficult to feel sufficiently assured that outside adverse pressure did not have some insensible influence. But whether or not appellant had a substantially fair trial, notwithstanding circumstances which certainly made it difficult for him to have such a trial, is a question which addressed itself, in the first instance, to the presiding judge of the trial court; and it is not so apparent that he abused his discretion in determining that question in the affirmative as to give this court warrant to reverse the order denying a new trial. As to the other points involved in the appeal, I am clear that no substantial error was committed.

PEOPLE v. SIERP. (Cr. 180.)

Homicide—Evidence—Deposition.

1. Const. art. 1, § 13, providing for the taking, in the presence of defendant and his counsel, of depositions of witnesses in criminal cases, other than cases of homicide, "when there is reason to believe that the witness, from inability or other cause, will not attend at the trial," does not prohibit the admission, on a murder trial, of testimony given by an absent witness on the preliminary examination. People v. Oiler, 4 Pac. 1066, 66 Cal. 101, and People v. Chin Hane, 41 Pac. 697, 108 Cal. 597, followed.

2. On the preliminary examination, the entire examination of a witness was in English, except that, as to one question, the court requested an interpreter to ask him if he understood, and the interpreter, having asked him, replied, "He says he does understand." Held, that the testimony of the witness on such examination was not inadmissible on the trial, on the ground that the examination was conducted through an interpreter, especially where the interpreter testified on such trial. People v. Lee Fat, 54 Cal. 527, and People v. Ah Yute, 56 Cal. 119, distinguished.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; George H. Bahrs, Judge.

William Sierp was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

Alex. Campbell, Jr., for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and W. H. Anderson, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The defendant was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. As to the first point made for a reversal, it is sufficient to say that the evidence fully enough shows that Manuel Moreno, the person killed, made his dying declaration under a sense of impending death, and that, therefore, the court did not err in overruling defendant's objection to said declaration.

2. The contention, based on the cases of People v. Lee Fat, 54 Cal. 527, and People v. Ah Yute, 56 Cal. 119, that the testimony of Secundino Varela, given at the preliminary examination, was improperly admitted, because it was conducted through an interpreter, cannot be maintained. The entire examination was in the English language, except that, as to a single question, the court requested an interpreter to ask the witness if he understood the question, and the interpreter, having asked him, replied: "He says he does understand." Moreover, the interpreter was present at the trial in the superior court and testified. The case at bar is therefore not at all within the rulings in the Lee Fat and Ah Yute Cases, and the court did not, for the reason urged under this contention, err in admitting said testimony.

3. The third and only other point made by appellant is that the admission in evidence of the testimony given by said Varela at the preliminary examination was erroneous, because prohibited by section 13 of article 1 of the state constitution, and because any statute providing for the admission of such testimony in a case of homicide is violative of said section of the constitution, and void. This point was decided against the contention of appellant in People v. Chin Hane, 108 Cal. 597, 41 Pac. 697, and People v. Oiler, 66 Cal. 101, 4 Pac. 1066; but as the point has been strenuously urged in another case recently submitted, and we are asked to overrule the cases above cited, it is proper, perhaps, to give it a little further notice.

It is said that in the Chin Hane Case the point was not much discussed, and the decision was based on People v. Oiler; that the opinion in the Oiler Case contains statements which are not sound law; and that, moreover, the latter case did not involve a crime arising out of a homicide. But in People v. Chin Hane, which was decided in bank, and was a case of murder, a petition for rehearing was filed, in which this point was strongly pressed and most elaborately argued; and the court, after a full consideration of the subject, denied the rehearing. We see no additional reason for now holding otherwise. It is to be observed that our constitution does not provide—as many other state constitutions do—that a defendant in a criminal case is entitled to be "confronted with the witnesses against him," or, as the Massachusetts constitution has it, "to meet the witnesses against him face to face." The only provision of a like character here is found in subdivision 3 of section 686 of the Penal Code; but it is immediately followed by the exception and provision that the testimony of a witness taken at a preliminary examination before a committing magistrate by question and answer, "in the presence of the defendant, who has, either in person or by counsel, cross-examined or had an opportunity to cross-examine the witness," may be used on the trial in the event of the subsequent death, etc., of such witness. This provision embraces all kinds of criminal cases, and, under its express terms, the testimony objected to in the case at bar was clearly admissible. The contention, however, is that to apply this provision to an alleged crime arising out of a homicide is to violate that part of said section 13 of article 1 of the constitution which reads as follows: "The legislature shall have power to provide for the taking, in the presence of the party accused and his counsel, of depositions of witnesses in criminal cases, other than cases of homicide, when there is reason to believe that the witness, from inability or other cause, will not attend at the trial." The language which we have italicized shows that the clause was not intended to relate to, and does not embrace, testimony given at the judicial proceeding known as a "preliminary examination," where the purpose of the testimony is to enable the judicial officer to determine whether or not the party charged should be committed. The clause in question clearly refers to an ordinary extrajudicial deposition, taken, as it is called, "de bene esse" (that is, conditionally), before a commissioner, or some officer authorized to administer oaths, and based upon the theory of danger of the witness dying, or for certain other reasons not being able to come to court at the trial. And while it was universally held that such a deposition could not be used against a defendant in other states, where the constitution provided that a defendant must be confronted with his witnesses, yet it was just as firmly established, both there and in England, that the testimony of a witness taken at a preliminary examination could be so used, provided the defendant had been present and had an opportunity to cross-examine. The whole subject is elaborately discussed, and the distinction pointed out, in the opinion of Judge Bronson in People v. Restell, 3 Hill, 289. That learned jurist, with respect to a deposition proper, says: "Can the public prosecutor have depositions taken de bene esse in criminal cases, and read them in evidence, without the consent of the defendant? I think he cannot. The general rule certainly is that the witnesses must appear in court and be confronted with the accused." But with respect to testimony of witnesses taken at a preliminary examination, which is also sometimes called "depositions," he says: "They are admitted on the ground that they have been taken in the course of a judicial proceeding expressly authorized by law, when the defendant was present and had the right of cross-examination. It is sometimes said in the books that the deposition is admissible because it is not extrajudicial. But that is only a part of the true reason, and is calculated to deceive. * * * The deposition must not only be taken in a judicial proceeding, but it must be taken when the defendant is present and has had the opportunity to cross-examine the witness; otherwise it will not be received." In Bish. Cr. Proc. the same rule and distinction are declared. In section 1197 the author says: "Within this rule, when the law provides for a preliminary examination before a magistrate, what the witnesses testified to therein may, in the circumstances already detailed, be shown. The manner of the showing will depend on the form of the provision." And in section 1206 he says: "Under statutes, or by consent of the prosecuting officer, evidence may be taken for the defendant by ordinary deposition." This being the general state of the law at the time our constitution was adopted, there is no room for the strictures of counsel upon the following language used in the opinion in People v. Oiler: "This clause invests the legislature, under the circumstances mentioned in it, with power to authorize the taking of depositions in criminal cases, other than those of homicide, of witnesses not called on the preliminary examination. It was not intended to take away a power long exercised by legislatures in regard to the depositions of witnesses taken on such preliminary examinations." And see cases there cited. It is argued that the clause in question cannot be held as conferring any authority on the legislature, because a state constitution is a limitation and not a grant of powers. But that is not true in any absolute sense. The legislature gets all its powers from the constitution; it would not exist if there were no constitution. It is a mere rule of construction—distinguishing the nature of state constitutions from that of the federal constitution—that the creation of a legislative department by a state constitution confers upon the legislature all necessary and usual legislative powers not prohibited in some other part of the instrument. But other parts of a complicated constitution may leave it doubtful whether or not a certain legislative power was intended to be limited, and in such case it is quite common to insert in the instrument an express declaration upon the subject. And, considering the condition of the general law on the subject of the power to provide for the use of ordinary depositions on the part of the prosecution in criminal cases, and the various provisions of the constitution itself guarding personal rights, it was quite natural for the convention to make an express declaration that the legislature should have the power to provide for such depositions except in cases of homicide; and its clear intention to do so is not at all darkened by the shadow of the rule of construction invoked. And, as before said, the language employed in the clause of the constitution in question clearly shows what was meant by the word "deposition" as there used. Indeed, there could have been no plausible doubt upon the subject if section 686 of the Penal Code, after speaking of the testimony of a witness at a preliminary examination, and then adding another provision about something having apparently no reference to a preliminary examination, did not close with the word "deposition." But the real nature of testimony given at a preliminary examination is not changed in any respect because it is called by a particular name. Indeed, in most of the cases where such testimony is held admissible it is called a "deposition." We are convinced, therefore, that no good reason is shown for departing from the rule declared in People v. Chin Hane. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BRACKETT v. BANEGAS et al. (L. A. 120.)

MORTGAGES — FORECLOSURE — DECLARATION OF HOMESTEAD—SEARCH OF RECORD—OMITTED INCUMBRANCE—NEW ACTION.

1. Where a declaration of homestead has been made by the mortgagor, a married man, residing with his family on the mortgaged premises, an action to foreclose, and the decree rendered therein, are void, if the mortgagor's wife is not a party to them.

2. Where a mortgagee, who has no knowledge that a declaration of homestead has been made by the mortgagor on the mortgaged premises, forecloses without making the mortgagor's wife a party, and the foreclosure is therefore void, the mistake is one of fact, authorizing a second action to foreclose.

3. Where an incumbrance is overlooked by an abstract company whom a mortgagee has employed to search the records for incumbrances on property against which he is about to foreclose, and the mortgagee forecloses without making the omitted incumbrancer a party, the abstract company's mistake is, as to plaintiff and parties not injured by it, a mistake without negligence, and does not bar a second action to foreclose.

4. As the doctrine of constructive notice applies only to those persons interested in the property who will be injured by the assertion of ignorance as to the record, it does not affect the right to a second foreclosure.

5. A mortgagee foreclosed relying on the report of an abstract company that there was no other incumbrance on the property, and purchased at foreclosure sale. By agreement with the mortgagor, the time for redemption was extended. Plaintiff's writ of assistance was dismissed on a showing of a homestead record which rendered the foreclosure void. Plaintiff's remedy by motion to set aside the judgment having been barred by a lapse of six months, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, he began a new action to set aside the former judgment and to foreclose, making both husband and wife parties. Held, that there was no such laches as would preclude him from maintaining the action.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by J. B. Brackett against Manuel Banegas and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. B. Mannix, for appellants. Patterson Sprigg and W. T. McNealy, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage. Plaintiff had a decree. Defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The prominent facts are as follows: On the 5th of January, 1891, plaintiff brought an action in the superior court in and for the county of San Diego to foreclose a mortgage executed by the defendant Manuel Banegas, to secure the payment of a promissory note made by him, the said Banegas, for $1,700. Before bringing such action plaintiff, as was the general practice, applied to an abstract company for a search of the records, and received a report that the only incumbrances on the mortgaged property, other than plaintiff's mortgage, was a judgment lien in favor of one J. M. Lucas. There was, in fact, at the time of such search of record, a declaration of homestead made by defendant Manuel Banegas (who was a married man, and resided with his family on the premises) upon the mortgaged premises. This was not discovered by the abstract company, and plaintiff, having no knowledge thereof, made Manuel Banegas and J. M. Lucas parties defendant in said action, and did not make Nievas Banegas, who is and was the wife of Manuel Banegas, a party defendant. A decree of foreclosure was rendered in said action, and the mortgaged property was sold thereunder, and purchased by plaintiff. The time for redemption was by agreement between plaintiff and Manuel Banegas extended for six months, upon the expiration of which time, and no redemption having been had. plaintiff obtained a writ of assistance. Thereupon, and in April, 1892, defendant moved the discharge of said writ, and set up the homestead record as a cause therefor. This was the first knowledge which plaintiff had of the homestead proceedings. The writ was discharged. Thereupon plaintiff moved the superior court for an order setting aside the decree in the case, and all proceedings subsequent thereto, and for leave to file an amended and supplemental complaint bringing in the wife, Nievas Banegas, as a party defendant. This motion was granted, but on an appeal therefrom to this court, and from an order refusing to set aside said first order, the orders were reversed, upon the ground that, more than six months having expired between the date of the decree and the order setting the same aside, the court was not, under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, authorized or empowered to make said order. Brackett v. Banegas, 99 Cal. 623, 34 Pac. 344. Thereupon plaintiff instituted this action to foreclose the same mortgage, making the wife a party defendant, and setting out in extenso the foregoing facts as ground of equitable relief in addition to the ordinary statement of a cause of action in foreclosure. The prayer of the complaint also asked that the former judgment, and all subsequent proceedings thereunder, be set aside, which prayer was granted.

The mortgaged property having been made a homestead, the action to foreclose and the decree rendered therein were void as against the wife, who was not made a party thereto. Watts v. Gallagher, 97 Cal. 47, 31 Pac. 626. In Revalk v. Kraemer, 8 Cal. 66, it was held that where a mortgage was executed by the husband alone upon the homestead, and there was a judgment of foreclosure in an action in which he alone was defendant, neither the rights of the husband or wife were affected by the proceedings. As the homestead rights of the husband and wife can only be foreclosed in an action in which both are made parties, the plaintiff acquired no title under his purchase in the action against the husband alone. Had plaintiff a right, under these circumstances, to maintain another action against Manuel Banegas and wife to foreclose? Jones, in his work on Mortgages (at section 1679), enunciates the rule as follows: "If the owner of the equity has, through mistake, not been made a party, the mortgagee who has purchased at the sale may maintain a second action to foreclose the equity of such owner, and for a new sale, but he cannot recover the costs of the previous sale." The author cites the cases of Bank v. Abbott, 20 Wis. 570, Stackpole v. Robbins, 47 Barb. 212, and Shirk v. Andrews, 92 Ind. 509, in support of the doctrine. The author adds in the same section: "Although a new action is the proper remedy for a foreclosure imperfect through failure to make all persons interested in the equity of redemption parties to the suit, the courts have allowed the original suit to be reinstated upon an amended petition, even after an interval of several years." Loftin v. Strow (Ky.) 4 S. W. 180. Courts of equity will not, save in exceptional cases, in a separate action relieve a party from errors of law, but will grant such relief in the original action upon motion or supplemental bill. Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 461; Boggs v. Hargrave, Id. 560. In this case, however, the mistake is not one of law, but of fact. The mistake consisted, not in the legal effect of the homestead, but in its existence. In such a case, the original decree having been void for the want of jurisdiction of the court below to enter it without the presence of the wife, or, what is the same thing, such service upon her as required her to appear and defend, if any defense she had, no good reason is perceived why an independent action may not be had to adjust the equities of all the parties. Manuel Banegas is not injured by the institution of the second action. The original judgment against him was for $2,449.08, with costs. The present judgment is for the $2,449.08, without the costs of the original action, and without the conventional interest or any interest thereon, from the date of the original judgment, in 1891, until the entry of the judgment herein, in 1894, a period of over three years.

Appellant contends that a counsel fee was allowed in the case against the defendant. The mortgage provided for a counsel fee, but we cannot determine from the record that one was allowed. In Ede v. Hazen, 61 Cal. 360, which was a bill in equity for relief against a judgment, brought within five months after the entry of such judgment, the court said: "The assistance of equity cannot be invoked so long as the remedy by motion exists; but when the time within which a motion may be made has expired, and no laches or want of diligence is imputable to the party asking relief, there is nothing in reason or propriety preventing the interference of equity." Bibend v. Kreutz, 20 Cal. 109, is to like effect. See, also, Sugar Co. v. Porter, 68 Cal. 369, 9 Pac. 313; Lapham v. Campbell, 61 Cal. 296; Baker v. O'Riordan, 65 Cal. 368, 4 Pac. 232. We are of opinion there was no such laches or want of diligence imputable to plaintiff as will preclude his maintaining the action.

Concede that the mistake of the abstract company was his mistake, and it only proves, as was said in Sidener v. Coons, 83 Ind. 183, that "the most careful and expert calculators (persons) make mistakes." Had plaintiff himself examined the records, and failed to ascertain the existence of the homestead filing, it might with more propriety be said he was negligent in not calling to his aid persons versed in the business; but when, as was the custom, he called to his aid a company whose business it was to make such examinations, and whom he had a right to suppose was expert in the business, and such examiner accidentally failed to discover the record of homestead, it was as to plaintiff, and as against the defendants here who are not injured thereby, a mistake without negligence.

Appellants argue at some length the doctrine that the record imparted notice to plaintiff, and therefore there is a conclusive presumption of notice on his part as to the homestead having been declared. This doctrine is correct when applied to purchasers or lienholders upon the property who will be injured by the assertion of ignorance as to the record, but is not applicable to a case like the present. A like question was involved in Shaffer v. McCloskey, 101 Cal. 576, 36 Pac. 196, and McFarland, J., speaking for the court, dismissed the question with the remark that "the fact that the deed of trust was recorded is of no value"; citing Rumpp v. Gerkens, 59 Cal. 496, and Brooks v. Rice, 56 Cal. 428, as cases in which the junior mortgages against which relief was sought were of record. The court also quotes from Pearce v. Buell, 22 Or. 29, 29 Pac. 78, where it is said: "The principle running through all cases of this class, says Barculo, J. (Barnes v. Camack, 1 Barb. 392), is that, when the legal rights of parties have been changed by mistake, equity restores them to their former conditions when it can be done without interfering with any new rights acquired on the faith and strength of the altered condition of the legal rights, and without doing injustice to other persons." See, also, Curtis v. Gooding, 99 Ind. 47.

We have examined the long array of authorities cited by appellants' counsel in support of the proposition that an application for relief from a judgment in this state for excusable neglect can only be had by motion in the action to be had within six months. None of them support the proposition in its entirety. Some of them hold that where action is taken within six months it must be by motion, and not by separate action. Others declare that where a party had knowledge of the grievance complained of in time to have proceeded by motion, and failed to do so, it is such laches as will preclude the maintenance of a separate action. We should be inclined to hold that in a case where a valid decree of foreclosure against the mortgagor and a sale thereunder had been had, omitting from the action a party having rights in the premises which could only be foreclosed by his being made a party to the action, the proper practice would be to bring such party into the original action by a supplemental bill. But the status of the husband and wife as to the homestead is sui generis. A foreclosure as to one of the spouses is ineffectual for any purpose without the joinder of the other, except in those cases where the homestead has a value in excess of $5,000. The judgment is void so far as the security is concerned, and the purchaser thereunder does not take with notice, as in cases of sales under ordinary execution. Being thus void, a new action may be brought.

The contention that the complaint does not ask that the original judgment be set aside, and that the decree herein does not set it aside, is not supported by, but is in direct conflict with, the record. The prayer of the complaint is "that the said decree, sale, order of sale, and the satisfaction of said judgment be vacated and set aside," etc. The decree follows, in substance, the language of the prayer of the complaint. The findings are supported by the evidence, and we recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

DAVEY v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (No. 15,999.)

EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

A judgment will be sustained notwithstanding exclusion of evidence on objection that it was "irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent," when the proper objection was variance between pleading and proof. Beatty, C. J., and Henshaw, J., dissenting.

In bank. For opinion in department, see 45 Pac. 170.

VAN FLEET, J. Appeal by plaintiff from a judgment of nonsuit and an order denying a new trial. The action was for damages for personal injuries, and the complaint alleged, in substance: That defendant operated a railroad upon a public highway in Alameda county, known as "Stanford Street"; that there was a culvert or drain crossing said street, and extending under the tracks of defendant's road, which was securely and safely covered with planking and earth; that defendant caused this drain to be opened and excavated to a greater depth and width, and thereafter negligently left it open and unprotected, and in a dangerous condition, for the whole distance across said street and under defendant's track; that while it remained in this dangerous condition, plaintiff, without knowledge thereof, in proceeding in the nighttime to "cross said railroad track on said street," fell between the rails of said track into the excavation, and received the injuries of which she complained. At the trial, plaintiff, without amendment of her complaint, offered evidence tending to show that the point where the drain or culvert crossed beneath defendant's track, and where the accident occurred, instead of being, as alleged, on a public street, was in fact on the private right of way of the defendant, running over land admittedly owned by it in fee; but that at the point in question there was a footpath crossing said railroad, which was then, and had been for many years, constantly and continuously used by the people of the neighborhood, under circumstances such as authorized the inference that it was so used by the consent and license of the defendant. This evidence was all excluded under the objection of the defendant that it was "irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent"; and, the plaintiff resting without offering other proof, the nonsuit followed.

The only question arising is whether this evidence was properly rejected, since, if it was, the nonsuit was logical, and the judgment and order should be affirmed. In support of the ruling the respondent now urges that the evidence was properly rejected, because it did not tend to establish any issue joined by the pleadings; that the complaint sought to charge the defendant for injuries inflicted through its negligence in opening and leaving exposed and unprotected a dangerous excavation upon a public street; while the case sought to be made by the offered evidence was that of an injury resulting from such an excavation made upon the private property of defendant, but at a point where plaintiff was privileged to pass by the defendant's license. That there was thus presented a material variance between the pleadings and the proof is quite obvious, and, indeed, is not denied by appellant. But appellant contends that the question of variance which is now relied upon by respondent was not raised in the court below; that no such specific objection was there made, nor was it fairly included within the general objection interposed; that, had it been called to the attention of counsel for appellant at the time the evidence was offered, plaintiff would have had an opportunity to conform her pleading to the proof, and thus have obviated the objection; and it is urged that respondent should not now be heard to make such objection for the first time in this court, and thus cut off plaintiff's right to so amend, and have her case tried upon its merits. It does not appear that this specific objection was suggested at the trial, but the objection there made, and the ruling had, would seem to have proceeded upon a different theory from that upon which respondent now rests. But, unfortunately for appellant, this fact of itself constitutes no sufficient ground for reversing the ruling of the court. The fact that the action of the court may have been based upon an erroneous theory of the case, or upon an improper or unsound course of reasoning, cannot determine the question of its propriety. No rule of decision is better or more firmly established by authority, nor one resting upon a sounder basis of reason and propriety, than that a ruling or decision, itself correct in law, will not be disturbed on appeal merely because given for a wrong reason. If right upon any theory of the law applicable to the case, it must be sustained regardless of the considerations which may have moved the trial court to its conclusion. Thus in Chabot v. Tucker, 39 Cal. 434, it is said by Mr. Justice Temple for the court: "The proper subjects of review in this court are the rulings and decisions of the district court, but not the reasons given for such rulings. The fact that the statute requires the judge to state in writing the grounds upon which the motion was granted or denied does not make it incumbent on the prevailing party to defend the logic of the judge. It is enough if the decision be correct." And again by the same learned judge in Re Kingsley's Estate, 93 Cal. 576, 577, 29 Pac. 244: "With the process of reasoning by which the court reached its conclusion we have nothing to do. That may have been erroneous, and the ruling correct.

To justify a reversal, it is incumbent upon the appellant to show an erroneous ruling, and not merely bad reasoning or mistaken views of the law." See, also, People v. Crowey, 56 Cal. 39; White v. Merrill, 82 Cal. 15, 22 Pac. 1129; Shanklin v. Hall, 100 Cal. 26, 34 Pac. 636; Groome v. Almstead, 101 Cal. 425, 429, 35 Pac. 1021. In other words, it is judicial action, and not judicial reasoning or argument, which is the subject of review; and, if the former be correct, we are not concerned with the faults of the latter.

This principle must result in sustaining the ruling in question. That the offered evidence was inadmissible under the complaint, and was for that reason properly excluded, is manifest, since it had no tendency to establish the facts therein alleged. Assuming it to be true that it was rejected for another and insufficient ground, that fact cannot affect the propriety of the ruling. An objection to evidence is but a reason offered for its exclusion. The objection may be untenable or insufficient, yet, if sustained, and there appears any other reason for which the evidence should have been excluded, the ruling must stand. And even where no objection is made, but the court excludes evidence of its own motion, the ruling will be sustained, if the evidence was for any reason inadmissible. "If the court decides correctly in rejecting the testimony, it is not important whether the best objection was made or whether any objection was made." People v. Graham, 21 Cal. 266. And see Parker v. Smith, 4 Cal. 105; People v. Wallace, 89 Cal. 166, 26 Pac. 650; Clark v. Huber, 25 Cal. 594, 598. Nor does the fact that a party has made an improper or insufficient objection in the court below preclude or estop him in this court from justifying a ruling in his favor upon any other ground. In Clark v. Huber, supra, the appellant, as here, objected to the respondent being permitted to make in this court, in support of the ruling, an objection not made in the court below. The facts upon which the objection arose were precisely similar to the circumstances involved here. The defendant in that case had in the court below offered certain evidence to show an estoppel, which was excluded on a general objection of the plaintiff. In this court the plaintiff, while conceding that the facts offered would have established an estoppel, justified the ruling on the new ground that no estoppel had been pleaded, and hence the evidence was properly rejected. In response to the contention of the defendant that the plaintiff should be confined to the objection made below, it is there said: "The reasoning, pushed to its consequences, would preclude the respondent from submitting any argument in favor of the ruling. It is unnecessary, however, to consider the question upon principle, for it is well settled that the burden of showing error is upon the party who alleges it. The error alleged here is the exclusion of the defendant's testimony. The respondent is at liberty to suggest any ground that he may choose to show that the ruling was right, whether advanced in the discussion below or not. If the testimony had been admitted, and Clark had appealed, he would have been required to confine himself to objections specifically taken at the trial and stated in the record. The distinction is between the case of a party seeking to reverse a judgment and that of a party resisting the attempt." The cases of Dikeman v. Norrie, 36 Cal. 94, McKay v. Riley, 65 Cal. 623, 4 Pac. 667, and Howland v. Railway Co., 110 Cal. 513, 42 Pac. 983, relied upon by appellant, in which it is held that the party is restricted to the specific objection taken below, all present instances where the objecting party was seeking to overthrow the judgment. The distinction between the rule applied in those cases and the one which must govern here is aptly stated in Clark v. Huber, supra. This distinction springs from the familiar rule that all intendments run in support of the judgment.

While it is matter of regret that the plaintiff may be debarred, by the predicament in which the case is found, from having her facts submitted to a jury, yet primarily the fault lies with her. It was incumbent upon her to foresee the danger of taking a ruling upon the evidence offered without amending her complaint. The variance presented was so manifest that it should have been perceived without suggestion; but, moreover, it was suggested, although not in express terms, by the objection made. In Strong v. Patterson, 6 Cal. 157, 158, where the court below had admitted evidence of a fact not pleaded, over an objection that it was "irrelevant," the judgment was reversed on that ground, and the court, by Mr. Chief Justice Murray, said: "While we hold that a general exception to the admission of testimony is insufficient, because the party offering it is entitled to know the ground of such objection, so that he may supply other evidence or obviate it, we think that an objection that testimony is irrelevant is sufficiently explicit, as it can mean but one thing, viz. that the testimony does not fit the case, or is not proper under the issues framed." For these reasons the judgment and order must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; TEMPLE, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment and in the opinion of Mr. Justice VAN FLEET. It is proper to say that, owing to the peculiar condition of the record, and the wrong reasons given for excluding certain evidence, the department, on the former hearing, very naturally overlooked the distinction between the position of a party seeking to reverse a judgment and that of a party seeking to maintain it.

BEATTY, C. J. (dissenting). I dissent. The only real objection to the evidence offered by plaintiff was upon the ground of variance, and that objection was not made. Not being specifically made, it was waived, because by section 469, Code Civ. Proc., it is expressly declared that "no variance between the allegation in a pleading and the proof is to be deemed material, unless it has actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense upon the merits. Whenever it appears that a party has been so misled, the court may order the pleading to be amended, on such terms as may be just." There can be no better evidence that a party has not been misled to his prejudice by a variance in the proof than is afforded by his failure to object to it on that ground. His failure to object is a tacit admission that he will not be prejudiced, and makes it the duty of the court, under the section quoted, to disregard the variance as immaterial. If he does object on that ground, and it appears that he has been misled, it then becomes the duty of the court to order an amendment on such terms as may be just. In this case, if this law had been observed, the worst that could have happened to the plaintiff would have been a continuance at her cost. By disregarding it, her action is defeated, regardless of its real merits. I do not think we are warranted in ignoring this provision of the statute in such a case.

I concur: HENSHAW, J.

FORD et al. v. BUSHARD et al. (L. A. 169.)[1]

PARTIES—SUBSTITUTION—PLEADING.

1. Objection to an ex parte order of substitution is waived by answering the supplemental complaint of the substituted plaintiff.

2. Where one is substituted as plaintiff on the ground of an assignment of the cause of action by the original plaintiff, the assignment must be alleged in the supplemental complaint, and, if put in issue, must be proved.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Action by H. A. Ford and another against J. J. Bushard and another. Carrie E. Ford was afterwards substituted for H. A. Ford. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Isidore B. Dockweiler, for appellants. Frank James, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This action was brought June 16, 1894, by H. A. Ford and Edwin Clark to recover damages from J. J. Bushard and Joseph Mesmer for the violation of a written contract entered into by said defendants with the plaintiffs on September 11, 1890, for the sale and delivery by defendants to plaintiffs of say 2,000 budded orange trees; 500 thereof to be of the variety named "Mediterranean Sweets" and the remainder "Washington Navels." Plaintiffs claimed that, excepting a small number, the trees delivered were not of the varieties named in the contract. Defendants answered separately, raising issues of fact, and defendant Mesmer denied the execution of the contract. Thereafter, and before the trial of the cause, upon the application of Carrie E. Ford, she was substituted as a party plaintiff in the cause in the place and stead of H. A. Ford, who it was shown had departed this life since the commencement of the action, and had, before his death, assigned all his right and interest in the contract to said Carrie E. Ford. The order of the court also granted her leave to file a supplemental complaint, which she did, setting out the death and assignment as aforesaid. Defendants answered the supplemental complaint, specifically denying the death of H. A. Ford, and the assignment by him to Carrie E. Ford. The cause was tried before a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of plaintiffs for $2,000. At the trial no evidence was offered to show the assignment by H. A. Ford to Carrie E. Ford. The failure of evidence was assigned by defendants as one of the causes for a new trial. The motion for such new trial was denied, and defendants appeal from the judgment, and from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

Defendants claim that the order of substitution of Carrie E. Ford was made ex parte. There is no showing in the record on the subject. If the order was made without notice, the answer of the defendants to the supplemental complaint without objection was a waiver of the error. Smith v. Curtis, 7 Cal. 584. Were it otherwise, we are, in the absence of any showing on the subject, to presume in favor of the regularity of the proceedings that notice was given. The point is this: Plaintiff Carrie E. Ford having been substituted as plaintiff, not as the personal representative of H. A. Ford, but as his assignee, and having set up an assignment of the contract to her, which assignment was denied by the defendants, was it necessary for her to prove such assignment in order to a recovery against defendants? We think this question must be answered in the affirmative. In Taylor v. Railroad Co., 45 Cal. 324, it was held that the substitution of an executor or administrator could be made on ex parte motion. In Campbell v. West, 93 Cal. 653, 29 Pac. 219, it was said: "The other provisions of this section (section 385, Code Civ. Proc.) relating to substitution in case of any other transfer of interest, when set in motion by a plaintiff, or the person to whom the transfer is made, or by the defendant, if for any reason he desires to avail himself of such transfer for any purpose, must be made by a supplemental complaint or answer." In case of an assignment the supplemental complaint should set out such assignment, which is an issuable fact, and, if denied, its proof in such a case, as in all cases of assignment, is vital to a recovery. Murdock v. Brooks, 38 Cal. 596; Read v. Buffum, 79 Cal. 77, 21 Pac. 555; Bowman v. Keleman, 65 N. Y. 598. In case of an alleged assignment of the cause of action the assignee is entitled to be substituted upon a showing of probable cause, but the defendant is not thereby precluded from denying such assignment, and, if he does so, the fact must be determined by the preponderance of evidence, as in the case of other issues. Suppose, for instance, that in a case like the present the motion for substitution is based, as is often the case, upon a supplemental complaint, duly verified, and setting out the issuable facts. Would it be contended that a defendant was thereby debarred from denying the facts alleged therein, or that, in case of such denial, the plaintiff was absolved from proving them? Manifestly, as we think, he would not. Were it otherwise, a defendant would be liable to pay a demand a second time, should it turn out and be shown by a preponderance of evidence that no assignment had in fact been made. The issues in a case are not to be tried upon affidavit, but by such evidence as the law recognizes in open court. A defendant may, for the purposes of an injunction, or other ancillary process, admit all the allegations of a complaint to be true, but such admission would not serve as evidence in a trial upon the merits in the face of an answer denying such allegations. For the total failure of testimony showing an assignment the judgment and order should be reversed, and we so recommend.

PEOPLE et al. v. EAGAN. (Cr. 136.)

ELECTIONS—INDICTMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. An indictment which charged that defendants conspired to add to the votes cast for one candidate and to subtract from those cast for another, contrary to St. 1893, p. 25, § 27, and did violate said law by doing certain acts constituting the substantive crime, was not bad for duplicity.

2. The indictment charged defendant and five others with adding to the votes cast for one candidate and subtracting from those cast for another. The only part taken by defendant in the count was "calling off" from the ballots, successively with others, the names of candidates voted for, of which tally was kept by others, and he signed the certificate of totals, which were false. The other defendants testified for the prosecution, and defendant for himself, that they had honestly counted and returned the votes; and it was not shown that the error, which must have occurred in "calling off" or tallying, was not made by others than defendants. Held, that the indictment was not sustained.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Francisco county; George H. Bahrs, Judge.

Dunne & McPike, S. H. Regensberger, and John L. Love, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., Charles H. Jackson, Dep. Atty. Gen., and William S. Barnes, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

BRITT, C. Six persons, inclusive of appellant, who were officers of election in and for a certain precinct of the city and county of San Francisco at the general election held November 6, 1894, are jointly accused by the indictment in this cause of felony committed in violation of the "Act to promote the purity of elections" (St. 1893, p. 25). Eagan was tried separately, and convicted.

1. It is provided in section 27 of said act that "every person who willfully adds to or subtracts from the votes actually cast at an election, in any official or unofficial returns, or who alters such returns, is punishable by imprisonment," etc. Disentangled from the verbiage with which it is embarrassed, the substance of the charging part of the indictment is that defendants confederated and conspired together to sign, certify, and attest as true and genuine the tally lists and returns of said election in said precinct, and did knowingly act in violation of the laws relating to elections by signing, certifying, and attesting as true and correct tally lists and returns which showed that M. C. Haley had received 63 of the votes cast at said election in said precinct for the office of county clerk, and that C. F. Curry had received 143 of such votes; whereas, in truth and in fact, Haley had received 91 votes for said office, and Curry had received 102 votes; that each of the defendants knew the returns signed and certified by him to be false and untrue in the particulars specified; contrary to the form of the statute, etc. The indictment might have been improved in the quality of distinctness, but there is no duplicity in it, as urged by appellant. The defendants are accused of a single offense, viz. adding to the votes cast for Curry and subtracting from those for Haley, contrary to the provision of said section 27. The allegation that the defendants confederated and conspired, etc., was not the statement of a substantive offense, as appellant supposes. A completed felony was charged, and in this the precedent acts of conspiracy were merged. When several acts together constitute one offense, they may be alleged in a single count; and the present indictment does no more than this. 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 438; People v. Gusti, 113 Cal. 177, 45 Pac. 263.

2. But our examination of the record has compelled the conclusion that the evidence did not warrant the verdict of guilty. The board conducting the election at said precinct consisted of three inspectors and three judges. There were, besides, six clerks. Eagan was one of the inspectors. The law (Pol. Code, § 1142) allows members of the board to relieve one another in the duty of canvassing the vote, but requires the final certificate to be signed by a majority of the whole. The offices to be filled at said election were numerous, and the count of the vote proceeded continuously for more than 30 hours after close of the polls. The only part taken by Eagan in the count was "calling off" for a few hours; that is, he read from the ballots the names of candidates voted for, while mark or tally was kept by others of the votes announced by him. He was thus engaged at intervals which together comprised but a comparatively small portion of the time occupied in the count. Other members of the board of election and some of the clerks—eight or nine in all—were successively engaged in the business of "calling off." Eagan signed the certificate of the totals which was prepared by some of the clerks. Such certificate varied from the fact in the matter of the vote for county clerk as alleged in the indictment. The discrepancy was detected, it seems, upon a contest instituted in court where a recount from the ballots was had. Each of the codefendants of appellant was introduced as a witness by the people, and each testified that he himself had honestly performed his part of the work of counting and returning the vote. This was virtually the sum of the evidence for the prosecution. There was no evidence—aside from the error in the returns—that appellant ever indicated by word or act an intent or desire to falsify the vote, or that he had any motive to do so. "Watchers," who scrutinized the count, were in attendance during the progress thereof, but none suggested that appellant was perpetrating wrong. He was sworn in his own behalf, and testified that he read the ballots correctly and honestly, and had, when he joined in certifying the return list, no knowledge of any error; that he did not know Curry, and had no interest in his election. The case for the prosecution was circumstantial. It was not claimed that the returns were altered in any particular, or did not correspond with the tally lists; so that the error, whether fraudulent or otherwise, must have occurred in reading from the ballots or in tallying. There was a gross error in the returns, and appellant had the opportunity for its commission. But others had had the same opportunity. We are not dealing with the conditions which might be presented if all the persons who had facilities for perpetrating the crime charged had been sworn, and all had alike purged themselves as did the six defendants aforesaid. Possibly, in such a case, it would be solely for the jury to determine whether there was fraudulent error, and where the responsibility lay; but here several persons who, as members of the board, or as clerks, had "called off" votes, or had kept tally, were not before the court, and their work was in no manner vindicated. It is elementary law that circumstances relied upon to establish the guilt of one accused of crime must be consistent with that hypothesis and inconsistent with any other rational conclusion. Ordinarily, the deduction to be drawn from the circumstances is for the jury, but in this instance it is manifest that every fact proved is consistent with the reasonable conclusion that the false return resulted without appellant's connivance, from the acts of persons who had equal opportunity with him, and that there is no evidence tending to exclude this inference. There is, therefore, a failure of proof in a particular necessary to conviction, and the question is one of law for the court. People v. Martin, 2 Cal. 484; People v. Jones, 31 Cal. 565; People v. Darr, 61 Cal. 554; Burrill, Cir. Ev. 181 et seq. We are fully sensible of the flagrancy of the offense charged, and of the need and importance of strictly enforcing the law designed for its prevention and the prevention of all similar practices. They justly excite the alarm and resentment of upright citizens. But while these considerations incite to vigilance for the detection and suppression of such evils, they suggest also caution, lest the result of a trial is reached through the operation of sentiment noted by Sir Matthew Hale in treating of another crime: "The heinousness of the offense many times transporting the judge and jury with so much indignation that they are over-hastily carried to the conviction of the persons accused thereof." The judgment and order denying a new trial should be reversed.

We concur: BELCHER, C., SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reason given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

STORKE v. STORKE. (L. A. 206.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 16, 1897.)

In bank. On rehearing. Denied.

For opinion in department, see 47 Pac. 869. Affirmed.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing of this case, not because I consider that the propositions discussed in the department opinion are incorrectly decided, but because I think that the plaintiff is estopped by his own acts to ask a reversal of the order appealed from. When that order was made, the defendant, at whose instance it was made, became so doubtful of its validity that she deemed it a necessary precaution to take an appeal from the judgment, and that appeal was dismissed by this court, upon motion of the plaintiff, on the ground that, the judgment having been set aside, there was nothing to appeal from. Storke v. Storke, 111 Cal. 514, 44 Pac. 173. Having succeeded in depriving her of a hearing upon the merits of her appeal from the judgment, on the ground that there was no judgment in existence when her appeal was taken, the plaintiff has now succeeded in obtaining a decision that the order vacating the judgment was void, and, in effect, that the judgment has all the time been in full force; or, if this is not the meaning of the decision, the plaintiff has at least succeeded in having the judgment restored to life after the defendant's right of appeal has been taken away, upon his suggestion that an appeal from a vacated judgment could not be taken.

I am entirely agreed with the court that the order setting aside the decree of divorce was invalid, and that it ought to have been reversed, except for the fact that the plaintiff adopted it, and necessarily asserted its validity in moving to dismiss the former appeal. Having taken that position, and having deprived the defendant of her right of appeal, upon the theory that there was no judgment, he should not be allowed now to claim, as against her, that there is a judgment.

It is but just to counsel for plaintiff to say that, in presenting their motion to dismiss the defendant's appeal, they were perfectly frank with the court. They kept nothing back. Everything connected with the making of the order vacating the decree of divorce was as fully presented then as it is in this record, so that the invalidity of the order was just as apparent then as it is now; and their purpose to have it reversed upon appeal (this appeal) was distinctly avowed. In other words, they told the court plainly that they intended to rely on the order vacating the decree only so long as it was useful to them for the purpose of depriving the defendant of her right of appeal, and, as soon as that purpose was accomplished, they would ask us to annul the order, and put the judgment in full force. The answer the court ought to have made to this proposition is obvious. Counsel should have been plainly informed that they would not be allowed to blow hot and cold about the order, as might suit their convenience; that they would be required to take one position or the other as to its validity, once and for all; that, if they asserted its validity for the purpose of dismissing the defendant's appeal, they would not afterwards be heard to question its validity for the purpose of enforcing their judgment; and that if they asserted, or intended to assert, its invalidity or procure its reversal, they should not be allowed to dismiss, as superfluous, an appeal which might be the only means of vindicating the rights of the defendant. That the court did not make this answer to the plaintiff's motion does not, however, excuse the plaintiff. He sought the order, and, notwithstanding it ought to have been denied on his own showing, he obtained it and all the advantages flowing from it, and it does not lie in his mouth to say that the court made a mistake in granting his request. Having, by the aid of the court, cut off his adversary from her right of appeal, upon the theory that there was nothing to appeal from, he should not be heard to say that this was an erroneous theory, or allowed to take any proceeding in this forum to put in force a judgment against her from which he induced us to say she had no need to appeal.

It is suggested that this reasoning may be turned against the defendant; that she, in appealing from a judgment which, upon her motion, had been vacated by the trial court, was just as inconsistent as the plaintiff has been in relying upon the order for one purpose, and then seeking to set it aside after taking advantage of it. But the difference between the two cases is obvious. Defendant took two proceedings to accomplish the same object, i. e. to set aside the judgment; and the most that can be said is that, if the first was effective, the second was superfluous. She did not, by either step, seek to deprive the plaintiff of any legal remedy for the enforcement of his rights. Doubting the efficiency of one order, she sought another, of the efficiency of which there could be no doubt. Her appeal from the judgment was an avowal of her distrust of the order. The order had not harmed the defendant, or induced him to change his position in any respect, or forego any advantage. To justify plaintiff's change of front, on the ground that he is only following in the path where the defendant led the way, is to confound the distinction between the act of a party who takes a perfectly proper proceeding to accomplish a legitimate end, and the party who says to the court, "You must not allow this lawful means of redress to my adversary, because she has sought redress by another means," and who announces in the same breath his claim, and his intention to enforce it, and that the former proceeding was inefficacious.

If it be said that the judgment on the former appeal (111 Cal. 514, 44 Pac. 173) and that on the present appeal are consistent, because, when the defendant took her appeal from the judgment, no appeal had been taken from the order vacating it, and therefore there was no judgment to appeal from, I say that this proposition is answered by all the reasoning of the court in Pierce v. Birkholm, a decision by the court in bank, reported in 110 Cal. 669, 43 Pac. 205. In that case the plaintiff had obtained an order for a new trial, from which the defendant had appealed; whereupon the plaintiff appealed from the judgment, which, upon his motion, had been vacated by the order granting a new trial. A motion was made by the defendant to dismiss the plaintiff's appeal from the judgment, upon the ground that, when the appeal was taken, there was no judgment in existence. But the motion was denied. It is true that this case differs from that in the fact that the appeal from the judgment was taken before the appeal from the vacating order; but that is a wholly immaterial circumstance. A vacating order is just as much in suspense until the time for appeal has elapsed as it is after a timely appeal has been taken. To hold otherwise would be to make a distinction where there is no difference, and to put it in the power of a party to do just what he was not allowed to do in Pierce v. Birkholm in every case in which an order granting a new trial is made less than 60 days before the expiration of a year from the judgment.

It may be said that the only effect of this argument, if sound, is to prove that the former decision was wrong, and the present decision correct. This is very true, but it remains equally true that a party who has obtained an advantage over his adversary by an erroneous decision which he has invoked should not be allowed to escape any of the consequences of that decision in the same litigation, with the same adversary, in the same forum, when it is no longer in his power, or that of the court, to restore the right which has been taken away. If the principle of estoppel means anything, this was a case for its application.

LAMBERT v. DAVIS et al. (Sac. 207.)

LIEN ON THRESHING MACHINE — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Under St. 1885, p. 109, § 1, providing that every person performing work in or about any threshing machine while engaged in threshing shall have a lien thereon for his services, a person so performing work at the employment of one who is lawfully in possession and operation thereof, under contract with the owner, is entitled to such lien.

2. St. 1885, p. 109, § 1, is not unconstitutional, as authorizing a deprivation of the property of the owner without due process of law, because it gives a lien to one not employed by the actual owner.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; E. W. Risley, Judge.

Frank H. Short, for appellants. W. D. Crichton and W. D. Foote, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. An act entitled "An act to secure the wages of persons employed as laborers on threshing machines," approved March 12, 1885 (St. 1885, p. 109), provides: "Section 1. Every person performing work or labor of any kind, in, with, about or upon any threshing machine, the engine, horse-power, wagons or appurtenances thereof, while engaged in threshing, shall have a lien upon the same to the extent of the value of his services." It also makes provision for the method of enforcing such lien, by sale of the property, etc. The single question presented by the appeal under the facts is whether a laborer performing labor in and about the operation of a threshing machine and outfit, at the employment of one not the actual owner, but lawfully in the possession and operation of the machine under contract with the owner, can have and maintain against the property the lien for his services provided by the act. Appellant's contention is that to so construe the act, and give to one not employed by the actual owner the benefit of the lien, would render it obnoxious to the constitutional objection of authorizing a deprivation of the property of the owner without due process of law. This precise question was presented and decided by the court in bank in the case of Chuch v. Garrison, 75 Cal. 199, 16 Pac. 885, where it was held that the statute applied to exactly such a case, and that the lien could be constitutionally maintained; "that the actual ownership of the property was an immaterial circumstance,"—the obvious theory, and, as we deem it, the correct one, being that one lawfully holding from the actual owner the possession and right to operate the machine is to be deemed, for the purposes of the statute, the owner of the property.

Appellant contends that this point was not squarely involved or necessarily decided in Chuch v. Garrison, but that, if it was, that case should be overruled. But, as we read that case, it was the exact and only question in the case, and was necessary to its determination; and we find nothing in the reasoning or authorities presented by appellant which tends to shake our conviction in the correctness of the views there expressed, and, upon the authority of that case, the judgment herein must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; BEATTY, C. J.

(Supreme Court of California. June 17, 1896.)

INFORMATION—TIME FOR FILING.

The burden on the state to show "good cause" (Pen. Code, § 1382) for failing to file an information within 30 days from commitment (Id. § 809) is not satisfied by a showing that the committing magistrate failed to file the papers with the clerk of court within said time, since the information might have been filed before a return of such papers.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; A. L. Frick, Judge.

One Wickham was convicted of embezzlement, and appeals. Reversed.

W. F. Aram, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and Charles H. Jackson, Dep. Atty. Gen., for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an appeal from a judgment made and entered in the superior court of Alameda county, convicting the defendant of the crime of embezzlement. The only point made for a reversal is that the court erred in denying defendant's motion to dismiss the prosecution, upon the ground that the information against him was not filed within 30 days after he was held to answer. The constitution provides that a party accused of crime "shall have the right to a speedy and public trial." Const. art. 1, § 13. And the Penal Code provides:

"Sec. 809. When a defendant has been examined and committed, as provided in section 872 of this Code, it shall be the duty of the district attorney, within thirty days thereafter, to file in the superior court of the county in which the offense is triable an information," etc.

"Sec. 1382. The court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution to be dismissed in the following cases: (1) When a person has been held to answer for a public offense, if an indictment is not found or an information filed against him within thirty days thereafter. (2) If a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed upon his application, is not brought to trial within sixty days after the finding of the indictment or filing of the information."

It appears from the bill of exceptions that the defendant was examined before a committing magistrate upon a charge of embezzlement, and that an order holding him to answer before the superior court of Alameda county for the said offense was made and indorsed on the deposition by the magistrate on June 25, 1895; that the complaint, depositions, etc., remained in the custody and possession of the said magistrate until August 1, 1895, when they were returned to and filed in the office of the clerk of said court; that the information against the defendant was filed by the district attorney on August 21, 1895, and on that day the defendant moved the court to dismiss the prosecution, because the information was not filed within the 30-days time required by the statute; and that the only cause shown by the district attorney why the information was not filed within the time prescribed was that the said papers were not filed by the magistrate until August 1st. It further appears that the defendant, at the hearing of his motion, offered to prove that a deputy district attorney of the county attended the said examination, and conducted the same on the part of the people, and heard the order made holding the defendant to answer, but the court refused to hear the offered evidence, and thereupon denied defendant's motion, to which ruling he excepted.

It was the duty of the magistrate to return to the clerk of the court the papers in the case "without delay" (Pen. Code, § 883); and if no cause existed, other than appears in the record, for his failure to return them earlier than he did, he was guilty of inexcusable negligence. It was not, however, necessary, that the papers be returned before an information could be filed. People v. Riley, 65 Cal. 107, 3 Pac. 413; People v. Ah Sing, 95 Cal. 657, 30 Pac. 797. If there was any good cause for not filing the information sooner, the burden was on the prosecution to show it; but the mere fact that the papers were not returned by the magistrate did not constitute such cause. In People v. Morino, 85 Cal. 515, 24 Pac. 892, the motion to dismiss the prosecution was made under the second subdivision of section 1382 of the Penal Code. It was said: "The statute is imperative: 'The court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution to be dismissed.' Here no cause for delay was shown. It was enough for the defendant to show that the time fixed by the statute, after information filed, had expired, and that the case had not been postponed on his application. If there was any good cause for holding him for a longer time without a trial, it was for the prosecution to show it. The court could not presume it. Under the facts as shown, the case should have been dismissed, and it was error to deny the motion." The decision in that case is applicable to this, and it follows that, upon the showing made, the court below should have granted the defendant's motion, and dismissed the prosecution against him. The judgment should be reversed, and the court below directed to dismiss the prosecution, unless, upon a further hearing, good cause is shown for the failure to file the information within the time prescribed by the statute.

We concur: BRITT, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the court below directed to dismiss the prosecution, unless, upon a further hearing, good cause is shown for the failure to file the information within the time prescribed by the statute.

Ex parte LAWRENCE et al. (Cr. 273.)

STATE SENATE—INVESTIGATION—WITNESSES — REFUSAL TO ANSWER — CONTEMPT—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATION.

1. Where the state senate is investigating the conduct of its members, under a published charge that some of them, whose names were not given, have taken bribes, and has called as witnesses the editor and a reporter of the paper which published the charge, it is a contempt of the senate's authority for the witnesses to refuse to give the names of those from whom they had received information touching the charge of bribery, and the nature of that information.

2. The information was not a privileged communication, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1881.

In bank. Habeas corpus proceedings on the relation of A. M. Lawrence and L. L. Levings, imprisoned for contempt of the authority of the state senate, before whom they had been called as witnesses. Writ discharged, and prisoners remanded.

Garret W. McEnerney and Knight & Heggerty, for petitioners. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and W. H. Anderson, Dep. Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The senate of the state was engaged in an investigation of the conduct of its members under a published charge that some of them, whose names were not given, had taken bribes for aiding in the passage of a certain bill. The news editor and one of the reporters of the paper which published this charge were called upon to testify in the matter, and refused to answer certain interrogatories propounded to them, upon the ground that the information sought to be elicited was privileged, and that the evidence, if given, would be irrelevant and hearsay. The questions, in substance, contained a demand that the witnesses should give the names of those from whom they had received information touching the charge of bribery, and the nature of that information. The inquisitorial investigation upon which the senate was engaged was one strictly within its jurisdiction to prosecute. It had the undoubted power to examine into the alleged criminal conduct of some of its members, with a view to their expulsion or other punishment if found guilty. Ex parte McCarthy, 29 Cal. 395. Under such an investigation, these witnesses, who were shown to have been responsible for the published charge, and who at the same time disclaimed personal knowledge of the facts, were asked to give the names of their informants. It was a natural and logical method for the senate to follow in its endeavor to arrive at the truth. If the witnesses, first answering that they had no personal knowledge of the matter, were to be justified in refusing to give the names of their informants, the senatorial inquiry must necessarily come to an end. Upon the other hand, if they stated the names of their informants, and the nature of their information, the senate could summon those persons and so trace the charge to a just conclusion. The evidence, then, was relevant and pertinent. The case differs from those presented in courts where the interests lie between conflicting parties, and where improper evidence sought to be introduced in the interests of one must be to the injury of the other. Here the inquiry was inquisitorial, to arrive at the truth concerning the charge of corruption, silent as to names, indefinite as to facts, but specific in its assertion of bribery. There were no parties to this proceeding. The senate was investigating the conduct of its own members, and it was a contempt of its authority for the witnesses to refuse to give the names of those who were responsible for the promulgation of the charge. It cannot be successfully contended, and has not been seriously argued, that the witnesses were justified in refusing to give these names upon the ground that the communication was privileged. Code Civ. Proc. § 1881. The writ is discharged, and the prisoners remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Sacramento county.

PEOPLE v. CHURCH. (Cr. 210.)

Robbery—Larceny—Instructions.

Where the evidence on a trial for robbery was that, while talking to prosecutor, defendant suddenly snatched prosecutor's watch chain, and ran away, and that at the same time prosecutor started backward, and his hat fell, it was a question for the jury whether sufficient force was used in the taking to constitute the offense a robbery, and it was therefore error to charge so as to eliminate the question of grand larceny, the property being of sufficient value.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Chas. G. Nagle, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and Charles H. Jackson, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. Defendant was charged with the crime of robbery, alleged to have been committed by taking from the person of one Smith a certain gold watch, of the value of $90, one gold chain, of the value of $30, and one gold knife, of the value of $5. It is further charged that the property belonged to Smith, and that force and intimidation were used in the taking. He was convicted, and now prosecutes this appeal.

The offense here charged is claimed to have been committed in a saloon, in the presence of various habitués of that resort, and all the evidence of the prosecution bearing upon the actual taking of the property may be summed up as follows: One witness testified: "Saw some difficulty between defendant and Mr. Smith. Saw defendant grab a watch from Mr. Smith's vest, and run through the door with it. I did not notice whether the chain was gold or silver. It was a kind of reddish or yellow color. I saw a watch attached to it." Cross-examination: "At the time the watch was taken, we were standing around the bar. The first I saw of Church [defendant] after we were standing up at the bar was when he grabbed for the chain. I saw him make a motion towards it. Mr. Church [defendant] was standing with his back towards Mr. Smith, and in conversation at the bar. I could see the chain, and saw the defendant take hold of it and pull it. I don't know whether the chain broke or not. I never saw any part of it afterwards. The reason I know the watch was attached to it was because I saw it about ten minutes before. I did not see him take the watch from his pocket, but I saw the watch hanging to the chain about ten minutes before. I saw him grab for the chain, and take it. It was done so quick that I could not swear that I saw the watch being taken." Another witness said: "I saw some trouble between Smith and defendant, Church. I was standing alongside the bar, just behind the defendant, about the time the affair occurred; and I saw— Well, I could not say he made a grab. I did not see him grab the watch, but I saw Harry Church make a grab at the watch, and run out the door. I did not see him grab the watch, but I saw him make a grab, and run out the door shortly afterwards. I did not notice anything remarkable before the alleged grab." Another witness said: "I saw the difficulty between Smith and the defendant. I was at the end of the bar nearest the door, and Church called Smith aside to where I was standing; and, not wishing to overhear the conversation, I moved to the other end of the bar, and, after a few minutes elapsed, I saw Smith start back, and his hat fell off, and Church made a break to the door. That is all I saw of it or know about it. He ran out of the door."

In instructing the jury as to the law which should govern their deliberations when engaged in arriving at a verdict, the trial court, among other things, said: "You are brought here to weigh the testimony. You are brought here to apply your judgments to a consideration of what the testimony established, and when you have ascertained what it does establish, if it does establish the guilt of the prisoner beyond a reasonable doubt, you will find him guilty. No question of precise value is involved here. If a man is wearing a watch chain, it is his personal property; it is in his possession. If another feloniously take it from him against his will, by violence,—by force snatches it, and runs away with it,—it is robbery. The question of precise value has nothing to do with an offense of that sort. It is not like a case of larceny. Where larceny is charged, value becomes material, but here robbery is charged." This instruction is erroneous, and demands a reversal of the judgment. Conceding defendant took Smith's watch and chain, or either the watch or chain, still, under the evidence we have set out, it is a close question whether such taking constituted robbery or grand larceny. That question was dependent upon the absence or presence of the use of force in the taking; and the use or nonuse of force by defendant was a question of fact essential for the jury to determine in fixing the crime of which the defendant should be convicted. Grabbing or snatching property from the hand has often been held to be grand larceny, and not robbery. See Routt v. State (Ark.) 34 S. W. 263, and cases there cited.

This defendant was convicted of robbery, and sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment. The maximum punishment for grand larceny is 10 years; hence the materiality of this issue as to the particular offense committed. It is settled law that robbery involves grand larceny, and that, upon an information for robbery, grand larceny may be found. Many cases of robbery may be disclosed by the evidence where the trial court would be justified in refusing an instruction to the effect that the defendant could be convicted of grand larceny. Such cases would be those where the evidence, without contradiction, indicates the offense to have been accomplished by means of force or fear; but, as already suggested, such is not this case. Again, in every trial upon a charge of robbery, where the evidence justifies it, the court should of its own motion, in the absence of request upon the part of counsel, inform the jury that larceny is included in the offense of robbery, and that their verdict may be framed upon those lines. While this court has refused to set aside verdicts by reason of the trial court's failure to so instruct, holding that the defendant has no cause of complaint where he sits idly by without request upon his part to give the instruction, still, the better practice, and the only strictly correct practice, is for the court to inform the jury of all offenses which are necessarily included in the principal offense charged.

Returning to the instruction here involved, we find its vice in the following language: "The question of precise value has nothing to do with an offense of that sort. It is not like a case of larceny. Where larceny is charged, value becomes material; but here robbery is charged." In effect, it is said: "The offense here charged is not a case of larceny, for in larceny the value of the property taken is material, and here the value of the property is not material. Hence, if a crime is proven, it is robbery." The value of the property taken, or the fact that it has a value, in no sense marks the difference between robbery and grand larceny. Force or fear is the essential element that differentiates these two crimes when the property is taken from the person, as is charged in the present instance. There is but one construction to be placed upon the language of the court, and that is, it had the effect to eliminate any question of larceny from the case. Under the evidence disclosed by the record as to the facts occurring at the immediate time of the taking, the jury should not have been deprived of the right to find the defendant guilty of grand larceny, if they so saw fit.

We deem it unnecessary to pass upon the other questions raised by the record. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

In re RUFFINO'S ESTATE. (S. F. 569.)

COMMON-LAW MARRIAGE — CONSENT — CONSUMMATION—DECLARATION—EVIDENCE—WILLS—UNDUE INFLUENCE—EVIDENCE — ILLEGAL RELATION — MISTAKE.

1. Civ. Code, § 76, providing if no record of the solemnization of a marriage heretofore contracted be known to exist, the parties may join in a declaration showing certain things, and section 77, prescribing that it must be acknowledged and recorded like a grant of land, do not make such declaration essential to the validity of a marriage without solemnization.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 55, authorizing marriage by consent, and subsequent assumption of marital rights and duties, and section 57, providing that such consent and assumption may be manifested in any form, and may be proved under the same general rules of evidence as facts in other cases, a contract of present marriage (constituting consent), followed at any time by the parties assuming the rights and duties of the marital relations, both understanding and intending thereby to consummate the marriage contract, make a valid marriage.

3. Assumption by the parties to a contract for present marriage, subsequent to the contract, of the rights and duties of the marital relation, with the intention of executing the contract, constitutes the necessary present consent.

4. Assumption of the rights and duties of the marital relation is evidence of present consent to marriage, which is supported by a previous contract of the parties for present marriage.

5. Though one influencing testator in making his will in favor of her be his mistress, this will not invalidate the will, but the question, as in other cases, is, was there undue influence, —influence destroying testator's free-will? and the illegal relation is material only as bearing on the character of the beneficiary, which may be important in determining the effect of her influence.

6. As bearing on the question of undue influence, it may be shown that a portion of the property disposed of by will had been conveyed to testator without consideration, to give him credit in business, by his sisters, to whom he left nothing by his will.

7. That testator left nothing to heirs, because of a mistaken belief that they were hostile to him, is not ground for avoiding the will, but there must have been an insane delusion.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

The will of Louis J. Ruffino was contested, and there was a judgment for contestants; and from an order denying a new trial, Kate S. Ruffino, proponent, appeals. Reversed.

Geo. C. Sargent and Sheldon G. Kellogg, for appellant. M. M. Estee, E. H. Webb, and A. G. Fiske, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. This is the contest of a will. The testator died suddenly, while traveling in the East, June 5, 1895. The proponent, with the exception of two trifling bequests, is the sole beneficiary, and appellant. She claims to have been the wife of the testator, but this is denied by the contestants, who claim that the relation between her and the testator was illicit. The contest was tried with the aid of a jury, to whom several questions were propounded, and the verdict was approved by the court, and judgment therein entered for the contestants.

The jury found as follows: "(1) Was the deceased, Louis J. Ruffino, of sound mind at the time of the execution of the alleged will, to wit, on the 5th day of June, 1895? Yes. (2) Was the said Louis J. Ruffino, when the said instrument of June 5, 1895, was signed by him and the witnesses thereof, and prior and subsequent thereto, laboring under or affected with or by any delusion or illusion as to the members of his own family, and especially as to his sisters, Francisca Ruffino and Fortuna Ruffino, or as to their affection for him or his affection for them? Yes." After finding facts showing that the will was wholly written and signed by the testator, and also its proper execution as a will duly witnessed, the verdict continues as follows: "(11) Was the said will procured to be made through undue influence exerted upon the said deceased by the proponent, or by any other person, and, if so, by whom? Yes. (12) Was the said will procured to be made through the fraud or fraudulent representations of the said proponent, or by any other person, and, if so, by whom? No. (13) Was Louis J. Ruffino married to the proponent? No. (14) Was a contract of marriage ever entered into between L. J. Ruffino and the proponent? No. (15) Did unlawful relations exist between Louis J. Ruffino and proponent prior to July, 1884? No."

In the contest it was charged: (1) At the time of the execution of the will deceased was of unsound mind. (2) Deceased had been habitually intemperate, and his reason thereby unseated. (3) The will was not properly executed. (4) The will was executed through the undue influence of proponent, and under this head is specified: (a) The proponent cohabited with the deceased for many years, but was not his wife. (b) While so living with him she poisoned his mind as to contestants, who were his sisters, by falsely asserting that they were inimical to him, and they were intent on exposing the relations between deceased and the proponent; that deceased believed these assertions, and was laboring under the delusion that they were true, but they were false. (c) Proponent took advantage of the unlawful relations and the confidence of the deceased, and caused him to make the will in question. (d) Proponent obtained such control over deceased while he was intoxicated as to unduly influence him. (e) Through such false assertions, and by reason of his weak mental condition, deceased was made to believe by proponent that the contestants were attempting to get the control of his property and injure his business, and deprive him of his property, and by reason of the misrepresentations and fraud the testator was induced to make the alleged will.

All these allegations of fraud and undue influence were denied by the proponent. The appeal is from an order denying a new trial. Many rulings of the court are objected to, and it is claimed that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the findings, which are adverse to the appellant.

The proponent testified that she was married to the testator by contract, and that the contract was in writing, and read as follows: "Dated October 5, 1883. We, the undersigned, hereby agree to be husband and wife. [Signed] Louis J. Ruffino. Kate L. Staufer." She also testified that they entered upon the marital relation in July or August, 1884. Upon this subject the court instructed the jury as follows: "Under our law marriage is a civil contract, to which there must be the consent of the parties, but consent alone will not constitute a marriage. It must be followed by a solemnization, or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations. In this case I instruct you there is no evidence tending to show a solemnization. Section 76 of the Civil Code prescribes the manner by written declaration as follows: 'If no record of the solemnization of a marriage heretofore contracted be known to exist, the parties may join in a written declaration of such marriage, substantially showing: (1) The names, ages and residences of the parties. (2) The fact of marriage. (3) That no record of such marriage is known to exist. Such declaration must be subscribed by the parties, and attested by at least two witnesses.' Also section 77 of the Civil Code prescribes that such declaration of marriage must be acknowledged and recorded in like manner as grants of real property. The above is the law of this state governing declarations of marriage. The paper testified to by proponent in this controversy is not such a declaration. [Sections 68, 69, 70, 75, and 76 were read.] The proponent bases her claim of marriage upon an alleged contract of October 5, 1883, claiming it to be a contract in præsenti. If you find that such a contract was entered into between the parties at that time, you must also find that they entered into their marital relations; otherwise no marriage takes place. You are not allowed to presume from the fact that long subsequent to said time they lived together that such cohabitation was under a new contract. Marriage is not proven by the declaration of the woman that it was agreed between her and the man that they were to live together. If the relations between the parties were in the first place illicit, the presumption is that such relations continued, unless satisfactory evidence is produced to show a change from the illicit to the licit or matrimonial relations. In this connection I instruct you that the law prescribes that no one shall derive profit by reason of any unlawful relations. The natural and ordinary influence of an unlawful relation is unlawful. You are therefore to consider all the circumstances of this case, and if from the testimony you believe that Louis J. Ruffino and proponent were not husband and wife, then their relations were unlawful, and the law presumes that if she exercised any influence over him it was an unlawful influence."

This instruction was objected to, and I think it was erroneous in several respects.

1. In the first place, section 76, Civ. Code, had no real bearing upon any issue in this case. It was not claimed that the document sworn to by proponent was intended to be the declaration provided for in section 76, and no such declaration was required. A jury could only have understood the instruction as meaning that when there is no solemnization this declaration must be made, or the marriage is void. Such is not the law, and the jury must have been misled. There was no occasion for any explanation of section 76, because compliance or noncompliance with it was wholly immaterial.

2. It was also error to tell the jury that they were not allowed to presume from the fact that long subsequent to the contract the parties cohabited as husband and wife that such cohabitation was under a new contract. There was evidence tending to prove, and the jury found, that there had been no unlawful relation between the parties prior to the alleged assumption of marital rights and duties in 1884. At that time they commenced living together as husband and wife. They always represented that they were married, and were universally so regarded by their acquaintances. Under such circumstances there is a very strong presumption of marriage. Having held themselves out as husband and wife, and having lived together as only married persons could lawfully do, this presumption, which prevails everywhere, of marriage, is especially strong here, where marriage may be constituted by consent and subsequent assumption of marital rights and duties, and where such consent and assumption may be manifested in any form, and may be proved under the same general rules of evidence as facts in other cases. Civ. Code, § 57. All intercourse in form matrimonial is presumed, until the contrary is shown, to be matrimonial.

But I think there is an implication in this instruction still more injurious to appellant. It is that the assumption of marital rights must be immediate, or, as counsel say, within a reasonable time after the contract constituting consent. There is nothing of the kind in the statute, and no authority for the proposition is cited. Of course, there must be a contract for a present marriage. That is, the parties must stipulate that they are now husband and wife, and not that they will at some future day become such. But if at any length of time thereafter they assume the rights and duties of the marital relation, both understanding and intending thereby to consummate the marriage contract, it will be a lawful marriage, under the statute. And it is not necessary to hold that consent is manifested only by the former contract. The very assumption of the relation, with the intention of executing such a contract, would of itself constitute the consent which is requisite, and the former contract would tend to characterize the act of the parties in the assumption of the relation, and complete the evidence of a present consent, which need not be in writing. Perhaps we cannot go so far under our statute as some of the Scotch authorities, which hold that cohabitation and repute themselves prove a tacit consent which constitutes a lawful marriage, for it may be that evidence would be admissible to show nevertheless that the parties did not intend marriage; that is, that there was no consent to marriage. But where both parties do intend marriage, and assume the rights and duties of the relation in the face of the world, I do not see why it is not a legal marriage. Surely, the mere assumption of the rights, duties, and obligations of the marital relation, with the intention thereby to be married, is as clear an indication of consent as there could be.

The next paragraph in the instruction, that marriage is not proven by the declaration of the woman that it was agreed between her and the man that they were to live together, was not justified by any evidence or by the contention of the proponent. The transcript does not show any such evidence, and it is a most injurious misstatement of the position of the proponent. It was a plain intimation that she had no other foundation for her claim of marriage, whereas the evidence shows without controversy that she based her claim upon a contract of marriage, followed by a mutual and public assumption of the rights, duties, and obligations of that relation.

The part of the instruction which has been most discussed by counsel is to the effect that the law prescribes that no one shall profit by an unlawful relation, and that the influence of an unlawful relation is unlawful, and, if the proponent was not married, and exercised any influence over the deceased, it was unlawful. Taken by itself, this part of the instruction is unintelligible. Taken in connection with the facts of the case, however, it could only mean one thing, to wit: If the proponent was not married to the deceased, and he was induced by the illicit relation to make his will in her favor, it was unlawful, and the will void; and, further, if she exercised any influence as to the will, such influence was unlawful, and rendered the will void. There was no issue in the case as to any unlawful influence other than undue influence. And in this instruction the phrase seems to be used as though it was something other than undue influence,—as though, like an illegal consideration, it rendered void everything that could flow from it, and without reference to the degree of it, or whether it had the effect of subjecting and controlling the will of the testator or not. And so I have no doubt the jury understood it. While I cannot doubt that the jury must have understood the instruction as above, I do not think the learned trial judge intended to so instruct the jury. The intention undoubtedly was to follow the line of decision, commencing with Dean v. Negley, 41 Pa. St. 312. That was a contest of a will, and in that case it appeared that the testator was taken from his family by an adulteress, and, when weakened by disease, was made to execute a will in favor of the adulteress. The court, after quoting a few Latin maxims, such as "Ex turpi causa non oritur actio," says they may all be summed up in one sentence: "No one shall derive any profit through the law by the influence of an unlawful act or relation." The court then proceeds to say: "The ordinary influence of a lawful relation must be lawful, even where it affects testamentary dispositions, for this is its natural tendency. The natural and ordinary influence of an unlawful relation must be unlawful, in so far as it affects testamentary dispositions favorably to the unlawful relation, and unfavorably to the lawful heirs." Here, too, the word "unlawful" is used, and naturally produces great confusion. But in this opinion the unlawful influence is plainly put upon the same plane as an unlawful consideration, from which no action can arise. Therefore such influence is unlawful, whether it has destroyed the free will of the testator or not. Under this rule there could be no valid bequest to one who has had illicit relations with the testator, if it was induced by the relation. If one had seduced a woman theretofore virtuous, he could neither provide for her nor her offspring by his will, for such bequest would be induced by the natural and ordinary influence of the relation, although not by any actual attempt to influence the testator by the beneficiary. The case of Dean v. Negley has been followed in Ohio, Iowa, and in several cases, but in each case the facts were such as would have warranted a finding of undue influence, as well as of unlawful influence, in the sense in which the phrase is used in that case; and certainly, if this unlawful influence must be such as has deprived the testator of his free will, there is no room for this strange doctrine. The question, in the absence of fraud, always is whether the proposed will is the spontaneous act of a competent testator. If not, it makes no difference what the moral qualities of the influence may be which has overcome the will of the testator. If the importunities of a wife have destroyed the free will of a testator, the will is void. If the importunities of a mistress have not overcome the will of a testator, the will is not void, though made in favor of the mistress. Influence which has prevented an unnatural, an unjust, and a vicious will, by overcoming and controlling the testator to the extent that the will is not the spontaneous act of the testator, is unlawful,—as much so as the same influence would be if exerted in the opposite direction. The question is as to the effect of the influence upon the testator's mind, not as to its moral character or its source, although in some cases the character of the person exerting the influence may be an important factor in determining its effect.

I do not see how a will can be said to be unnatural which is in favor of a person for whom a sane testator entertained a strong affection. That a will is what would be called "undutiful" is only material when the circumstances are such as to show that the testator, if uninfluenced, would most likely have made what is called a "dutiful" will. The line of authorities alluded to has not been generally followed. The cases upon the subject are collected in a note to the case In re Hess' Will (Minn.) 31 Am. St. Rep. 665 (s. c. 51 N. W. 614), and this opinion need not be extended by a citation and discussion of them. The remark in Re Flint's Estate, 100 Cal. 391, 34 Pac. 863, is obiter.

There is no evidence in the record to show of what the estate consisted, or its value, but it seems that a portion of it consisted of property which the testator's sisters, contestants here, conveyed indirectly to him, without consideration, to give him the necessary credit to enable him to carry on business. At the time the conveyance was made there was no understanding as to a reconveyance. The appellant objected to evidence of these facts as immaterial. I think, however, that the court properly admitted the evidence. If some of the property morally belonged to the contestants, and was really only loaned to their brother through their affection for him, such fact would make the will seem more unnatural, and, although it would not prove undue influence, it would be a proper circumstance to be considered in connection with other facts tending to prove such influence.

Appellant objects to the finding as to delusion, on the ground that the contest does not aver that the testator was subject to any insane delusion, and also on the ground that no insane delusion is found to have existed. I think this contention must be sustained. A mere mistake on such a subject will not invalidate a will. No will would be past attack, if it could be set aside merely upon the testimony of interested parties that the testator believed the heir hostile to him, and that such was not the case. The jury found that the testator was not insane.

There is also no evidence of an insane delusion. The allegation is that proponent persuaded testator that his sisters were hostile to him, and that they would expose their relations,—the relations existing between the proponent and the testator,—and interfere with his property, and injure his business. The evidence shows that the testator had long been very hostile to his sisters, but beyond that there is no evidence whatever that he thought his sisters hostile to him. It is not shown that proponent ever spoke an unkind word with regard to the sisters, but, to the contrary, that she always sided with the sisters in their controversy with their brother. The contestants themselves seem to have believed that the proponent and the testator were actually married. There is not a syllable of testimony tending to show that the testator thought they intended to expose the relation, or that he ever doubted that he was lawfully married to the proponent. These facts, however, would constitute fraud if they existed, and the jury found that there was no fraud. The order is reversed, and the cause remanded.

O'BRIEN v. BALLOU et al. (L. A. 188.)

SALE—GROWING CROPS—DELIVERY—JUDGMENT.

1. Growing crops, not being capable of manual delivery, are not "in the possession or under the control of the vendor," within the statute requiring an immediate delivery and continued change of possession to render a sale valid, and a sale of growing wheat is valid where the purchaser took a bill of sale, and, as soon as the grain was harvested, took possession, and marked the sacks with his initial, and continued to exercise such acts of ownership as are usual under tne circumstances.

2. Where a defendant, sued for a tort as an individual, defended in a representative capacity as assignee of an insolvent, the effect of a judgment against him in terms both as an individual and as assignee is simply to hold him liable individually.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Action in replevin by John O'Brien against S. D. Ballou, as sheriff, and J. B. Blake. Judgment against defendant Blake for the value of the property, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Wilcoxon & Bouldin, for appellant. Wm. Shipsey, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. Replevin to recover possession of 638 sacks of wheat, or their value if possession cannot be had. Plaintiff had a verdict for 571 sacks, of the value of $571, upon which judgment was entered. Defendant J. B. Blake (the action having been dismissed as to defendant Ballou) appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

It appears that during the year ending, say, with the harvest of 1894, plaintiff had labored as a ranch hand for one Bruce, who was farming about 320 acres of land sown to wheat. Some 60 to 70 acres of this land was rented from one Wyman, and the residue, which was adjoining, from one Jack. The land was not separated by fence. The crop of 1894 was a failure, and Bruce was unable to pay plaintiff his wages. Bruce then proposed to plaintiff that if he would continue to labor for another year, he (Bruce) would convey to him sufficient of the crop to pay his wages. Plaintiff accepted the proposition. The land was all cultivated to wheat. Jack had a crop mortgage on the wheat growing upon his own land. On June 21, 1895, Bruce, being indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $574.75, made to the latter a bill of sale of the 60 acres, more or less, of wheat growing on the Wyman tract, in payment of the sum due him. Bruce also, in view of the fact that it was doubtful if the grain would pay plaintiff in full, agreed verbally to furnish sacks for the grain, and to pay the harvesters; plaintiff to pay all incidental expenses. The wheat was harvested, kept separate from that on the Jack ranch, and placed in a pile, where it was marked by plaintiff with his initial. He paid for gathering it, and the board, etc., of the harvesters. While in this condition, and some two weeks after it was harvested, the wheat was attached by defendant S. D. Ballou, as sheriff, under a writ of attachment against Bruce. Bruce thereafter went into voluntary insolvency. Defendant Blake was appointed assignee in insolvency, and the wheat was turned over to him by the sheriff.

1. The appellant contends in favor of reversal that the transfer of the crop from Bruce to plaintiff was void under the statute of frauds. Growing crops are chattels not susceptible of manual delivery until harvested, and are not "in the possession or under the control of the vendor," within the meaning of the statute requiring an immediate delivery and continued change of possession. Davis v. McFarlane, 37 Cal. 634. When the crop was harvested, it was the duty of plaintiff to take immediate possession of the grain, and to retain such possession. The evidence on the part of plaintiff tended to show that Bruce did not live upon the land where the wheat was grown, but resided some six miles distant, was never at the situs of the wheat but once after the sale, and exercised no control or dominion over it as owner. Plaintiff, after gathering and marking the wheat, camped close to, but not on, the Wyman land, at a point where he could get water, until the wheat was attached. He also hauled away and sold for seed some 70 sacks. This was after the levy of the attachment, but before it was served upon him. The sale passed the title to plaintiff without a delivery of possession. When it was harvested, plaintiff exercised such dominion over it as is usual in such cases. The ground upon which it was grown was, so far as appears, vacant and unoccupied. The brand upon the sacks was sufficient to notify the public of plaintiff's ownership. We attach little importance to the fact that plaintiff was working for Bruce. Bernal v. Hovious, 17 Cal. 542; Visher v. Webster, 13 Cal. 58. The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict, and on the showing of plaintiff the contract was not void under the statute of frauds.

2. Appellants urge that the written transfer from Bruce to the plaintiff was a mortgage of a growing crop, and not a sale. This contention has no support in the record, and we need not discuss it.

3. It is further urged that the court erred in instructing the jury, and in its refusal to instruct as requested by defendant. The court, upon its own motion, instructed the jury, and, after stating the nature of the action, proceeded as follows: (1) "Plaintiff claims to have purchased it [the wheat] when it was a growing crop, and, after it was harvested, to have reduced it to his possession. If you find that he did so in good faith, and was in possession thereof when it was levied upon, your verdict should be for plaintiff; that he is the owner of the property, and entitled to the possession thereof, and the value thereof is $571." (2) "If you find from the evidence that A. L. Bruce sold a crop of growing wheat to the plaintiff, from which came the wheat in controversy; that after said wheat was harvested said Bruce continued to exercise acts of ownership over the wheat, continued to control and manage the same, and retain possession thereof,—your verdict should be for the defendant." The only objection urged to these instructions is that the first of them ignored the continuous character of the possession necessary to satisfy the law. There was nothing in the evidence to give point to this objection. The only question was whether plaintiff took such possession as the law required. But, conceding appellant's objection under such circumstances to be good, the court did instruct the jury in the second instruction that if the vendor, after the wheat was harvested, continued to exercise acts of ownership over it, or controlled or managed it, and retained possession thereof, they should find for defendant. This was sufficient to indicate to the jury, and did indicate to them more clearly than the language of the statute would have done, the necessity of an exclusive and continuous possession in plaintiff. The defendant's third instruction, marked in the record as fifth, which was given, also covered this point, in which the jury was instructed that it was the duty of the plaintiff "to take immediate possession of the grain [when it was harvested], and retain such possession."

The following instructions asked by defendant were properly refused: "That the burden of proving that there was a change of possession from Bruce to plaintiff, and that plaintiff thereafter continued in the possession of the property sold until the same was attached, is on the plaintiff, and the plaintiff must show by a preponderance of the evidence that at the date of the sale he took immediate possession and control, and retained the same until the property was levied upon by the sheriff." The last clause of this instruction was objectionable, in that the property, being a growing crop, was not susceptible of an immediate possession in the sense of the term as applied to personal property capable of manual delivery; and to have given it would have tended to mislead the jury. The other instruction was as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that A. L. Bruce, after said sale to plaintiff, continued to exercise acts of ownership over said crop, continued to control and manage the same, and assumed the ownership thereof, employed the men to harvest the same, took charge and superintendence of and contracted for the labor performed on said crop, your verdict must be for the defendant." This instruction embodied the same principle, and was largely in the same language, as that given by the court, and hereinbefore set out, marked 2. It was not necessary to repeat the instruction. We need not set out the instructions given at the request of defendant. They presented clearly the law applicable to the case from the standpoint of defendant's evidence. The verdict was not against law by reason of being in disregard of the instructions of the court.

It is further urged that the judgment is erroneous in that it runs against the defendant individually and as assignee. The complaint counts against Blake as an individual. In his answer he justifies taking and holding the wheat as the assignee in insolvency of Bruce, an insolvent. The judgment, after reciting that "said Blake took, holds, and claims said property in his capacity of assignee of the estate of A. L. Bruce, an insolvent debtor," proceeds to award judgment against "J. B. Blake both in his individual and representative capacity aforesaid." It will be observed that the judgment is not against the estate which the defendant represents as assignee, but is simply against him as an assignee. Having defended in that right, and in no other, and the verdict being against him, he is not in a position to complain that the court has, by its judgment, determined the very issues he tendered for adjudication, and has concluded him thereby. There can be but one satisfaction of the judgment; and such satisfaction, being of a judgment against him as assignee, will be some evidence upon which to predicate a claim for reimbursement from the estate of his insolvent. Section 580 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies to the extent of the relief to be granted. Here the question relates, not to the extent of the relief, but to the character in which the defendant is liable. He could not, by a tortious act, be absolved from his individual responsibility, and, where he voluntarily justifies in a particular capacity, his rights in that capacity should be determined by the judgment. The judgment here does nothing beyond that. We recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

McFARLAND, J. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

TEMPLE, J. I concur, but I do not think it can properly be said that the judgment is against the defendant as assignee. Defendant could not commit the trespass as assignee, and the recital in the judgment as to his character is simply surplusage. He is properly held personally liable, and it is not of consequence in this case whether he can be reimbursed from the insolvent's estate or not.

PEOPLE v. COYNE. (Cr. 221.) [1]

Jurors—Custody—Ownership—Evidence.

1. The fact that during adjournment, but before introduction of evidence, the jurors were not in custody of an officer, and had not been admonished by the court, as required by Pen. Code, § 1122, was not ground for reversal.

2. An information charging the building injured by the malicious use of explosives to be the property of prosecutor was sustained by evidence that he paid the taxes and resided on the premises with his wife, though the title stood in her name.

Henshaw, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Harry L. Coyne was convicted of felony as defined by Pen. Code, § 601, declaring that "every person who maliciously, by the explosion of gunpowder or other explosive substance, destroys, throws down, or injures the whole or any part of any building, by means of which the life or safety of a human being is endangered, is guilty of a felony"; and from the judgment and an order denying a new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

[1] Rehearing denied. Beatty, C. J., dissents.

Byron L. Oliver, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and Chas. H. Jackson, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. Defendant was convicted of a felony, and prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial.

1. The jury were selected to try the defendant at the morning session of court, and an adjournment was then taken until 2 o'clock p. m. of the same day, at which time the introduction of evidence was begun. During the time of adjournment the jurors were not in the custody of an officer; neither had they been admonished by the court upon their duty, as demanded by section 1122 of the Penal Code. Complaint is now made that the course practiced at the trial constituted substantial and material error. The fact that the jurors separated during this period of time furnishes no ground for complaint, for section 1121 of the Penal Code leaves that matter to the discretion of the court. But a failure of the court to admonish the jurors as to their duty during the hours of separation is certainly an objectionable practice, and not countenanced by the statute. It seems that such omission upon the part of the court occurred but once during the progress of the trial, and at such time the introduction of evidence had not commenced. In the trial of criminal cases the court cannot be too careful in planting itself firmly upon the statute, and a strict compliance with its provisions is always time and labor well spent. But the error in this regard is technical, and not of that importance to demand a reversal of the judgment and a new trial.

2. The information charges the building injured to be the property of T. D. Stimpson. Upon the trial it was developed that the legal title to the property stood in the name of Mrs. T. D. Stimpson (the wife). It appeared that T. D. Stimpson paid the taxes upon the property, and was residing with his wife and other members of the family in the building at the time the offense is charged to have been committed. Under such circumstances, his possession of the premises was entirely sufficient to support the allegation of the information as to ownership. There is no merit in the remaining assignment of errors. For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are affirmed.

In re BULLARD'S ESTATE. (S. F. 564.)

LIMITATIONS — CLAIM MATURING AFTER DEATH OF OBLIGOR—ADMINISTRATION.

Limitation does not begin to run against an action on a claim against a decedent who died before its maturity, when no administration exists on his estate at the time the cause of action accrues. Code Civ. Proc. § 353, providing for an extension of the time for bringing an action for one year after the issuance of letters testamentary or of administration, applies only when the statute has commenced to run before the death of the debtor.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

George D. Collins, for appellant. H. H. McPike, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The decedent in his lifetime executed his promissory note to the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, payable February 10, 1887, together with a mortgage upon certain real estate to secure its payment. Prior to the maturity of the note, viz. April 6, 1886, he died, and a document purporting to be his last will and testament, which was presented for probate in April, 1886, was finally rejected January 9, 1893. Letters of administration were issued upon his estate August 15, 1894, and notice to creditors to present their claims to the administrator for allowance was first published March 9, 1895. The Hibernia Savings & Loan Society presented its claim upon the aforesaid note and mortgage to the administrator for allowance March 28, 1895, and it was allowed by him and approved by the judge of the court, and filed as an approved claim August 7, 1895. November 25, 1895, the administrator rendered the account of his administration for settlement, and included therein the said claim of the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society. At the hearing of the settlement the appellant, one of the heirs of the decedent, contested the allowance of the claim upon the ground that at time of its presentation and allowance it was barred by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state. The court overruled his objections, and made an order settling and allowing the account as rendered, to which the contestant excepted. The present appeal is from this order. Section 353, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "If a person against whom an action may be brought die before the expiration of the time limited for the commencement thereof, and the cause of action survive, an action may be commenced against his representatives after the expiration of that time, and within one year after the issuance of letters testamentary or of administration." This provision is identical with that contained in section 24 of the limitation act of 1850 (St. 1850, p. 346), which was construed in Smith v. Hall, 19 Cal. 85. In that case Cook made his promissory note, and died before its maturity. Letters of administration were not issued upon his estate until more than four years had elapsed after the maturity of the note, and subsequently a claim thereon was presented to the administrator and rejected. In a suit brought thereafter to establish the claim, the district court held that it was barred by the statute of limitations; but upon appeal that judgment was reversed, the court saying: "The general rule is that the statute of limitations does not begin to run when no administration exists on the decedent's estate at the time the cause of action accrued. Danglada v. De la Guerra, 10 Cal. 386. And as the general act prescribes four years as the period of limitation on promissory notes, it cannot be held by force of this statute that this claim is barred. * * * We do not understand the twenty-fourth article (section 24) of the act of limitations as conflicting with the view we have taken. That section only applies to cases where the statute has commenced to run. This construction is evident as well from reason as from the language of the section. The words are that the plaintiff may bring his suit in the case mentioned 'after the expiration of the period of limitation,' and the additional year, etc. The object was not to curtail, but to prolong, the period for suing in the given category." The above section of the Code must receive the same construction. See, also, Wood, Lim. § 6. The order is affirmed.

I concur: VAN FLEET, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment, and place my concurrence upon the proposition decided in Smith v. Hall, 19 Cal. 85, that "the statute of limitations does not begin to run when no administration exists on the decedent's estate at the time the cause of action accrued." In making that decision the court cited Danglada v. De la Guerra, 10 Cal. 386, to sustain the proposition. That case, however, does not sustain it, and I know of no express provision of law that does. But section 1500 of the Code of Civil Procedure forbids the commencement of any action upon a claim against a decedent unless the claim is first presented to an executor or administrator, etc., and it seems to have always been considered absurd to hold that the statute would run against a cause of action which could not possibly be put in suit. Upon this ground apparently, and by mere judicial legislation, the rule above quoted has been established, and it is now too late to set it aside by a contrary decision, if a contrary decision could be justified. I have examined the cases cited by appellant, but they do not appear to support his contention. Society v. Herbert, 53 Cal. 375, is not at all in point. Tynan v. Walker, 35 Cal. 643, was the converse of this case, in which it was held that the representatives of an intestate could not keep alive a right of action indefinitely by neglecting to take out administration. The reasoning of Judge Sanderson (pages 643, 644), does seem to support the contention of the appellant, but the case was different and the point decided was different. The reason for the exception ingrafted upon the statute in Smith v. Hall does not exist when the right of action is one in favor of the decedent. In Society v. Conlin (Cal.) 7 Pac. 477, the suit was to foreclose a mortgage of the decedent given to secure another's debt. There was no personal liability of the decedent, no right in any event to a deficiency judgment, and no necessity to present the claim before action. Here a presentation was necessary in view of the personal liability of the decedent and the right of plaintiff to a deficiency judgment.

RICHARDS et al. v. DALEY et ux. (L. A. 100.)

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

Where a mortgage provides that on default in interest the whole sum shall become due, and the mortgage may be foreclosed, limitations begin to run only when the note matures according to its terms, and not on default in interest.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by Charles B. Richards and others against Thomas J. Daley and wife to foreclose a mortgage. From a decree for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Rippey & Nutt, for appellants. J. W. Hughes, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage executed by the defendants, Thomas J. Daley and Sarah M. Daley, his wife, on March 3, 1890, to secure payment of two promissory notes of the same date. The notes were signed by both defendants, and each was for the sum of $6,500, payable two years after date, with interest thereon at the rate of 13 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly, and if not so paid then to become a part of the principal, and bear a like rate of interest till paid. The mortgage provided "that if default be made in the payment of the interest, or any part thereof, according to the tenor of said note, then the whole sum of principal and interest shall become immediately due, and the mortgagees may proceed with suit of foreclosure." Interest for the first quarter became due June 3, 1890, but no payment was made until December 11, 1890, when there was paid upon each note, "on account of interest," $422.50. Thereafter payments on account of interest were made, from time to time, on both notes, the last being under date of March 18, 1895. The aggregate of the payments on one of the notes was $1,993.50, and on the other $2,314.50. The complaint was filed March 20, 1895, and the defendants by their answer set up the provision of the mortgage above quoted, and alleged that the mortgagees did not on the 3d day of June, 1890, or at any time, add the interest which fell due on said day to the principal of the notes, and did not at the end of the respective quarter years after the making of the notes, or at any time, add the interest which then fell due and was unpaid, to the principal of the notes, and by the terms of the notes and mortgage the whole principal sums and the interest accrued thereon became due and payable on the 3d day of June, 1890, and that by reason of the premises the action was barred by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court below found, among other things, that the action was not barred, and entered its decree foreclosing the mortgage as prayed for. From this decree, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, the defendants appeal. The case, it will be observed, is in no material respect different from that of Mason v. Luce (just decided) 48 Pac. 72. We find no errors of law in the rulings of the court, and, upon the authority of the case cited, the decree and order appealed from must be affirmed. So ordered.

AYERS v. GREEN GOLD MIN. CO. et al.

(Sac. 180.)

CORPORATIONS — CONTRACTS BY OFFICERS — CONSTRUCTIVE KNOWLEDGE.

The doctrine that the knowledge of a corporate officer is imputable to the corporation does not apply to work performed on the corporate property under a contract with a director in his individual capacity, and with the understanding that he shall be personally liable.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by C. W. Ayers against the Green Gold Mining Company and others to establish a lien for work done on the property of defendant corporation. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. W. Street, for appellant. F. P. Otis and Minor & Ashley, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. This is an action brought by plaintiff to charge the property of the corporation defendant with a lien for certain work done by appellant in cleaning out a tunnel on the mining property of respondent. The action was brought against M. E. Crittenden, E. C. Lyles, and respondent, it being alleged that the labor was performed at the special instance and request of defendants Lyles and Crittenden, and that the latter was at the time in charge of said mine, and acting as the agent of the defendant mining company. The court found that the work was performed for and at the special instance and request of defendants Lyles and Crittenden, but under a written contract set out in the findings; that, although defendant Crittenden was at the time a director of the corporation defendant, said contract was made with said Lyles and Crittenden "personally in their individual capacities, and not as agent or agents of defendant corporation, with the understanding and intent that the said defendants M. E. Crittenden and Dr. E. C. Lyles should be bound personally thereby, and not this defendant corporation, for all work that plaintiff might do or cause to be done on said mining property"; that neither of the two defendants entering into said contract at the time of the making thereof was in charge of said mining property, or the agent of the defendant corporation in the premises, or authorized "to employ plaintiff for any purpose whatever." It is further found that the defendant mining company "had no notice or knowledge whatever that plaintiff was performing any work whatever upon the mining property" sought to be charged with the lien. Upon these findings judgment was given in favor of the corporation defendant denying the lien, and the only material question in the case is as to whether the evidence supports the findings.

It would subserve no useful purpose to state the evidence at length, or even in substance. It is sufficient to say that upon a careful review we find in the record evidence substantially tending to support each of the findings in question, and this, under firmly established principles, concludes our further inquiry.

It is urged, however, in effect, that the mining company had constructive, if not actual, notice of the doing of the work; that the directors and officers of a corporation are its agents, through whom alone it can act, and that, the defendant Crittenden being a director at the time the work was done, her knowledge of the work is imputable to the corporation; that, having such knowledge, it was incumbent upon the latter, in order to avoid liability, to post a notice on its mine, as required by section 1192, Code Civ. Proc., that it would not be responsible for the work, which notice was never given. It may be true that the corporation would be chargeable with the knowledge of Mrs. Crittenden had she been either actually or ostensibly representing or acting for it in the transaction, but both the evidence and the findings show that she was not. It appears from the evidence that at the time of the making of the contract for the work Mrs.

Crittenden expressly stated to plaintiff that she was acting solely on her individual responsibility, and not for the corporation in any way; that the latter had no means, and would do nothing; and that whatever work was done she would have to pay for out of her own private means. In fact, the evidence shows throughout that the transaction was carried on by plaintiff with a perfect knowledge that he was dealing with Mrs. Crittenden as an individual, and wholly apart from any official relation she bore to the defendant mining company, and that he looked to her personally and alone for the payment of her share of the contract price of the work. Under such circumstances, the doctrine of constructive or implied notice on the part of the corporation of what was being done cannot obtain. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; HARRISON, J.

LEEDOM v. HAM et al. (L. A. 134.)

PARTNERSHIP—RIGHTS OF INDIVIDUAL PARTNER—ESTOPPEL.

1. Plaintiff, having leased a farm, and taken S. as a partner, agreed that the lessor might sell enough of the future crop to pay the rent; whereupon the latter bargained 19 tons to third persons, but nothing was paid, nor any delivery made to them or to the lessor. Subsequently the whole crop, amounting to less than 19 tons, and which constituted the entire partnership assets, was attached as the property of S., and purchased at execution sale by the attaching creditor. Held, that under Civ. Code, § 2405, giving each partner a lien on the assets for the payment of firm debts, and for any general balance due him, plaintiff was entitled to recover his share from the creditor.

2. Plaintiff was not estopped, though he had, through mistake of law, notified the officer at the time of the attachment that he owned one-half the crop, "less 19 tons belonging to" the lessor.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; George E. Otis, Judge.

Action by W. T. Leedom against A. M. Ham, H. H. Ham, and Smith Leedom for an accounting of a partnership between plaintiff and the last-named defendant, and to recover the value of property converted by the other defendants. Defendant Leedom defaulted, and from a judgment for defendants Ham, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

E. R. Annable and Geo. B. Cole, for appellant. T. C. Chapman and Rolfe & Rolfe, for respondents.

BRITT, C. Plaintiff leased of one Gregory 95 acres of land, and also purchased of Gregory barley to seed the same for a crop of grain hay; the lessor extending credit for both rent and seed upon an understanding that he should be paid therefor from the first proceeds of sale of the crop. Plaintiff then took one Smith Leedom as a partner in the business of raising the crop, they agreeing to share equally the net avails, Gregory to be first paid. The crop was grown by them pursuant to such arrangement, and constituted the only partnership assets. Its value was less, it seems, than the partnership liabilities. While the harvesting thereof was in progress, plaintiff agreed with Gregory that the latter might sell enough of the hay to pay the sums due him for rent and seed, and that plaintiff would deliver to the purchasers the quantity thus sold. Accordingly Gregory bargained 19 tons of the hay to certain persons at an agreed price, but nothing was paid, nor was any hay delivered either to Gregory or such purchasers. A few days later the whole crop was attached as the property of said Smith Leedom in a suit brought against him by A. M. Ham and H. H. Ham. They subsequently caused it to be sold under execution in that suit, and became the purchasers thereof, and converted it to their own use. Plaintiff prosecutes this action against A. M. and H. H. Ham and Smith Leedom for an accounting of the affairs of his partnership with said Smith (who is insolvent) and judgment against the Hams for the value of the crop. When said attachment was levied, plaintiff served on the attaching officer written notice stating himself to be the owner of an undivided one-half of the crop, "less nineteen tons thereof, due and belonging to A. Gregory." At the same time Gregory served similar notice, claiming 19 tons on the ground that such quantity was sold to him before the attachment. Defendants produced evidence at the trial that the whole crop was only 14½ tons. The court found that plaintiff had no right or interest in the hay, or any part thereof, and rendered judgment for costs in favor of defendants Ham. Smith Leedom had made default.

The plaintiff seems to have modeled his procedure upon the law as declared in Wright v. Ward, 65 Cal. 525, 4 Pac. 534, and on the facts in evidence he was entitled to prevail. By their purchase at the execution sale the brothers Ham took the interest of Smith Leedom in the property, subject to the right of plaintiff to have the same applied so far as necessary in discharge of the partnership debts, and of any balance due to him as ascertained by an accounting. Civ. Code, § 2405; Freem. Ex'ns, § 254a. Respondents seek to uphold the finding of the court on the ground that by the notice served on the attaching officer plaintiff stated the ownership of the hay to be in a third person, and claim that such a conflict in the evidence was thus created as to render the finding conclusive on appeal. But the evidence made it clear that plaintiff, as terre-tenant under Gregory, had title to the crop, modified only by the partnership interest of Smith Leedom. Under authority from plaintiff, Gregory had bargained the hay to prospective purchasers, but there was no delivery, nor agreement for a present transfer, and hence no completed sale. Civ. Code, § 1140. Therefore the declaration in the notice that Gregory owned 19 tons of the hay was but a mistaken statement of opinion on the legal effect of prior transactions, and could not operate to divest title in the crop. Keane v. Cannovan, 21 Cal. 291, 301.

It is claimed, also, that such notice had the effect to estop plaintiff from subsequently asserting right to the hay. It is sufficient to say on this point that, since the notice stated that 19 tons of the hay belonged to Gregory and one-half the overplus to plaintiff, it is impossible that the brothers Ham could have acted in good faith on the belief of the truth of this statement (Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3), while causing the hay to be sold and purchasing the same as the property of Smith Leedom. The judgment and order denying a new trial should be reversed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

VAN VLECK v. BOARD OF DENTAL EXAMINERS OF CALIFORNIA et al.

MANDAMUS—TO STATE BOARD OF DENTAL EXAMINERS—WHEN WILL LIE—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

1. Act March 12, 1885 (St. 1885, p. 110), relating to the practice of dentistry, creates a board of examiners, and provides (section 5) that, if the examination "prove satisfactory," the board shall issue to qualified persons certificates, and shall indorse as satisfactory diplomas from any "reputable" dental college, "when satisfied of the character of such institution," on the holder furnishing "evidence satisfactory to the board" of his or her right to the same. Held, that the duties of such board are judicial, and its action in finding an examination unsatisfactory, or refusing to indorse "as satisfactory" a diploma from a dental college, is final.

2. A petition for a writ of mandate to the state board of dental examiners alleged that petitioner presented to the board a diploma issued to him by a certain dental college; that such college then, and when the diploma was issued, "was a reputable college, and there existed sufficient evidence of such fact"; that he furnished "evidence satisfactory" that he was the person named in the diploma, and that it was issued to him; that the board refused to indorse it; and that at the time the board "were satisfied" that such college was a reputable college. Held, that such allegations were not the legal equivalent of allegations that the board found that petitioner furnished evidence satisfactory to the board that he was the person named in the diploma, and that the board was satisfied of the character of the institution issuing it.

Garoutte, J., dissenting.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Towner, Judge.

Petition by John D. Van Vleck for a peremptory writ of mandate to the board of dental examiners of the state of California, and the individuals composing such board, to compel the issuance to petitioner of a certificate entitling him to practice dentistry. From a judgment granting the writ, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and W. H. Anderson, Dep. Atty. Gen., and J. W. Ballard, for appellants. Knight & Harpham, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. This is a proceeding in mandate, commenced in the superior court, against the board of dental examiners of the state, and the individuals composing said board, to compel the issuance to petitioner of a certificate entitling him to practice dentistry, under the act of the legislature entitled "An act to insure the better education of practitioners of dental surgery, and to regulate the practice of dentistry in the state of California," approved March 12, 1885. St. 1885, p. 110. The court below gave judgment granting a peremptory writ, and defendants appeal therefrom, and from an order denying them a new trial.

Defendants demurred to the complaint or petition, upon the ground, among others, that it did not state facts entitling petitioner to the relief sought. The demurrer was overruled, and this ruling presents the only question which need be considered, since we are of opinion the demurrer should have been sustained. The petition, omitting the formal parts and much immaterial and redundant matter, is, in substance, that petitioner is the holder of a diploma of graduation regularly issued to him on April 2, 1894, by the American College of Dental Surgery of Chicago, Ill., after a course of study therein and an examination for graduation as prescribed by the regulations thereof; that, desiring to practice his profession in this state, petitioner, on the 10th day of May, 1894, in pursuance of said act, presented to defendants his said diploma, and demanded that they indorse the same, and issue to him a certificate to that effect; that when said diploma was issued, and at the time of the application to defendants, said American College of Dental Surgery "was a reputable college, and there existed and was at the command of defendants sufficient evidence of such fact"; that with his application petitioner furnished "evidence satisfactory to the defendants that he was the person named in said diploma, and that the same had been issued to him as stated in said diploma"; that defendants, "without any lawful right or excuse therefor, refused to indorse plaintiff's said diploma, or to issue to him the certificate provided for in said act." The act referred to, which underlies the proceeding, makes it unlawful for any person who is not at the time of the passage of the act engaged in the practice of dentistry to engage therein, unless he shall have obtained a certificate as thereinafter provided. It authorizes the appointment of a board of examiners, to consist of seven practicing dentists, "whose duty it shall be to carry out the purposes and enforce the provisions of this act." After providing for the constitution and organization of the board, and for the registration of all those practicing dentistry in the state at the date of its passage, it provides: "Sec. 5. Any and all persons who shall so desire may appear before said board at any of its regular meetings, and be examined with reference to their knowledge and skill in dental surgery, and, if the examination of any such person or persons shall prove satisfactory to said board, the board of examiners shall issue to such persons as they shall find to possess the requisite qualifications a certificate to that effect, in accordance with the provisions of this act. Said board shall also endorse as satisfactory diplomas from any reputable dental college, when satisfied of the character of such institution, upon the holder furnishing evidence satisfactory to the board of his or her right to the same, and shall issue certificates to that effect within ten days thereafter. All certificates issued by said board shall be signed by its officers, and such certificates shall be prima facie evidence of the right of the holder to practice dentistry in the state of California." The further provisions of the act are not involved.

The contention of the attorney general, for appellants, is that the functions of the defendant board under the statute are judicial or quasi judicial, in that they involve the exercise of discretionary power,—the determination of facts from evidence; that the determination of such facts is exclusively and finally vested in said board; and that, therefore, while mandate will lie to require it to act, should it refuse, it will not require it to proceed to a particular conclusion; nor where it appears, as the complaint alleges, that it has acted and reached one result, can it be coerced by this writ to act differently. The correctness of these principles, if such be the proper interpretation of the powers vested in the board, is conceded by respondent, but respondent contends that the act will not bear such construction. His contention, in effect, is that the power vested in the board is largely ministerial, or clerical merely; that, while the board has certain discretionary power to pass upon the facts upon which its action is to be based, its determination of those facts is not final; that if the evidence presented to it is such that, in the judgment of the court, the board should have found in favor of the existence of the facts authorizing it to indorse the certificate, it can be required to so find, and make such indorsement. We are unable to coincide with respondent's construction of the act. The whole theory upon which it proceeds, and the manifest purpose intended to be accomplished thereby, are against such construction. It is very evident, as indicated not only by the title, but in the body, of the act, that the inducing consideration moving the legislature to its adoption was the protection of the public against the ills suffered at the hands of incompetent quacks, empirics, and other unqualified practitioners in this most important and essential branch of modern surgery and medical science. Until within a comparatively recent period, the practice of dentistry consisted of treatment largely, if not exclusively, of a mere mechanical nature, such as drawing, filling, and cleaning the teeth; and practitioners of the art were neither required nor expected to know anything of the pathological features or surgical necessities of those diseases which rendered their artisanship a necessity to man's relief and comfort. Indeed, the local dentist was frequently the village barber or leech, the watchmaker, or even the blacksmith,—any artisan possessed of a convenient, if not suitable, instrument, and the necessary strength to pull a tooth. In more recent years, however, the necessity for a higher and special education in the art and science of treating the teeth has become widely and generally recognized, and has given rise to a distinct, honorable, and numerous profession. Departments for the teaching of dental science and surgery have been added to the regularly established schools of medicine and surgery, while numerous special colleges of dentistry have sprung up. Many of the latter, unfortunately, as with similar institutions in other branches of learning, are more of a pretense than a fact; mere pseudo establishments, with an outward semblance of educational facilities and forms, but in reality but dishonest shams, gotten up to make money, by dispensing, for coin and without requirements of learning, pretended certificates and diplomas of graduation, which give the holder an apparent standing and character in his profession, to which he is not of right entitled. The evil resulting from this abuse has become so pronounced as to have received very general recognition, and there are now to be found in most of the states statutes intended for its correction. The statute under consideration is one of these. As expressed in its title, its purpose is "to insure the better education of practitioners of dental surgery; and to regulate the practice of dentistry." It provides a board composed of expert practitioners, with power to examine and license those who have not graduated elsewhere, and to investigate and pass upon the reputability of schools and colleges issuing certificates or diplomas, and the right of the holders of such diplomas to their possession. The powers thus conferred are broad and comprehensive, and in some respects, at least, must in their nature be final. The judgment of the board, for instance, as to the qualification of an applicant for license by examination, which is largely, if not wholly, discretionary, must of necessity be conclusive. Keller v. Hewitt, 109 Cal. 146, 41 Pac. 871. No one would question this. Is the power to pass upon the reputability of a college, or the right of a holder of a diploma, intended to be less discretionary or final? There is nothing in the language of the act in conferring the power to indicate it. The requirement is to "indorse, as satisfactory, diplomas from any reputable dental college, when satisfied of the character of such institution, upon the holder furnishing evidence satisfactory to the board of his or her right to the same." This implies quite as necessarily the exercise of judgment and discretion as in the examination of an applicant as to his fitness. It does not direct the board to act upon the presentation of certain specified evidence prescribed by the statute, but it requires the finding of the facts upon which their action is to be based from evidence which is to be "satisfactory to the board." If the statute required that the applicant make a prescribed showing in a particular manner, and that thereupon the board should indorse his certificate, it might with some reason be said that the act was more ministerial than judicial, and that, upon the prescribed showing being made, the board could not refuse to act. Such a case would be within the doctrine of Wood v. Strother, 76 Cal. 545, 18 Pac. 766, and Stockton & V. R. Co. v. City of Stockton, 51 Cal. 328, relied on by respondent, where the action of the tribunal depended upon a certain event, and, that event being shown to have in fact occurred, the adverse determination of the tribunal whose duty it was to act was held not so far discretionary as to conclude the question; the true test, as held in Wood v. Strother, being whether the determination of the tribunal "is intended by law to be final."

But here the question whether those facts which are to move the action of the board have been shown does not depend upon some specified piece of evidence fixed by the statute, but upon such facts as will satisfy the board. The whole question, in other words, as to the facts, is committed to its discretionary judgment; and that its determination in such a case is conclusive, and not subject to the mandatory control of the courts, there can be no doubt. In People v. State Board of Dental Examiners, 110 Ill. 180, where the statute made it the duty of the board to issue a license to a "regular graduate of any reputable dental college" having a full course of lectures and instruction in dental surgery, mandamus was sought to compel the issuance of a certificate to one who alleged that he held a diploma from a "reputable dental college," and that there was annually delivered at said college "a full course of lectures." In sustaining a demurrer to the petition, it is said: "Whether a college be reputable or not is not a legal question, but a question of fact. So, also, are the requirements in regard to the annual delivery of a full course of lectures and instruction. These questions of fact are by the act submitted to the decision of the board, not in so many words, but by the plainest and most necessary implication. Their action is to be predicated upon the existence of the requisite facts, and no other tribunal is authorized to investigate them, and, of necessity, therefore they must do so. The act of ascertaining and determining what are the facts is in its nature judicial. It involves investigation, judgment, and discretion." And it was held that mandamus would not lie to control the discretion thus vested, and that no ground of relief was stated. Under a statute of Missouri providing for the issuance by the state board of health of a certificate to practice medicine to "all who shall furnish satisfactory proof of having received diplomas or licenses from legally chartered medical institutions in good standing," if the diploma be found to be genuine, and the person named therein be the one presenting it, etc., it was held that the board was vested with discretionary powers involving matters of judgment which could not be controlled by mandate; and that a petition alleging a state of facts which under the act should apparently entitle him to a certificate, but which showed that the application had been acted on by the board and denied, did not state a case for relief. State v. Gregory, 83 Mo. 123. To the same effect are Williams v. Dental Examiners, 93 Tenn. 619, 27 S. W. 1019, and State v. State Medical Examining Board, 32 Minn. 324, 20 N. W. 238. See, also, Berryman v. Perkins, 55 Cal. 483; Jacobs v. Board, 100 Cal. 121, 34 Pac. 630; Fairchild v. Wall, 93 Cal. 401, 29 Pac. 60.

The facts alleged do not bring the case within the doctrine of Keller v. Hewitt, supra, relied on by petitioner. In that case the board of education had examined Keller for a teacher's certificate, and, as alleged in the petition, had found that he was in all respects qualified, and in every way fit and competent, to receive a certificate; but the board had, nevertheless, determined not to issue it. We held that, upon these facts, the writ would lie to compel the issuance of the certificate; that notwithstanding the board's discretionary power in determining the question of fitness, "where, under the law and their rules, the question of an applicant's fitness to receive a certificate has been determined in his favor, the limit of the board's discretionary functions in the premises has been reached, and a plain legal duty results." In the present case the tribunal has acted, and has determined against the petitioner. The allegations that the American College of Dental Surgery "was a reputable college, and there existed and was at the command of defendants sufficient evidence of such fact," and that petitioner furnished "evidence satisfactory to defendants that he was the person named in said diploma," are not the legal equivalent of an allegation that the defendant board have so found. In the language of the court in People v. State Board of Dental Examiners, supra, on this precise point: "The demurrer here does not admit that the board of dental examiners found that the college at which the relator was graduated was reputable, although it does admit that to be the fact. But, since the board cannot be compelled to decide the question that way, although the evidence might clearly sustain it in so doing, there is no ground for mandamus." It follows that the petition states no cause of action, and the judgment and order must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to sustain the demurrer. It is so ordered.

I concur: HARRISON, J.

GAROUTTE, J. (concurring). I entirely agree with Mr. Justice VAN FLEET as to the true construction of the legislative act here involved, but am compelled to dissent from the conclusion arrived at, to the effect that the petition does not state sufficient facts to entitle petitioner to the relief sought. At one stage of the proceedings the board of dental examiners has a pure ministerial duty to perform, viz. to indorse the applicant's diploma as satisfactory; and that stage of the proceedings is reached when the board is satisfied that the character of the institution issuing the diploma is that of a reputable dental college, taken in connection with the further condition that the holder of the diploma has also furnished "evidence satisfactory to the board of his or her right to the same." If the holder of the diploma complies with these two demands of the statute, then I say there is nothing remaining for the board of examiners to do but to indorse the diploma as satisfactory,—an act in no sense judicial, and one to compel the performance of which a mandate will issue. Eliminating from the allegations of the petition all immaterial matters, it still fairly shows a compliance with the two foregoing demands of the statute. It is alleged "that, at the time of making such presentation and demand, he (petitioner) furnished to defendants evidence satisfactory to the defendants that he was the person named in said diploma, and that the same had been issued to him as stated in said diploma." We also find the further allegation: "Plaintiff, on his information and belief, alleges that at the time defendants refused to indorse his said diploma and issue said certificate, that the defendants, as such board of dental examiners, were satisfied that said college was a reputable college." The latter allegation is strictly in accordance with the terms of the statute, and the former, by a fair and liberal construction, is also sufficient.

Although holding the petition satisfactory in law, still plaintiff's troubles are by no means over. Allegations of fact are not difficult to make. Proof of the facts alleged is the final test of a meritorious case. And here proof of facts to fill the measure furnished by the aforesaid allegations of the petition is wanting. In the answer to the petition, the board denied that it was satisfied that the college issuing the diploma was a reputable medical college, and also denied that satisfactory evidence was furnished to it that petitioner was entitled to said diploma. Upon these issues evidence was introduced, and, although findings of fact thereon were made in favor of petitioner, still in view of the construction of the statute, as declared in the main opinion, and in which construction I heartily concur, those findings of fact, as to one of the allegations at least, are without support in the evidence; and a reversal of the judgment necessarily results. The law delegated to the board of examiners the power to hear and determine certain facts, and its determination as to those facts was beyond review by the superior court. The question for the superior court to decide was not as to the correctness of the board's decision, but, rather, what did the board decide? The vitality of petitioner's case is found in the two allegations I have quoted from his petition; and, under the evidence introduced at the hearing before the trial court, it is a certainty that the petitioner did not furnish the board evidence satisfactory to it of his right to the diploma presented. It therefore follows that, as to one of the imperative demands of the statute, petitioner failed in his proof, and the relief asked for must be denied. For these reasons, I concur in the judgment.

BUSWELL v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF ALAMEDA COUNTY et al. (S. F. 325 and 366.)

EQUALIZATION OF TAXES—COUNTY BOARD—EXTENSION OF TIME—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

1. The state board of equalization, which is authorized by Pol. Code, § 3705, to extend the time for the sitting of a county board by an order entered on its minutes and certified to the county auditor, cannot by a resolution authorize such extensions to be made by its clerk on application, and an extension so made by the clerk is void.

2. Pol. Code, § 3672, requiring county boards of equalization to continue in session until the business of equalization is completed, "but not later than the third Monday of July," is directory only as to the limitation of time; and, under section 3885, providing that "no assessment or act relating to assessment or collection of taxes is illegal on account of informality, nor because the same was not completed within the time required by law," an equalization completed 10 days after the third Monday of July, which does not injuriously affect the individual rights of a taxpayer, is valid.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by E. G. Buswell against the board of supervisors of Alameda county and others to have declared void an order equalizing assessments. From the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Chas. E. Snook and L. S. Church, for appellants. Wm. R. Davis and W. Lair Hill, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. These are separate appeals by different defendants from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial. They may be considered and disposed of together. The following facts present, in brief, the matter of plaintiff's complaint: He is a taxpayer of the county of Alameda. Within the time required by law the assessor of the county made his assessment, completed his assessment book, and duly delivered the latter to the board of supervisors. Upon the first Monday of July, 1895, the board of supervisors met as a board of equalization to examine and equalize the assessment so made, "and did then and thenceforth, until and including the 15th day of July, continue from day to day" to equalize the assessment. On the 10th and 12th days in July two pretended orders of the state board of equalization were entered upon the minutes of the state board and certified to the county auditor, which orders purported to extend the time for the sitting of the county board of equalization until the 26th day of July. The state board of equalization never in fact passed or adopted either of these orders, and they were without authority and void. The board of supervisors continued to sit as a board of equalization daily, and upon July 25th, by its order, raised the assessed valuations by the assessor theretofore placed upon certain pieces, and decreased the assessed valuations by the assessor theretofore placed upon other pieces of property, with the result of decreasing the aggregate value fixed by the assessor in the sum of over $1,500,000. A decree is sought declaring the order of the county board of July 25th, by which this reduction was effected, to be null and void, and to compel recognition, upon the part of the officers, of the assessment made by the assessor.

Many grounds of demurrer were interposed to this complaint, but they will be passed by in order that we may come to the paramount question in the case: Was the board of supervisors of Alameda county sitting as the county board of equalization upon July 25th? Section 3672 of the Political Code provides that: "The board of supervisors of each county must meet upon the first Monday of July in each year to examine the assessment book and equalize the assessment of property in the county. It must continue in session for that purpose from time to time, until the business of equalization is disposed of, but not later than the third Monday of July." In 1895 the first Monday of July was the 1st day of the month, and the third Monday fell upon the 15th. Section 3705 of the Political Code declares that "the state board of equalization may by an order entered upon its minutes, and certified to the county auditor of any county, extend, for not exceeding twenty days, the time fixed in this title for the performance of any act * * * by the county boards of equalization." That this section empowers the state board to prolong the time for the sittings of county boards of equalization is unquestioned. Upon the trial it was made to appear that at a date prior to these transactions the state board of equalization, by resolution spread upon its minutes, had authorized its clerk, upon application made, to issue orders for extension of time "as the act of the board." The pretended orders to the Alameda county board were issued by the clerk pursuant to this authority. The state board was not in session at the dates of the orders, and never passed or adopted them. When judicial or quasi judicial powers are vested by law in a public officer, or powers calling for the exercise of discretion, it needs no citation of authority to show that they may not be delegated, and that a pretended exercise of them in advance of a showing of need for present action and determination is nugatory. These orders, then, being without efficacy, it follows that the proceedings of the county board after July 15th must derive validity from some other source, or they are void.

Section 3885 of the Political Code provides that "no assessment, or act relating to assessment or collection of taxes, is illegal on account of informality, nor because the same was not completed within the time required by law." The equalization of the assessor's assessment by the county board is an act relating to assessment, and it is nothing else. It is a general rule, even in the absence of such a statutory enactment as the foregoing, that the provisions as to the time upon which or within which acts are to be done by a public officer regarding the rights and duties of others are directory, unless the nature of the act or language of the legislature makes it clear that the time fixed is by way of limitation. Payne v. City of San Francisco, 3 Cal. 122; Hart v. Plum, 14 Cal. 149; People v. Eureka Lake & Yuba Canal Co., 48 Cal. 143; State v. W. U. Tel. Co., 4 Nev. 338; State v. North Belle Mill & Mining Co., 15 Nev. 386. Section 3885, above quoted, transforms the general judicial interpretation in to a matter of positive law, and removes any possibility of doubt. The time provisions relative to the assessment and collection of taxes, found in the various sections of the Political Code, are designed for the convenience of the officers, and furnish a fit and orderly plan by which the successive duties imposed upon them may be performed without clash or interference the one with the other. The taxpayer may only be heard to complain when by reason of delay he has been debarred of some statutory right, and thereby suffers injury. No such showing is here made. No rights of plaintiff were thwarted or impaired. The county board completed its work upon the 25th of the month, 10 days after the third Monday. It had consumed but half of the time which the statute contemplates might have been allowed to it by the state board. During that 10 days no intermediate acts looking to the assessment were to have been performed by any officer, and the rights of none of the public were interfered with. The attack of plaintiff is, therefore, purely technical, and depends upon the contention that the provisions of section 3672 of the Political Code were mandatory. That this view cannot be sustained is made apparent, not only by the general rule of interpretation for such provisions, but also by the express terms of section 3885. The sittings of the county board did not exceed the time contemplated by law to which they might have extended, interfered with no rights of the plaintiff, and were not illegal under section 3885 of the Political Code. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; VAN FLEET, J.; McFARLAND, J.; TEMPLE, J.

(S. F. 430.)

COMMUNITY PROPERTY — HUSBAND'S POWER OF DISPOSITION — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — VESTED RIGHTS—PARTIES.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 679, providing that "the ownership of property is absolute when a single person has the absolute dominion over it"; and section 172, which, before amended (Act March 31, 1891), provided that "the husband has the management and control of the community property, with the like absolute power of disposition (other than testamentary) as he has of his separate estate,"—the husband was the absolute owner of the community property, in which the wife had no vested right till the dissolution of the marriage.

2. Act March 31, 1891, amending Civ. Code, § 172, which had before provided that a husband should have the management and control of community property "with the like power of disposition (other than testamentary) as he has of his separate estate," by adding, "provided, however, that he cannot make a gift of such community property, or convey the same without a valuable consideration, unless the wife, in writing, consent thereto," is unconstitutional as to community property acquired before its passage, in that it deprives the husband of a vested right.

3. The wife cannot be joined as plaintiff in an action to recover community property.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Claus Spreckels and Anna C. Spreckels, his wife, against Rudolph Spreckels. From a judgment entered on a demurrer to the complaint, and from an order dissolving an injunction, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Delmas & Shortridge, for appellants. Rothschild & Ach, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered upon demurrer to the complaint, and from an order dissolving an injunction. The plaintiffs are husband and wife, and sue to recover certain corporate stock. It is averred in the complaint that the plaintiffs intermarried July 11, 1852, and that on the 31st day of July, 1893, they owned the corporate stock, as community property, which on that day the plaintiff Claus Spreckels voluntarily, and without any consideration, and without the consent of his wife, the other plaintiff, transferred as a gift to the defendant. The said Anna C. Spreckels has never consented, in writing or otherwise, to said transfer or gift. The complaint contains many other allegations which, however, are not material to this discussion. The complaint was demurred to on various grounds, and among them that the complaint does not state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action, and there is a misjoinder of parties plaintiff, in that the wife is joined with her husband as plaintiff in an action to recover community property.

The first point made by the demurrer rests upon the assumption that the complaint shows that the stock became the community property of the plaintiffs prior to the passage of the amendment to section 172 of the Civil Code, which was made March 31, 1891. The complaint does not state when the stock was acquired, and, as this is a material question, it is contended that plaintiffs must be deemed to have stated their case as favorably to themselves as the facts would warrant, and therefore it must be held that the stock was acquired prior to that date. As appellants' counsel seems to acquiesce in this claim, I shall so consider it. Prior to the amendment, the section read as follows: "The husband has the management and control of community property, with the like power of disposition (other than testamentary) as he has of his separate estate." The amendment consisted in adding the following: "Provided, however, that he cannot make a gift of such community property, or convey the same without a valuable consideration, unless the wife, in writing, consent thereto." Respondent contends that the amendment cannot be held to apply to community property acquired prior to the amendment, nor to marriages entered into prior to that time. So construed, he contends, it would deprive the husband of a vested proprietary right in the community property, to wit, the power to dispose thereof without the consent of his wife, and without a valuable consideration; and that it also impairs the obligation of a contract. It is said that the law was at the time of the marriage that the husband had the management and control of the community property, with the like absolute power of disposition, other than testamentary, as of his separate estate, and that this became a part of the contract by which the marriage was constituted; and to deprive the husband of this power is to impair the obligation of that contract. To determine whether the amendment, if applicable to community property acquired prior to its passage, would deprive the husband of a vested right of property, it is necessary to consider what were the rights of husband and wife in the community property at the date of its passage. The constitution does not mention community property, but does define what shall constitute the separate property of the spouses. Const. art. 20, § 8. The Civil Code (section 161) provides that the husband and wife may hold property as joint tenants, tenants in common, or as community property. Then, having defined separate property, it provides that all other property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife or both is community property. Section 167 enacts that the community property is not liable for the debts of the wife contracted after marriage; section 168, that the earnings of the wife are not liable for the debts of the husband; and section 169, that the earnings and accumulations of the wife and of her minor children, who are in her custody, while she is living apart from her husband, are her separate property. Section 172 is the section now under consideration. Section 682 of this Code is: "The ownership of property by several persons is either: (1) Of joint interests; (2) of partnership interests; (3) of interests in common; (4) of community interest of husband and wife." Section 687 again defines community property. This court has held, after mature consideration, that upon the death of the husband the wife takes one-half of the community property as heir. It has been held that the husband can make a gift of the community property to the wife, and convert it into her separate estate. To this it may be added that the wife, if possessed of business capacity, can obtain permission to carry on business in her own name as a sole trader, and that the profits of such business are her separate property. Prior to the amendments of 1891 the Code vested in the husband, with reference to the community property, all the elements of ownership, and in the wife none. If the rights of the parties in the community property are the same, then the law is partial to the wife. She can easily manage that all her earnings and accumulations shall be her separate property. The husband can in no way obtain a similar advantage. If the wife is living separate and apart from the husband, through her own fault, her earnings and accumulations are her own. Yet, if the husband, during the same time, accumulates a fortune, it is community property. There is no mode in which community property can be converted into his separate property. As to all the world, except the wife, there was, prior to this amendment, no distinction between the community estate and the separate estate of the husband. If suit were brought upon a liability incurred in a business, the profits of which would be community property, and judgment recovered, execution could be levied upon the separate estate of the husband, and the debt entirely satisfied therefrom. His separate estate, during the entire marriage, is liable to be taken for community debts, and of course furnishes a credit in aid of community business. If the community loses, the loss may fall upon his separate estate, but his separate estate cannot profit by the success of the community. The separate property of the wife is exempt from all these liabilities, but, on the other hand, the community property is liable for debts incurred by the husband in the management of his separate estate. Now, all these differences point to the fact that the husband is the absolute owner of the community property. Therefore it is that his liabilities incurred in the management of the separate estate can be enforced against the common property, while those of the wife cannot be. And therefore she, under certain circumstances, can accumulate property which shall not belong to the community. If it went to the community, it would belong to the husband, and under the circumstances it is not thought just that he should have it. He needs no corresponding privilege, because the community property is his as absolutely as is his separate estate. So he cannot convert it into his separate estate, and, if the property belonged to the community, and the husband had only an agency, perhaps he could not give it to his wife.

Now, then, we have this state of the case: The statute provides that the husband and wife may hold property as community property. Section 161. It defines what shall constitute community property. It defines ownership (section 654), and then gives to the husband complete legal ownership of the community property (section 172), and confers upon the wife no element of ownership whatever. Courts and counsel have occasionally endeavored to find some property right in the wife, or some respect in which the husband's interest falls short of full property. I think it will be universally admitted that so far there has been a complete failure in this respect. The first attempt shown by our reports of that kind is in Godey v. Godey, 39 Cal. 157. In that case it is said that, while no other technical term so well defines the wife's interest as the phrase "a mere expectancy, * * * it is at the same time * * * so vested in her that [the] husband cannot deprive her of it by his will, nor voluntarily alienate it for the mere purpose of divesting her of her claim to it." The testamentary power is not an essential incident to property, and depriving the husband of such power with reference to the community estate did not take from him any right of property. It was competent for the legislature to deny to the husband the right to dispose of his separate estate by will, and to provide that upon his death all should go to his widow, subject to the payment of his debts. Should the legislature now so provide, it would not deprive the husband of any vested right to property, or give the wife an interest in his estate during his life. If the property did not belong to the husband, there would be no occasion for a law limiting his testamentary power with reference thereto. The original statute, which practically adopted the Mexican system as to gananciales, was held to constitute such a limitation. Beard v. Knox, 5 Cal. 256. That gave the wife a nominal estate during the marriage, which became an actual estate upon its termination. If the husband cannot make a valid transfer of the property for the purpose of depriving the wife of it, that does not show a vested right in her. This is explained in the very case quoted as authority, in Godey v. Godey. In Smith v. Smith, 12 Cal. 217, Justice Field said: "Voluntary conveyances, given on the eve of marriage for the purpose of depriving the intended wife of her right of dower, where that common-law right exists, are fraudulent as against her claim. This was so adjudged in Swaine v. Perine, 5 Johns. Ch. 482. And upon the same principle, a voluntary disposition by the husband of the common property, or a portion thereof, for the like purpose of depriving the wife of her interest in the same, must be held ineffectual against the assertion of her claim." Nor can he put his separate property out of his hands for the purpose of defeating his wife in an anticipated application for alimony. Murray v. Murray (Cal.) 47 Pac. 37. So we see a mere expectancy, without any vested property right at the time the fraud was committed, is sufficient to enable the person who has the expectancy to maintain the action after his right has become vested. The husband's ownership of one-half of the community estate is, in a sense, conditional. It may terminate upon the happening of a possible event. Until then he is, however, absolute owner as defined in the Code. Civ. Code, §§ 678–680.

The marital community was not organized for the purpose of accumulating property, and the husband owes no duty to the community, or to the wife either, to labor or accumulate money, or to save or practice economy to that end. He owes his wife and children suitable maintenance, and if he has sufficient income from his separate estate for that purpose he need not engage in business, or so live that there can be community property. If he earns more than is sufficient for such maintenance, he violates no legal obligation if he spends the surplus in extravagance, or gives it away. The community property may be lost in visionary schemes or in mere whims. Within the law he may live his life, although the community estate is dissipated. Of course, I am not now speaking of his moral obligations. We derived the system of community estate from the Mexican law, which prevailed here before the acquisition of the territory. The system was unknown to the common law, and it has no better name for the interest of the wife during the marriage than "a mere expectancy." The Mexican jurists spoke of it as a feigned and fictitious ownership, or as merely nominal, and it is contrasted with the ownership of the husband. That is called the actual or true ownership. In Panaud v. Jones, 1 Cal. 488, it is said: "The wife, says Febrero (1 Feb. Mej. 225, § 19), is clothed with the revocable and feigned dominion and possession of one-half of the property acquired by her and her husband during the marriage; but after his death it is transferred to her effectively and irrevocably. * * * The husband needs not the dissolution of the marriage to constitute him the real and veritable owner of all the gananciales, since even during the marriage he has, in effect, the irrevocable dominion," etc. In Van Maren v. Johnson, 15 Cal. 308, it is said that the estate of the common property is in the husband, and he may dispose of it as he can of his separate estate; the interest of the wife being a mere expectancy. Guice v. Lawrence, 2 La. Ann. 226, is cited as authority. In Packard v. Arellanes, 17 Cal. 525, that case is again cited as authority, in which it is said that during the life of the husband the wife cannot say she has gananciales,—that is, community property,—but the husband, during marriage, is "real y verdadero dueno de todos, y tiene en el effecto su dominio irrevocable"; where, too, the interest of the wife was said to be revocable and fictitious. In Escriche, under "Bienes Gananciales," it is said that the husband owns the community property both nominally and in fact,—en habito y en acto; while the wife's ownership is only nominal,—en habito,—becoming an actual estate upon the dissolution of the marriage. In Ballinger on Community Property the Mexican law is stated as above,—the wife had only a feigned or fictitious estate, which ripened into a legal estate upon the termination of the marriage; and he adds, referring to the state of things under the former statute of this state, which provided that upon the death of the wife prior to the death of the husband one-half of the community property should go to her heirs, that, since the statute failed to provide that upon the death of the wife one-half should go to her estate, her intangible interest did not ripen into a legal estate. Section 35. Accordingly it was held in Packard v. Arellanes that under such circumstances the interest of the wife could not be administered upon, and that her heirs did not acquire the estate by inheritance from her upon her death before her husband, but took as persons designated by the statute. Speaking of the wife's interest, it is there said: "Such interest constitutes neither a legal nor an equitable estate, and there is, therefore, nothing in it for a court of probate to act upon. If, under the statute, the title of the husband, upon the death of the wife, is divested as to any portion of the property, such title passes directly to the descendants of the wife, and they take it subject to the liability of the property to be absorbed in the payment of debts."

As the law stood prior to the amendment of 1891, I doubt if a happier phrase could have been devised to express the interest of the wife in the community than that used by Judge Field in Van Maren v. Johnson, "a mere expectancy." It may be said to be a right—not to property, but as against the community—to take one-half of the residue after payment of debts in case the marriage be dissolved during her life. A somewhat similar state of things exists in France under the Code, and it has been there said that the wife is not "proprie socia, sed speratur fore. She has une simple esperance to share in such property as may be found at the dissolution of the community undisposed of by the husband." 1 Burge, Col. Law, 368. The system of the community in California, Louisiana, and Texas was inherited from Spain or Mexico, and simply continued with such changes as were deemed desirable. It was adopted in Washington, Nevada, Idaho, and Arizona. The systems are not exactly alike. In some states—Texas, Louisiana, and Idaho—profits, increase, and income of separate property also became community property. It is not so here. If the wife has separate property, the increase derived from it is also separate property; only the earnings and the profits gained in business, and the increase of property so acquired, is community property; and, as we have seen, the wife may so manage as to convert all gains derived from business transacted by her into her separate property. In Washington the husband cannot convey real estate belonging to the community without joining the wife. There the husband and wife may at any time agree as to the status of the community property, such agreement to take effect at the death of either, and either may give, grant, or sell to the other his or her interest in community property. Naturally, in that state it has been held that the wife has a vested interest in the community property. Ballinger, Commun. Prop. § 78. In no other state, so far as I am aware, has there been any such holding, although in Texas it has been said that she has an equitable interest.

It is suggested that the sole ownership of the community property—if it be conceded to the husband—is vested in him by statute, and may be taken from him by statute. All ownership has been said to be the offspring of law, but it does not, therefore, follow that all property rights can be divested by law. In fact, I see no connection between the premise and the conclusion. Whether the law of the marriage relation can be changed so as to affect the status of property acquired thereafter is another question. The community property, as a rule, constitutes the earnings, gains, and savings of a man during his whole lifetime. If he can make presents to his friends, provide for indigent relatives, or make advancements to his children, it must be from this property. To deprive him of this power is certainly to divest him of a property right. This argument need not, however, be pursued further, because counsel admit that, if the husband is the owner of the property, then a statute which makes the exercise of the right to dispose of it subject to the will of another is unconstitutional.

Entertaining these views, it is unnecessary to consider the other contention under this head, that the amendment violates the obligations of a contract. It is clear, I think, that the operation of the amendment must be confined, at least, to community property acquired after its passage. I think the ruling sustaining the demurrer to the complaint on the ground that there is a misjoinder in that the wife cannot be joined as plaintiff in an action to recover community property, must also be sustained; and that without reference to the question as to the nature of the wife's interest in the community property. If the gift was void, the property still remained community property, and was as much under the management and control of the husband as any other portion of the community property. To hold that the wife is a necessary or proper party in this case would be to hold that she is such in every case brought to recover community property. The statute, as amended, does not give her a right of action in this case, but leaves it to the general rule. It has been held for near half a century that she is not a proper party to such actions. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; HARRISON, J.; McFARLAND, J.

BEATTY, C. J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment, but upon a ground somewhat narrower than that taken in the opinion of Justice TEMPLE. It does not seem to me necessary, in order to sustain the ruling of the superior court upon this demurrer, to go to the extent of holding the proviso added to section 172 of the Civil Code by the act of 1891 an unconstitutional attempt to take away from the husband his vested rights in community property acquired prior to that date. I am not at all clear that it does impair any vested right. But, allowing the law to be constitutional as to all community property, irrespective of the date of its acquisition or of the marriage by which the community was formed, it still does not go far enough to sustain this action. If the husband makes a gift or voluntary transfer of community property, the transfer is good against him. He has no right of action to recover it back. The only person who, in any case, has a right to complain, is the wife, and she cannot maintain an action to revoke the gift until she has been injured by it. Upon the dissolution of the community by the death of the husband, or by divorce, I think that in estimating her share of the community property she would be entitled to have any property given away by the husband subsequent to the act of 1891 reckoned as a part of the community assets, and that she would be entitled to reclaim from the donee enough to make up her half of the whole, if less than one-half remained undisposed of. In all ordinary cases this would be the proper and sufficient remedy for any infringement of her rights. It is possible that a case might arise in which the circumstances would warrant the institution of an action by her before the dissolution of the community, but no such circumstances are shown to exist in this case. It does not appear that the amount of the gift was so disproportionate to the amount of the community property as to endanger the right of the wife to her full share on the dissolution of the community, or to deprive the husband of the means of supporting the wife and others dependent upon him. In short, it does not show any present or prospective injury to her, and he, of course, has no ground of complaint. If the wife survives her husband, she will get her full share of the community property out of that which remains. If the husband survives the wife, he will get everything that he has not voluntarily parted with. On this ground I place my concurrence in the judgment.

INGHAM et al. v. WEED et al. (L. A. 211.)

Mortgage—Action to Foreclose—Parties.

1. Where one who is obligated, as between himself and a mortgagor, to pay a portion only of the mortgage debt, pays such portion, and afterwards pays the balance due, the payment does not extinguish the mortgage as to such balance.

2. The assignee of a mortgage, by an assignment absolute on its face, may maintain an action to foreclose in his own name, though, by a collateral agreement, he may be bound to account for the proceeds to another.

3. One who has transferred all his interest in mortgaged property is not a necessary party to an action to foreclose.

Action by E. A. Ingham and R. D. List, trustee, against J. Irving Weed, James P. McCarthy, Edward McCarthy, the McCarthy Company, L. A. Thompson, W. E. Witter, and G. P. Lyman, for the foreclosure of a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiffs, from which, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, defendants Weed, the McCarthys, and the McCarthy Company appeal. Affirmed.

H. H. Appel and McKeeby, for appellants. Wicks & Wicks & Macdonald and H. T. Gordon, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiffs brought this action to foreclose a mortgage, given to secure payment of two promissory notes of which they were the assignees. They obtained a judgment and decree of foreclosure as prayed for, from which, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, the defendants Weed, the McCarthys, and the McCarthy Company, a corporation, appeal.

It appears from the record that prior to March 1, 1888, Edward McCarthy purchased the mortgaged premises from Charles E. Pittman and others. He paid part of the purchase money down, and gave to the sellers a mortgage for the balance. On March 1, 1888, this mortgage had been reduced, by payments made thereon from time to time, to $15,000, bearing interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum. Prior to that time Edward McCarthy had made contracts with various parties, and, among others, with respondents Thompson, Witter, and Lyman, to sell to them undivided interests in the said lands for prices agreed upon, to be paid in installments. On March 1, 1888, a written agreement was entered into between Edward McCarthy, as party of the first part, the respondents Thompson, Witter, and Lyman and all the other contractors for undivided interests, as parties of the second part, and J. Irving Weed, as party of the third part. The agreement provided that the party of the first part should convey the whole tract to the party of the third part, in trust, to make sales and conveyances and to distribute the proceeds thereof according to the agreement. It conferred upon the trustee full power "to grant, bargain, sell, and convey all or any portion of said land for such price and upon such terms as he shall deem best." And, as to his duties, it contained the following provisions: "It is further agreed that the trustee aforesaid shall receive and collect all moneys for sales of the land aforesaid, and pay all taxes, commissions, expenses of sale of all kinds, and improvements, authorized by the parties of the second part, and shall, on or before the first day of July, A. D. 1888, declare a dividend in favor of the second parties of any and all moneys in his hands, in proportion to the interests of the respective parties therein, as shown by the contracts with Edward McCarthy, aforesaid, and shall, out of said dividends, pay to Edward McCarthy the amounts due or to become due to him from second parties on said contracts; * * * and said trustee shall declare dividends and apply the proceeds in the same manner every three months thereafter, until all the installments on said contracts have been paid, and all of said property shall have been disposed of. It is further understood and agreed that whereas there is now a mortgage on said property to the amount of $15,000, with interest at ten per cent. from March 1, 1888, of which Edward McCarthy has assumed the payment, that, in case it becomes necessary or expedient to change or renew said mortgage, the trustee shall, and he is hereby authorized to, execute such mortgage in his own name, and the amount received by said trustee from said second parties, or in their behalf, applicable to the installments due to Edward McCarthy, shall be applied to the liquidation of said mortgage, and shall be credited on the contracts of Edward McCarthy to second parties in the proportions to which they are respectively entitled thereto." Contemporaneously with the execution of this agreement, Edward McCarthy conveyed the land to Weed by a deed absolute on its face, the trust being expressed only in said agreement. Subsequently, the original mortgagees, the Pittmans, demanded payment of a part of the debt and the execution of a new mortgage to secure the balance. Charles McCarthy thereupon paid $5,000 on their $15,000 mortgage, thus reducing the indebtedness to $10,000; and for that balance, on March 27, 1889, James P. McCarthy and Edward McCarthy executed to the Pittmans the two notes in suit, each for $5,000, one payable one and the other two years after date, and the said McCarthys and the said Weed executed the mortgage in suit to secure payment of said notes. Weed never sold any part of said tract of land, as contemplated by the trust agreement; but on November 1, 1892, it being then deemed expedient by all the parties to terminate the trust, he conveyed to each of the beneficiaries an undivided interest in the property, equal to his share or interest therein, as follows: To Edward McCarthy, $^{25}/_{40}$; to L. A. Thompson, $^{3}/_{40}$; to W. E. Witter, $^{2}/_{40}$; to G. P. Lyman, $^{2}/_{40}$; to Otto Freeman, $^{2}/_{40}$; and to Andrew Glassell, $^{6}/_{40}$. Subsequently the said interests of McCarthy, Freeman, and Glassell were conveyed by them to the McCarthy Company, defendant, thus vesting in it title to $^{33}/_{40}$ of the whole property. While the notes were held by the payees thereof, the Pittmans, payments of interest and principal, aggregating $7,495.86, were made and indorsed upon them from time to time. Afterwards the balance due on the notes was paid, mostly by the respondents Thompson and Witter, but in part by the plaintiffs; and thereupon, at the request of said respondents, the notes were assigned by the payees to the plaintiffs.

In support of their appeal, appellants contend that the plaintiffs cannot maintain this action to foreclose the mortgage for several reasons: First, because Thompson and Witter were bound by contract to pay off the mortgage, and did so, and it was then extinguished; second, because the plaintiffs have no interest, legal or equitable, in the notes and mortgage, but are acting simply as the agents of Thompson and Witter; third, because the deeds of the trustee to the several parties who had contracts for interests in the land were to be delivered only upon certain conditions, which were never complied with, and hence they were delivered without authority of the grantor, and passed no title to the grantees; fourth, because the only remedy of Thompson, Witter, and Lyman was to file a bill for contribution against their associates in the transaction; fifth, because Charles McCarthy was a necessary party to the suit.

1. There is no evidence in the record showing or tending to show that Thompson and Witter ever personally undertook to pay the mortgage debt. They did not execute the notes or mortgage, and the only obligation resting upon them in this regard is that evidenced by the agreement of March 1st, to the effect that Weed, as trustee, might execute the mortgage, and might receive the amounts due from the parties of the second part on their contracts with Edward McCarthy, and should apply the same to the liquidation of the said mortgage. This at most created an obligation on the part of each of the parties of the second part to pay his proportion of the debt. But the evidence shows that Thompson, Witter, and Lyman each paid his proportion of the debt, and then paid or caused to be paid the balance thereof. This did not extinguish the mortgage as to such balance, but left it a subsisting lien to secure its payment.

2. The evidence shows that each of the plaintiffs paid or obligated himself to pay a part of the money used to take up the notes from the Pittmans. But assuming it were otherwise, and that Thompson, Witter, and Lyman paid to the Pittmans the full amount due on the notes, and then had them assigned to the plaintiffs as their agents for collection, still the plaintiffs were not thereby deprived of the right to sue upon the notes and mortgage in their own names. The assignment vested in them the entire legal title, and they became the real parties in interest. Speaking upon this subject, Mr. Pomeroy, in his work on Code Remedies (3d Ed., § 132), says: "It is now settled by a great preponderance of authority, although there is some conflict, that if the assignment, whether written or verbal, of anything in action, is absolute in its terms, so that, by virtue thereof, the entire apparent legal title vests in the assignee, any contemporaneous collateral agreement by virtue of which he is to receive a part only of the proceeds, 'and is to account to the assignor or other person for the residue, or even is to thus account for the whole proceeds, or by virtue of which the absolute transfer is made conditional upon the fact of recovery, or by which his title is in any other similar manner partial or conditional,' does not render him any the less the real party in interest. He is entitled to sue in his own name, whatever collateral arrangements have been made between him and the assignor respecting the proceeds. The debtor is completely protected by the assignment, and cannot be exposed to a second action brought by any of the parties, either the assignor or other, to whom the assignee is bound to account. This is the settled doctrine in most of the states,"—citing authorities. And see, also, to the same effect, McPherson v. Weston, 64 Cal. 275, 30 Pac. 842; Grant v. Heverin, 77 Cal. 263, 18 Pac. 647, and 19 Pac. 493; Toby v. Railroad Co., 98 Cal. 490, 33 Pac. 550.

3. That the deeds were executed by Weed with the consent of all the beneficiaries sufficiently appears from the evidence, and it also appears that they were in fact delivered to the grantees, and by them placed on record. And, so far as appears, no objection to the validity of any one of them, for want of delivery or other reason, was ever raised by any party until after the commencement of this action. Under the circumstances shown, it must therefore, in our opinion, be held that the delivery was sufficient to pass title to the grantees. See Witter v. McCarthy Co. (Cal.) 43 Pac. 969, Thompson v. McCarthy Co., Id. 971, and Lyman v. McCarthy Co., Id. 971 et seq., where the validity of three of the said deeds was called in question, and upheld. But assuming that the deeds were not properly delivered, and that no title to undivided interests in the property was passed by them to the grantees, then the title to the whole property still remained in the grantor as trustee. No objection to the validity of the notes and mortgage is raised, and, under these circumstances, this action can and should be sustained as one brought against the holder of the legal title to the property and the several parties having beneficial interests therein under contracts of purchase.

4. If this action could not be maintained, then, clearly, the only remedy of Thompson, Witter, and Lyman would be an action for contribution; but, as we have seen that the action can be maintained, it is enough to say that they should not be relegated to another action, but may rest on their rights in this one.

5. Was Charles McCarthy a necessary party to the suit? The law is well settled that only those persons are necessary parties to a foreclosure suit who have some beneficial interest in the mortgaged property or in the demand secured. It is true that McCarthy paid off $5,000 of the $15,000 mortgage, and some interest and expenses that had accrued; but subsequently he transferred all his interest in the property to others, and, at the time this action was commenced, that interest was, and still is, vested in the McCarthy Company. He had consequently no interest in or lien or claim upon the property or demand secured, and was therefore, in our opinion, not a necessary or proper party to the action.

The other points discussed by counsel do not require special notice. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BRITT, C.

IRISH v. PAULEY. (Sac. 160.)

CONTRACT—PERFORMANCE.

Under a contract to furnish logs to a mill, to be floated to the mill the next spring, if practicable, and, if not, then the spring following, where it is found that delivery the first spring was not practicable, a delivery the second fulfills the contract; and no damages are recoverable for the delay, or for the depreciation in value of the logs during the year.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sierra county; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by John B. Irish against Benjamin Pauley on a contract. Judgment for plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. D. Soward, for appellant. Frank R. Wehe and John B. Irish, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. Action upon a verbal contract to cut and deliver sawlogs at the sawmill of defendant, on the East Fork of the North Fork of the North Yuba river, county of Sierra. The cause was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury. Written findings were filed, upon which judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff for $560 and costs. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

We have found but little aid from the statement of facts by the counsel for the respective parties in their briefs. The statement of each is predicated upon the evidence in his own behalf, and seems to ignore that of his adversary. As there was a substantial conflict in the evidence upon nearly all the issues in the case, and as the court below found in favor of the plaintiff, counsel for respondent is justified in assuming the facts to be in line with the testimony of his own witnesses.

The first point made for reversal is that "the decision is against law, as the judgment is based upon contradictory findings." It is urged under this head that the third finding contradicts the sixth, and such others as find that plaintiff complied with all the conditions of his contract. To the better understanding of the finding assailed, and of some others to which similar objections are made, we give a synopsis of such of the findings as shadow forth an outline of the case. (1) In August, 1893, plaintiff and defendant entered into a verbal contract by which plaintiff agreed to cut and deliver at defendant's sawmill, on the East Fork of the North Fork of the North Yuba river, Sierra county, sawlogs containing from 100,000 to 150,000 feet of lumber; to be paid therefor, on delivery, $8 per 1,000 feet. (2) The logs were to be cut into special lengths, of 12, 14, 16, 18, and 20 feet, and at such place that they could be floated down the East Fork to defendant's mill. They were to be floated in the spring of the year by water from the melted snow; and, if practicable, were to be floated in the spring of 1894, but, if not practicable, then in the spring of 1895. (3) In the spring of 1894 the plaintiff and defendant measured and counted the logs in the forest where cut, and found there were 417 logs, containing 140,000 feet of lumber. Such measurement was not intended as a modification or change of the contract, under which they were to be delivered at the dam or boom of defendant. (4) In the spring of 1894 plaintiff made an effort to float and deliver the logs, but was unable to do so by reason of a snowslide which blocked the river, and which, after a reasonable effort, by blasting, etc., he was unable to remove. (5) In the spring of 1895 plaintiff delivered to the defendant, at his mill, 100,000 feet of lumber, in 300 logs, and there then became due him $800. (6) Plaintiff complied with all the terms of his contract, and defendant has paid nothing on account thereof except the sum of $140. (8) The logs were, under the contract, fashioned according to the specifications furnished by defendant, and would not have been salable in the general market. (9) Defendant accepted the 100,000 feet of lumber. There are five more findings of fact, to which we will refer as occasion requires. We fail to see any conflict whatever between the third and sixth findings. The third is to the effect that in 1894 defendant measured and counted the logs, and found there were 417 logs, aggregating 140,000 feet of lumber. The contract called for 100,000 feet to 150,000 feet of lumber, and when 100,000 feet was delivered the contract was satisfied. This being so, the fact that the logs, as measured and counted in the woods, consisted of 417 logs and measured 140,000 feet, constituted no conflict. Plaintiff could comply with his contract by delivering anywhere from 100,000 feet up to 150,000 feet of lumber. The measurement of the logs in the woods was doubtless more convenient than in the dam or boom where they were to be delivered, and, had plaintiff succeeded in floating them all to the mill, it would have saved labor, nothing more.

It is further objected that finding 14, which is to the effect that plaintiff delivered no logs in 1894, but did deliver 300 logs in 1895; that they were cut and prepared for delivery in 1894; and that by the delay in delivery they were injured to the extent of $1 per 1,000 feet, etc.,—is in conflict with finding 6 and a portion of finding 11, which are to the effect that such delay was no violation of the terms of plaintiff's contract. By the second finding it will be seen that the logs were to be floated in 1894, if practicable, and, if not, then in 1895; and the fourth finding shows that it was not practicable to so float them in 1894, and gives at length the reason therefor. We agree with the learned counsel for appellant that the injury to the logs by the delay is a false quantity, and immaterial, as it was not in violation of the contract, or by reason thereof that the injury occurred. The court deducted $1 per 1,000 from the amount of the judgment on account of such injury. The judgment being upon the special contract, and not upon quantum valebat, this deduction was not called for. But, as the error was in favor of appellant, he cannot be heard to complain.

The question of the loss sustained by defendant by reason of not having logs to saw in 1894 cuts no figure in the case. Had defendant's theory, that the logs were, under the contract, to be delivered in 1894, been sustained, the loss by reason of a violation of the contract might have become an important factor; but as plaintiff's theory, that they were to be delivered in 1894 or 1895, was upheld, and as he was found to have performed the contract fully on his part, there was no question of damages sustained by defendant, or profits lost by him, to be considered. The contention that only 100 logs were delivered to and accepted by defendant is in conflict with the findings and evidence.

There are some other points made, but they have no more merit than those already noticed. We have carefully examined the evidence. It is conflicting, to the last degree, but is quite sufficient to sustain the findings of the court. We recommend that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

DANIELSON v. YOAKUM. (L. A. 198.)

CORPORATIONS — STOCKHOLDERS' LIABILITY — VOLUNTARY PAYMENT.

A stockholder being liable only for debts of the corporation incurred after he acquired his stock (Const. art. 12, § 3; Civ. Code, § 322), his payment of debts incurred prior thereto is voluntary, and cannot be recovered of one who sold him the stock.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Henry Bleecker and Cochran & Williams, for appellant. Allen & Flint, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Action to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff by reason of false and fraudulent representations made by defendant, whereby she was induced to purchase from the defendant certain bank stock. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained, without leave to amend, and judgment was thereupon entered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals therefrom.

Plaintiff purchased from defendant 36 shares of the capital stock of the City Bank of Los Angeles on November 3, 1892, and the complaint sufficiently alleges false and fraudulent representations made by defendant to induce her to purchase, to justify a recovery, if damages were sustained. The complaint, however, further alleges that plaintiff discovered the fraud on or about August 17, 1893, and brought an action to rescind said contract of purchase, and that a decree was rendered therein requiring the defendant to return the consideration paid by plaintiff for said stock, and that she, pursuant to said decree, delivered said stock to the plaintiff. The complaint then proceeds to allege "that at the time of the transfer of said stock the said City Bank was indebted to a large number of persons and corporations, and among them the following, in the amount set opposite their names" (enumerating more than 80 creditors, with the amount due to each); that on or about November 22, 1893, these claims were consolidated by assignment, and the assignees commenced an action against her to recover a ratable proportion of the said liabilities of said bank, and attached her property; and that on or about the 18th day of October, 1894, she paid on account of said claims the proportion thereof which said 36 shares bore to the entire subscribed capital stock, to wit, $984.10,—and claimed damages in that sum. All the liabilities against the bank which are set out in the complaint are distinctly alleged to have accrued before she purchased the stock, and she was therefore not liable thereon to the creditors of the bank. The stockholders in a corporation who are liable to its creditors are those who were stockholders at the time the indebtedness or liability was incurred by the corporation. Const. art. 12, § 3; Civ. Code, § 322; Bidwell v. Babcock, 87 Cal. 29, 25 Pac. 752. Respondent was liable for his proportion of those debts at the time he sold and transferred said stock to appellant, and was not released from his liability by the transfer. Civ. Code, § 322. As there existed no legal liability against appellant, her payment was voluntary, and does not constitute a cause of action against respondent for damages. It clearly appearing that the sum paid by appellant was solely upon debts incurred before appellant purchased the stock, the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer without leave to amend. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

WILLIAM HILL CO. v. LAWLER. (S. F. 178.)

DISTRIBUTION OF ESTATE — COLLATERAL ATTACK.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1666, declares that, on final distribution of an estate, the decree must name the persons and their shares, and shall be conclusive as to the rights of parties unless appealed from. Section 1678 provides that such distribution may be made though some of the heirs, etc., have conveyed their shares, and that such shares must be assigned to the person holding the same. Held, that a decree, after due notice, distributing to certain heirs a particular tract of the community estate, was, in the absence of an appeal, conclusive on one to whom the widow had conveyed an undivided half of said tract pending distribution.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. Dougherty, Judge.

Action by the William Hill Company against John Lawler to quiet title. From a judgment quieting plaintiff's title to an undivided half of the land, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Lyman Green, T. J. Geary, and A. B. Ware, for appellant. J. C. Sims, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Patrick Lawler died September 9, 1887, leaving, him surviving, a widow and certain children, and also leaving a last will and testament, which was admitted to probate by the superior court of Sonoma county October 25, 1887. In his will he appointed his widow, Bridget, and his son Patrick, executors thereof, and declared that his entire estate was community property, and recognized and confirmed the right of his surviving widow to one half thereof, and gave the remaining half to his two sons James and Patrick. December 21, 1887, his widow conveyed, by deed of gift, to her son John, the respondent herein, "all her undivided one-half interest in a tract" containing about 144 acres of land, a portion of the estate of her deceased husband. May 20, 1889, the executors presented to the superior court for settlement the final report and account of their administration of said estate, and at the same time a petition for the final distribution of the estate was presented to the court. The court appointed June 18th as a day for the hearing thereof, of which proper notice was given, and on said day made its order settling the account, and distributing the estate. In the decree of distribution the tract of land that had been conveyed by Bridget to the respondent was distributed to Patrick and James, and other portions of the estate were distributed in severalty to Bridget, while some portion of the estate was distributed in undivided interests to the three. The plaintiff herein, having succeeded to the interest of James and Patrick in the tract which was distributed to them as above stated, brought this action against the respondent to quiet its title thereto. The superior court rendered judgment quieting its title to the extent of an undivided half interest therein. From this judgment, and an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff has appealed, claiming that the court erred in refusing to quiet its title to the entire tract.

By filing the petition for the distribution of the estate, and giving the notice required by section 1665, Code Civ. Proc., the superior court acquired jurisdiction to distribute the estate "among the persons who by law were entitled thereto." The "distribution" of an estate includes the determination of the persons who by law are entitled thereto, and also the "proportions or parts" to which each of these persons is entitled; and the "parts" of the estate so distributed may be segregated or undivided portions of the estate. It is declared in section 1666 that "in the order or decree the court must name the persons and the proportions or parts to which each shall be entitled," and also "such order or decree is conclusive as to the rights of heirs, legatees, or devisees, subject only to be reversed, set aside, or modified on appeal." A proceeding for distribution is in the nature of a proceeding in rem, the res being the estate which is in the hands of the executor under the control of the court, and which he brings before the court for the purpose of receiving directions as to its final disposition. By giving the notice directed by the statute, the entire world is called before the court, and the court acquires jurisdiction over all persons for the purpose of determining their rights to any portion of the estate; and every person who may assert any right or interest therein is required to present his claim to the court for its determination. Whether he appear and present his claim, or fail to appear, the action of the court is equally conclusive upon him, "subject only to be reversed, set aside, or modified on appeal." The decree is as binding upon him if he fail to appear and present his claim as if his claim after presentation had been disallowed by the court. In re Griffith's Estate, 84 Cal. 107, 23 Pac. 528, and 24 Pac. 381; Daly v. Pennie, 86 Cal. 552, 25 Pac. 67. The grantee of an heir or devisee, or any person who claims under an heir or devisee, is bound by the decree as fully as would be the heir or devisee himself if he had not made the conveyance. Section 1678, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "Partition or distribution of the real estate may be made as provided in this chapter, although some of the original heirs, legatees or devisees may have conveyed their shares to other persons, and such shares must be assigned to the person holding the same in the same manner as they otherwise would have been to such heirs, legatees or devisees." The provisions of this section extend to the distribution as well as to the partition which is provided in that chapter, and render the decree as conclusive upon those to whom the heirs have conveyed the estate as it "otherwise would have been upon such heirs, legatees or devisees"; and the decree is equally conclusive whether the estate is distributed to the persons in segregated parts or in undivided proportions.

What was decided in Chever v. Ching Hong Poy, 82 Cal. 68, 22 Pac. 1081, was that distribution to the heir of certain property which he had conveyed pending administration did not preclude his grantee from claiming the property as against him; that, by virtue of his conveyance, he was estopped from claiming the property under the distribution, as against his grantee. In that case it appeared that the grantee of the heir was not before the court when the distribution was made, and there was no issue upon her right to have the property distributed to her. In Re Vaughn's Estate, 92 Cal. 192, 28 Pac. 221, it was held that the grantee of the heirs was entitled to have the estate distributed to him, and the order of the superior court making a distribution to the heirs in opposition to his petition was reversed. This was a direct appeal from the order of distribution, and, as the superior court had manifestly disregarded the provisions of section 1678, its order was reversed. Whether the title of the grantee would have been affected by the distribution to the heirs if no appeal had been taken from the decree was not considered by the court, but there is nothing in the case which lends countenance to the proposition that the decree could be collaterally attacked. The averments in the petition that the heirs had conveyed the estate to the petitioner were not controverted, and there was no issue presented thereon for the determination of the court. If the heirs had taken issue upon these averments, the superior court would have been required to determine that issue, and its decision thereon would have been conclusive upon the petitioner as well as upon the heirs, "subject only to be reversed, set aside or modified on appeal." In re Burdick's Estate, 112 Cal. 387, 44 Pac. 734, it was determined by this court, after mature consideration, that the surviving widow takes her share of the community property by "succession" from the husband; and it consequently follows that a conveyance by her of her interest in any portion of the estate, pending administration and before distribution, has no greater effect than would a similar conveyance by any other heir.

The decree of the superior court made on the 18th of June, 1889, was a determination by that tribunal, in a matter wherein it had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of all persons who might make any claim thereto, that Patrick and James Lawler were entitled to the property in question. As no appeal was taken from this decree, it became conclusive upon Bridget Lawler and upon her grantee, the respondent herein. The question of an estoppel by virtue of her grant does not arise in the present case, as the property distributed to her is not the same as that which she had conveyed to the respondent.

The court did not err in refusing to admit in evidence or to consider the agreement between Bridget, James, and Patrick, which was presented to the superior court at the time of distribution. This agreement was only evidence offered to that court for determining the distribution which it should make; and if error was committed by that court, either in receiving or considering this evidence, such error could have been reviewed upon an appeal from the decree of distribution, but cannot be made the basis of a collateral attack upon that decree. The judgment and order are reversed.

MILLER v. CARR. (L. A. 142.)

VACATION OF JUDGMENT — MISTAKE—SUFFICIENCY OF SHOWING.

Where a defendant, on being served with summons, noted the date thereon, and gave it to his attorney, and his pleading was served on the day it was due according to such date, but on the same date judgment was entered against him by default on the return of the sheriff, which showed the service to have been made a day earlier, such facts, when shown, with a sufficient affidavit of merits, require the court to vacate the judgment and default.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; A. R. Conklin, Judge.

Action by John O. Miller against W. B.

Carr. Judgment for plaintiff by default. Defendant appeals from an order denying his motion to vacate the judgment and default. Reversed.

Edward J. McCutchen, for appellant. J. W. Mahon, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This appeal is from a judgment by default, and from an order denying defendant's motion to vacate said judgment and default. The action was commenced in the superior court of Kern county June 20, 1895, and the summons was served upon the defendant at the city and county of San Francisco, by the sheriff thereof, on the 24th day of the same month, as shown by the return of said sheriff indorsed thereon. On July 25th, the thirty-first day after said service as shown by said return, defendant's default and judgment thereon were entered by the clerk. Defendant promptly moved to set aside the judgment and default upon the ground that they were taken against him through his mistake in the date upon which service of the summons was made upon him, and in support of said motion two affidavits, one made by the defendant and one by his attorney, were read, and in opposition thereto plaintiff read the said return of said sheriff. No other evidence was offered or heard. Defendant's affidavit shows that, immediately after the service of the summons upon him, he noted thereon the words "Served June 25, 1895"; that to the best of his knowledge and belief said summons was served upon the 25th, and not on the 24th; that if the service was made on the 24th he was then, and ever since has been, mistaken as to the date of service; that he informed his counsel that it was served on the 25th; that if he was mistaken in the date his demurrer was filed and served one day too late. Said affidavit also contained a sufficient affidavit of merits. The affidavit of his attorney, Mr. McCutchen, shows that the papers served upon defendant were handed to him a few days after the service, that he was then informed by defendant that the service was made on the 25th, and noticed defendant's memorandum thereof at that time; that defendant informed him of the facts of the case, and instructed him to move for a change of the place of trial, and noted in his journal that July 25, 1895, was the last day to plead; that he prepared a demurrer and the motion papers, and mailed them to Bakersfield, where, as appears by defendant's affidavit, they were served and filed on the 25th of July.

We think the court erred in not granting defendant's motion. It is true the clerk was required to act upon the sheriff's return, but upon the hearing of this motion the court, upon its clearly appearing that the sheriff was in error as to the date, could have ordered the return to be amended in that particular, and in such case the default and judgment would have been set aside. That, however, was not clearly shown, and the motion was, therefore, based upon the mistake of the defendant. It was not questioned that the defendant in good faith believed that the service was made on the 25th instead of the 24th, and that he therefore believed that his appearance was in time. It was such a mistake as is clearly within the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which permits the court to grant relief, and which the spirit of the Code requires to be granted. Relief in such cases is said to be within the discretion of the court; but "the exercise of the mere discretion of the court ought to tend, in a reasonable degree at least, to bring about a judgment on the very merits of the case, and, where the circumstances are such as to lead the court to hesitate upon the motion to open the default, it is better, as a general rule, that the doubt should be resolved in favor of the application." Watson v. Railroad Co., 41 Cal. 17; Grady v. Donahoo, 108 Cal. 211, 41 Pac. 41. "The Code establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates, and its provisions and all proceedings under it are to be liberally construed, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice." Code Civ. Proc. § 4. In Bailey v. Taaffe, 29 Cal. 424, cited by respondent to the effect that such orders "rest very much in the discretion of the court below, and will not be disturbed by this court unless we are satisfied that the order is so plainly erroneous as to amount to an abuse of discretion," the court also said: "It is not a mental discretion to be exercised ex gratia, but a legal discretion to be exercised in conformity with the spirit of the law, and in a manner to subserve and not to impede or defeat the ends of substantial justice. In a plain case this discretion has no office to perform, and its exercise is limited to doubtful cases where an impartial mind hesitates." The order refusing to set aside the judgment and default should be reversed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order refusing to set aside the judgment and default is reversed.

POLEDORI et al. v. NEWMAN et al. (S. F. 604.)

REFORMATION OF DEED—PLEADING—RELIEF—APPEAL—PRESUMPTION TO SUPPORT JUDGMENT.

1. In a suit to correct a defective certificate of acknowledgment to a deed, the court may, under its authority to grant "any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint, and embraced within the issue" (Code Civ. Proc. § 580), correct defects in the certificate other than that specified in the complaint, if evidence thereof is introduced without objection.

2. On appeal on the judgment roll alone, it will be assumed in support of the judgment that all objections to evidence sustaining the findings were waived.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

George D. Collins, for appellants. A. Comte, Jr., and Freeman & Bates, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought, under the provisions of section 1202, Civ. Code, to correct a defective certificate of the acknowledgment of a deed of conveyance made by a married woman. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, and the present appeal is taken directly from the judgment, upon the judgment roll alone, without any bill of exceptions. The ground of the appeal is that in the findings and judgment the court went beyond the issues in the case, and corrected the certificate in particulars not alleged in the complaint. The complaint sets forth the conveyance and its proper acknowledgment to the notary, and alleges that the notary, in affixing his certificate, omitted to certify therein "that, upon examination without the hearing of her husband, he had made her acquainted with the contents of the said deed, but used for his acknowledgment a blank form appropriate to cases certifying the acknowledgment of a deed made by an unmarried woman." Issue was taken by the defendants upon the several averments in the complaint, and the court found that the deed was properly executed and acknowledged, but that the notary, in affixing his certificate, "omitted to certify therein that, upon examination without the hearing of her husband, the said notary had made her acquainted with the contents of the said deed, and that, thereupon, she acknowledged to him that she executed the same and that she did not wish to retract said execution." The particular point urged on this appeal is that, as the complaint did not aver that the grantor in the deed acknowledged to the notary "that she did not wish to retract her execution of the deed," the court was not authorized to correct the certificate in that respect. Section 580, Code Civ. Proc., authorizes a court, when an answer to the complaint has been filed, to grant to the plaintiff "any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint, and embraced within the issue." The "case" made by the complaint herein, as well as the issue between the parties, is the right of the plaintiffs to have the defective certificate of acknowledgment corrected, and the relief granted by the court was "consistent" therewith. The failure to allege all the particulars in which the defect consisted might have been a ground for refusing to admit evidence of defects other than those alleged, but did not prevent the parties from consenting to have such defects considered by the court. Upon a direct appeal from the judgment, upon the judgment roll alone, it will be assumed in support of the judgment that all objections to evidence in support of the findings were waived. If objection to the introduction of any evidence had been made upon the ground that the defect to which it related was not alleged in the complaint, the court would have permitted the plaintiffs to amend their complaint. Parties will not be permitted to lie by and keep silent when evidence is offered, and, after the court has rendered its judgment, object thereto upon the ground that the evidence sustaining it was inadmissible under the issues presented by the pleadings. The judgment is affirmed.

EMBEZZLEMENT—INDICTMENT—EVIDENCE—TESTIFYING BEFORE GRAND JURY—FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE.

1. An indictment of a guardian for embezzlement, substantially in the language of Pen. Code, § 506, declaring that "every trustee * * * intrusted with or having in his control property for the use of any other person, who fraudulently appropriates it to any use or purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his trust, * * * is guilty of embezzlement," is sufficient; it being unnecessary to allege the date of his appointment as guardian, the court appointing him, etc.

2. A person who appears before a grand jury considering a charge against him need not be informed by any member thereof of his right to counsel before testifying.

3. Name of person indicted need not be indorsed on the indictment as witness, though he testified before the grand jury.

4. A conviction of a guardian of an insane person for embezzlement is not sustained by evidence merely that he drew the ward's money out of the bank, and that he did not make payment, as ordered by court, to the asylum where the ward was confined.

5. Recital in an order removing a guardian of an insane person, "It appearing to the satisfaction of the court that said P. [the guardian] has appropriated to his own use the funds of the said insane person, and that he has rendered no account thereof," is not evidence against him on indictment for embezzlement, being mere hearsay.

6. That defendant does not testify in his own behalf cannot be considered by an appellate court on the question of sufficiency of the evidence to justify conviction.

7. Arrest of one outside the state does not of itself show that he was a fugitive from justice.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William J. Wallace, Judge.

James D. Page was convicted of embezzlement, and appeals. Reversed.

J. N. E. Wilson and Alex. Campbell, Jr., for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and C. N. Post, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

BELCHER, C. The defendant was convicted of the crime of embezzlement, and has appealed from the order denying his motion for a new trial, and from the final judgment entered against him. The indictment was filed May 29, 1895, and, after stating the jurisdictional facts, it charged that on or about the 28th day of May, 1895, the defendant, "being then and there intrusted with and having in his control the sum of four thousand three hundred and sixty-two dollars, in lawful money of the United States, * * * as guardian, trustee, and agent of one Louis Lichtneger, an insane person, for the use and benefit of said Louis Lichtneger, then and there the property of and belonging to said Louis Lichtneger, did then and there, to wit, at said city and county of San Francisco, on or about said 28th day of May, 1895, willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and fraudulently embezzle, convert, and appropriate the same to his own use, contrary," etc. When called upon to plead, defendant moved the court to set aside the indictment upon the grounds (1) that the said indictment was not found, indorsed, nor presented as prescribed in the Penal Code; (2) that the names of the witnesses examined before the grand jury, or whose depositions were read before the grand jury, were not inserted at the foot of the indictment, nor indorsed thereon; (3) that a person not a member of the grand jury, nor judge of the court, nor the district attorney was permitted to be present during the session of the grand jury, and when the charge embraced in the indictment was under consideration, contrary to the provisions of section 925 of the Penal Code. The motion was denied, and thereupon the defendant demurred to the indictment upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant then pleaded "Not guilty."

1. The indictment was found by a properly impaneled grand jury, and, in our opinion, was sufficient in form. It was drawn substantially in the language of section 506 of the Penal Code, which declares that "every trustee * * * intrusted with or having in his control property for the use of any other person, who fraudulently appropriates it to any use or purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his trust, * * * is guilty of embezzlement." The defendant was a trustee of his ward (Civ. Code, § 250), and, under the provisions of the section above quoted, the indictment was authorized and found. Indictments framed in the language of the statute defining the offense charged have been held sufficient so many times by this court that we deem it unnecessary to cite the cases. It is true that an indictment must contain "a statement of the acts constituting the offense, in ordinary and concise language, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended." Pen. Code, § 950. The indictment here was sufficient to meet the requirements of the statute, and it was not necessary, as claimed for appellant, to allege the date of his "appointment as guardian, and in what court appointed, as well as the issue of letters of guardianship to him, and the fact of his taking possession of certain moneys of his ward; the fact of his filing his account, and the settlement thereof; the fact that he was incapable of discharging his trust, or unsuitable therefor, or had wasted or mismanaged the estate, and that the court, upon due notice given, had removed him, and had demanded that he should surrender the estate of his ward to the person found to be lawfully entitled thereto."

2. "The grand jury is not bound to hear evidence for the defendant, but it is their duty to weigh all the evidence submitted to them, and, when they have reason to believe that other evidence within their reach will explain away the charge, they should order such evidence to be produced." Pen. Code, § 920. It is shown that the defendant "appeared as a witness before the grand jury finding the aforesaid indictment, and testified before said body, he not then and there being informed of his legal rights as a defendant witness, and that his name as such witness does not appear among the names of witnesses upon said indictment." It is not shown, however, and there is nothing in the record to indicate, that he did not voluntarily appear before the grand jury and voluntarily give all the evidence elicited from him. In People v. King, 28 Cal. 273, it is said: "So far as the motion was based upon the ground that the defendant had testified against himself before the grand jury is concerned, it is only necessary to say that we know of no rule of law which made it illegal for him to testify, if he felt inclined to do so, nor do we know of any rule of law which makes the voluntary testimony of the defendant before the grand jury a ground for setting aside the indictment." And we may add that we know of no rule of law which made it the duty of the foreman or any member of the grand jury to inform the defendant of his right to consult counsel before testifying. Besides, the defendant was himself an attorney at law, and had served a term as district attorney of the city and county of San Francisco, and must be presumed to have known what his rights and privileges were as a witness. It is not claimed that any person not a member of the grand jury was present at the session when the charge embraced in the indictment was under consideration, except the defendant himself while he was being examined as a witness. It is true that the name of defendant, as a witness, was not inserted at the foot of the indictment, or indorsed thereon, but it was not necessary that it should be. In People v. Northey, 77 Cal. 618, 19 Pac. 865, and 20 Pac. 129, it was expressly decided that, if the defendant has testified before the grand jury, it is not necessary to indorse his name upon the indictment as a witness, and the failure to do so is not ground of motion to set aside the indictment. It follows that the court did not err in refusing to set aside the indictment, or in overruling the demurrer.

3. The most serious question in the case is that relating to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. The facts proved were as follows: On January 3, 1891, the defendant, who was then the district attorney of the city and county of San Francisco, was duly appointed guardian of the estate of Louis Lichtneger, an insane person, and, upon giving the bond required by the court, letters of guardianship were duly issued to him. On April 4, 1891, an order was made by the court that he file his account. This order was not complied with until May 4, 1894, when he filed an account showing that of the money received by him as guardian he paid in June, 1892, to the asylum at Agnews, $190, and had a balance due the estate of $3,776.92. When defendant was appointed guardian there was on deposit in the German Savings & Loan Society of San Francisco, to the credit of Lichtneger, the sum of $3,561.01. Of this sum and the interest that accumulated thereon, defendant, as guardian, drew out of the bank from time to time all but $51; the first draft, for $353, being made on April 24, 1891, and the last, for $49.27, being made on September 7, 1892. On June 12, 1894, Judge Levy, in whose department of the superior court the matter of the estate was pending, and who had made all the orders before mentioned, made an order that defendant pay $475 to the superintendent of the asylum at Agnews, that amount having been found due for the care of Lichtneger. The money not being paid as ordered, an attachment was issued on July 3, 1894, but returned unserved; and again an attachment was issued on August 15, 1894, which was also returned unserved, and nothing more was done in the matter during that year. Judge Levy testified: "I do not know what Mr. Page's reasons were for not paying the money as ordered." But immediately following, and in this connection, one Hufschmidt testified that he had been in the habit of visiting the asylum about once in every six weeks; that he met Lichtneger there, and "during the first part of the time that I have seen him there he was in the pay ward, but the latter part of the time he was in the pauper ward." In January, 1895, Judge Levy's term of office expired, and Judge Slack succeeded him. Nothing appears to have been done in the matter of the said estate until May 2, 1895, when an order was made requiring the defendant to appear on the next day and show cause why he should not file his account. A citation was issued, and returned unserved. On May 3d another order was made, fixing May 10th as the time the defendant should appear and show cause why he should not be removed from his office of guardian. A citation was again issued and returned showing "guardian could not be found." The court then caused a citation to be published, fixing May 20th as the time when the defendant should show cause why he should not be removed from his office of trust. After the publication of the citation the defendant called upon the judge at his chambers, and requested that the hearing of the matter might be postponed until May 27th, and the request was granted. On May 27th he again called, and requested a further continuance until the next day, which continuance was also granted. On May 28th defendant did not appear, and an order was then made removing him as guardian of the said estate. "No other order was made, and no person was appointed guardian in his place and stead, and no demand was made upon him for the moneys and goods in his possession and belonging to the said estate of Louis Lichtneger." The minute order of removal containing the recital, "and it appearing to the satisfaction of the court that said Page has appropriated to his own use the funds of the said insane person, and that he has rendered no account thereof," was next introduced in evidence, against the objection of defendant that it was immaterial, irrelevant, incompetent, and hearsay. In January, 1896, defendant was arrested in the city of New York, and he stated at the time to the officer arresting him "that he was anxious to return to stand his trial for the offense of which he was accused." The above is, in substance, all the evidence introduced by the prosecution, and at the conclusion of it the defendant, by his counsel, moved the court to instruct the jury to acquit "upon the ground that the facts proven by the prosecution were not sufficient to establish the guilt of the defendant of embezzlement; that there was nothing in the proof to show that Mr. Page had fraudulently misappropriated any of his ward's money or property; that no demand had ever been made upon him for the money or property of his ward; and that no person had ever been designated by any court, or by any person in authority, to whom the defendant, Mr. Page, could have delivered the money or property of his ward." The court overruled the motion, and thereupon the case was submitted without further testimony. It is very evident that the recital above quoted from the order removing defendant from the position of guardian did not constitute any evidence tending to support the charge of embezzlement. At most, it was mere hearsay, and Judge Slack, who made the order and was on the stand as a witness, was not asked, and did not attempt to state, upon what ground the recital was based. It must therefore be entirely disregarded. Leaving out this recital, it will be observed that there was no evidence showing that defendant ever spent, wasted, or appropriated to his own use, any of the money of his ward. It is true, he drew out from the savings and loan society most of the money which was on deposit there to the credit of Lichtneger; but this was not a criminal act, and did not show a criminal intent to misappropriate the money. He may have intended to deposit the money in some other bank, or to invest it in safe securities. The cashier of the savings and loan society, who testified to the withdrawal, stated: "I do not know what Mr. Page did with the money which he withdrew. He may have deposited it in some other bank, or some safe-deposit box." So far as appears, the defendant at the time of the trial may have still had all the money ready to be paid over on demand to any one authorized to receive it. The fact that he did not pay to the insane asylum the $475, ordered to be paid by Judge Levy does not tend to show a misappropriation of that money. He may have believed that Lichtneger was in the "pauper ward," and that the asylum was not entitled to demand pay for keeping and caring for him.

It is urged for respondent that, while "the fact that a defendant does not take the witness stand on his own behalf cannot be taken against him by the jury, yet it is, in our judgment, a fact that should be taken into consideration by this court on the point of the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict." We do not think so. A person accused of crime is presumed to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty, and facts and circumstances which cannot be considered by the trial court or the jury in determining as to the guilt or innocence of the accused cannot be resorted to in this court to support a verdict not otherwise authorized.

Again, it is urged that the defendant, when arrested, was a fugitive from justice, and that this is a circumstance which may be considered in determining as to his guilt. But it does not appear that he was a fugitive from justice. There is nothing in the record to show when or under what circumstances he left San Francisco and went to New York. He may, so far as the evidence shows, have gone on a business or pleasure trip, and have been intending soon to return. In People v. Royce, 106 Cal. 173, 37 Pac. 630, and 39 Pac. 524, the defendant was the treasurer of the Veterans' Home Association, a corporation, and was charged with the embezzlement of the balance of a draft received by him, amounting to about $2,050. He was convicted, and on appeal the judgment was reversed by this court, sitting in bank, upon the ground that the verdict was not justified by the evidence. The court said: "What became of this balance does not appear. Appellant may have had it ready to be produced whenever called for. * * * The by-laws also provide that all moneys in the hands of the treasurer should be turned over to his successor in office, but it does not appear that appellant ever had a successor in office. * * * There is no evidence that any demand was ever made upon appellant for said money by the association, or by any officer or agent thereof, or by any other person. * * * He may have had the money all that time, ready to respond to any demand of the association." If the verdict in that case was not justified by the evidence, it is quite clear that it was not in this. We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PEOPLE v. WICKHAM. (Cr. 220.)

FORMER JEOPARDY—EMBEZZLEMENT—WHEN A FELONY.

1. A plea of former jeopardy is not supported by proof that a former conviction of defendant for the same offense was reversed, and the prosecution dismissed, on the ground that the information was not filed within the time prescribed by statute after defendant's commitment.

2. Under Pen. Code, § 514, providing that "every person guilty of embezzlement is punishable in the manner prescribed for feloniously stealing property of the value of that embezzled," the embezzlement of a horse is a felony without regard to its value; the stealing of a horse being grand larceny, by the terms of the statute.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Ed. Wickham was convicted of embezzlement of a horse, and appeals. Affirmed.

W. F. Aram, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and W. H. Anderson, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. Defendant was convicted of the embezzlement of a horse of the value of $40, and appeals from the judgment.

It is claimed that the trial court committed error in refusing the admission of certain evidence offered upon the plea of "once in jeopardy." This evidence showed that defendant had been previously convicted of the offense for which he was then upon trial; that he had appealed to this court from such conviction, upon the ground that the information had not been filed within 30 days after he had been committed by the examining magistrate; that a motion to dismiss the prosecution upon that ground had been theretofore denied by the trial court; that the judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded by this court, with directions "to dismiss the prosecution unless upon a further hearing good cause was shown for the failure to file the information within the time prescribed by the statute"; that thereafter the prosecution was dismissed, in pursuance of the order of this court, no good cause to the contrary being shown; and that thereafter a new information was filed.

and this present prosecution based thereon. The facts above set forth are insufficient to establish the plea of once in jeopardy upon the second trial. When this case went back to the trial court (People v. Wickham, 113 Cal. 283, 48 Pac. 123), if that court, upon good cause shown, had denied the motion to dismiss the prosecution, and had proceeded to again try the defendant upon the same information, certainly no jeopardy in his favor would have existed to bar a second conviction; and the fact that the prosecution was dismissed rather than proceeded with does not alter the case. In all essentials People v. Schmidt, 64 Cal. 260, 30 Pac. 814, covers the present case; and, upon the legal principles there declared, defendant's contention in this respect is without merit.

2. It is claimed that the court erred in rendering judgment that defendant be imprisoned in the state prison, it appearing from the verdict of the jury that the value of the property embezzled was only $40. This contention involves the construction to be given section 514 of the Penal Code, which provides: "Every person guilty of embezzlement is punishable in the manner prescribed for feloniously stealing property of the value of that embezzled." This section has been construed in People v. Leehey, 4 Pac. Coast Law J. 75, and also in People v. Salorse, 62 Cal. 139; and, upon the authority of those cases, we hold that the defendant has been convicted of a felony. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

CLOUGH v. BORELLO et al. (Sac. 243.)

APPOINTMENT OF ADMINISTRATORS—FRIVOLOUS APPEAL.

An appeal by a public administrator from an order denying his petition for letters on decedent's estate, and granting those of guardians of decedent's children, is frivolous; it not being contended that the guardians were not entitled to administer if the children were legitimate, and his petition having alleged that they were decedent's children and "heirs at law," and there being no evidence in the record of illegitimacy.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Merced county; E. W. Risley, Judge.

Petitions by A. G. Clough, Frank M. Borello, and N. P. Justy for letters of administration on the estate of Giovanni Galliano, deceased. From an order denying the petition of Clough, and granting those of the others, he appeals. Affirmed.

T. C. Law, for appellant. J. W. Knox and W. D. Crichton, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. In probate. A. G. Clough, public administrator in and for the county of Merced, petitioned the court for letters of administration upon the estate of Giovanni Galliano, deceased. Respondents Frank M. Borello, as the guardian of the person and estate of Charles C. Galliano, a minor son of the deceased, and N. P. Justy, as the guardian of the person and estate of James Frank Galliano, also a minor son of the deceased, each petitioned the court to be appointed as administrator of said estate, and also filed written opposition to the appointment of appellant. Abrana Galliano, as the surviving wife of said deceased, and mother of said children, also petitioned for letters of administration, but afterwards withdrew her petition, and requested the appointment of one or the other of the said guardians. The several petitions and contests were heard together, and resulted in the denial of appellant's petition, and the making of an order appointing both of the guardians of said minor children as administrators of said estate, and from that order the public administrator appeals.

The record contains a bill of exceptions which sets out the various petitions and oppositions above mentioned, the withdrawal and request of the widow, and the order appointing respondents as such administrators, but does not contain the testimony of any witness, or set out any of the evidence given upon the hearing. Appellant's brief, however, is largely devoted to the question of the legitimacy of said minor children, based, of course, upon the asserted nonmarriage of the deceased and the mother of said children, Abrana Galliano; but, as the record before us gives no hint of the asserted illegitimacy of these children, that question cannot be considered here. On the contrary, appellant's petition for appointment alleges that these are the children and "the heirs-at-law of said deceased," and it is not alleged that there are any other heirs.

The sole question, therefore, is whether the guardians of these minor heirs are entitled to administration in preference to the public administrator. Next to the surviving husband or wife, or some competent person whom he or she may request to have appointed, the children of the deceased are entitled to letters of administration (Code Civ. Proc. § 1365); and section 1368 (amended St. 1893, p. 52) provides as follows: "If any person entitled to administration is a minor or an incompetent person, letters must be granted to his or her guardian, or any other person entitled to letters of administration, in the discretion of the court." See, also, Estate of Wooten, 56 Cal. 326, and In re McLaughlin's Estate, 103 Cal. 429, 37 Pac. 410.

It is not contended on the part of appellant that said guardians were not entitled to administration if said children were legitimate, and, as appellant alleged their legitimacy by alleging that they were the children and "heirs at law of the deceased," the appeal is frivolous, and we recommend that the order appealed from be affirmed, with $100 damages, and costs of appeal.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BRITT, C.

GNEKOW v. CONFER et al. (Sac. 234.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—PERSONAL LIABILITY OF OWNER.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, providing that a building contract shall be void if not filed with plans and specifications, and that in such case the labor done and materials furnished by all persons except the contractor shall be deemed to have been done and furnished "at the personal instance of the owner," and that the persons furnishing them shall have a lien for their value, does not create a contractual relation between the owner and subcontractor, whereby the owner can be held personally liable for such work and materials, but merely affords an opportunity for a lien by complying with the statute.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Shasta county; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Action by E. L. Gnekow against Saul Confer, Jr., and W. E. Hanks (co-partners under the firm name of Confer & Hanks), and Masonic Building Association (a corporation). From a judgment in favor of the Masonic Building Association, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Kile & Plummer, J. J. Paulsell, and Thomas B. Dozier, for appellant. Clay W. Taylor and J. Chadbourne, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This action is brought to foreclose a mechanic's lien taken by plaintiff upon a building of the defendant the Masonic Building Association, to secure a balance of $756 due on account of material furnished and labor performed upon a building described as the "New Masonic Building," situate in Redding, county of Shasta, state of California. The other defendants, viz. Confer and Hanks, who were the original contractors for the construction of the building, made default. The defendant the Masonic Building Association had judgment, upon the ground that the lien of plaintiff was not filed within the time prescribed by the statute, viz. within 30 days after the completion of the building. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and the cause is presented on the judgment roll.

Appellant acquiesces in the judgment refusing to enforce his lien, but insists that upon the findings he was entitled to a personal judgment against the corporation defendant for $756, the amount of his claim. The findings show in substance as follows: (1) In the month of July, 1891, the corporation defendant entered into a contract with Saul Confer and W. E. Hanks, by which the latter agreed for $25,000 to construct the new Masonic building or temple in the city of Redding, and work was commenced before the contract was recorded in the office of the county recorder, and is therefore void as against plaintiff. (2) About September 15, 1891, plaintiff entered into an agreement with Confer & Hanks to furnish tin for the roof of said building, gas, and water pipes, water-closets, sinks, soil pipes, etc., and to perform the labor of placing all of the material in place for $1,956. Plaintiff completed his contract, and was paid $1,200 on account thereof by the owner of the building, the corporation defendant. The residue of the findings relate to matters going to the validity of plaintiff's lien, but in no wise affecting the personal liability of the corporation defendant to plaintiff.

We think appellant's claim that he is entitled to a personal judgment against the corporation defendant cannot be upheld. Plaintiff was a subcontractor, who furnished material and performed labor on the building for Confer & Hanks, who were the original contractors, and plaintiff occupied no contractual relation with the owner of the building, unless it was created under section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, by a failure of the parties to record their building contract before work was commenced on the building. The effect of such failure is declared by section 1183, supra, to be that the contract shall be "wholly void, and no recovery shall be had thereon by either party thereto; and in such case the labor done and materials furnished by all persons aforesaid, except the contractor, shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." When the law, in the contingencies mentioned in section 1183, assumes that labor is performed and material furnished "at the personal instance of the owner," it is simply for the purposes of the liens which it is the object of the statute to afford to those who perform labor or furnish material for the construction of buildings, etc. To accomplish this object, the statute creates under the circumstances, by its own force and vigor, such a relation for a specific purpose, viz. to uphold a lien, as will effectuate that purpose. The statute does not, however, create or attempt to create a contractual relation between the owner and a subcontractor upon which a personal action will lie. This question was involved in McMenomy v. White (decided by this court Dec. 17, 1896) 47 Pac. 109, and it was said: "The owner, however, is not personally liable for labor done and materials furnished at the instance of the contractor, even though the contract be void, for the reason stated, the only remedy against the owner in such case being a foreclosure of the liens." Lumber Co. v. Schmitt, 74 Cal. 625, 16 Pac. 516; Giant Powder Co. v. San Diego Flume Co., 78 Cal. 193, 20 Pac. 419; Lumber Co. v. Gottschalk, 81 Cal. 647, 22 Pac. 860; Wood v. Transit Co., 107 Cal. 502, 40 Pac. 806. A subcontractor may have a personal action against the original contractor, but, as against the owner of the property, his relief is confined to a lien upon the property, and to a foreclosure and sale as provided by the statute. The case of Morris v. Wilson, 97 Cal. 644, 32 Pac. 801, relied upon by appellant, was one in which the original contractors had entered into a contract with the defendant for the construction of a building. The contract was held void for want of filing, as required by section 1183, and that plaintiffs were not entitled to a lien, but were entitled to a personal judgment against defendant, the owner of the building. The personal liability there was based upon the contractual relation between the parties, which does not exist here as between the plaintiff and the corporation. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

CARTER v. LOS ANGELES NAT. BANK (WILLIAM DEERING & CO., Intervener. L. A. 179).

ACTION AGAINST GARNISHEE—COMPLAINT—NECESSITY OF ORDER TO GARNISHEE TO APPEAR—LIMITATIONS.

1. Plaintiff recovered judgment against his debtor after having garnished defendant, who, at the time of garnishment, held, as collateral, notes due to the debtor. Defendant thereafter collected on the notes more than enough to satisfy his debt. Plaintiff's execution was returned unsatisfied in part, and he sued to have the amount unpaid satisfied out of the surplus in defendant's hands. Held, that his complaint need not show an order requiring defendant to appear and answer, or an order authorizing action against the garnishee, under Code Civ. Proc. § 720, since section 544 makes the garnishee directly liable to the attaching creditor until the attachment is discharged or the creditor's judgment is satisfied.

2. A garnishee may plead the statute of limitations, if he is entitled to the plea as against the principal defendant, but the statute does not run in his favor as to the liability created by the garnishment itself.

Action by F. A. Carter against the Los Angeles National Bank. William Deering & Co. intervened. From a judgment for plaintiff, intervener appeals. Affirmed.

Carver & Preston, for appellant. H. A. Barclay, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. Plaintiff brought suit against the Richardson-Kimball Company, garnished the defendant on attachment, and afterwards recovered judgment against the Richardson-Kimball Company. An execution was issued against the Richardson-Kimball Company, upon which plaintiff realized a portion of his debt, but left $777.35 still due and unpaid. At the time the notice of garnishment was served, the defendant had in its possession certain notes due the Richardson-Kimball Company, which it held as collateral. Subsequent to the attachment, but prior to the bringing of this suit, defendant had collected upon the securities which it so held enough to satisfy its demand against the Richardson-Kimball Company, and $1,356.22 over and above its demand. Defendant answered, admitting such facts, and stating that other parties were asserting claims to the money in its hands, and asking that they be brought in, and that the court determine to whom the money should be paid. Thereafter the appellant intervened. The court held that plaintiff was entitled to the money. The appeal is from the judgment, without a bill of exceptions.

The sole point made on this appeal is that the complaint fails to state a cause of action (1) because the action is based upon a garnishment, under section 544 of the Code of Civil Procedure, without procuring an order requiring defendant—the garnishee—to appear and answer, and without any order authorizing an action against the garnishee under section 720 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and (2) defendant's liability under the garnishment is barred by the statute of limitations.

The first point cannot be sustained. The proceeding supplementary to execution is in the nature of an action in which definite relief may be had. In most states express provision is made for a trial and a judgment which shall conclude the rights of all parties, as in proceedings upon a creditors' bill. Nothing of that kind is provided for under the proceedings on attachment in this state. On the contrary, section 544 provides that the garnishee shall be directly liable to the attaching creditor "for the amount of such credits, property or debts, until the attachment is discharged or any judgment recovered by him be satisfied." This question was decided in Roberts v. Landecker, 9 Cal. 262. In all material respects, the practice act was identical with the Code. In that case it was averred that the garnishee had property belonging to the debtor at the time of the garnishment, but had fraudulently disposed of the same. A demurrer to the complaint was interposed upon the same ground as here, and the court, after stating the theory of the statute, said: "There is nothing in the chapter concerning attachments that refers to these sections, and nothing in the proceedings supplementary to the execution that properly applies to the peculiar circumstances of this case. The liability of the defendant commenced when the writs were served, and the measure of his responsibility depends upon the amount of property belonging to Hertzinger, and then in his possession and under his control. The plaintiffs, under the state of the case made by the complaint, are not seeking to enforce their lien upon the property itself, as that cannot be reached, having been disposed of to others. They are not seeking a discovery of the property and the subjection of it to their debt under a sheriff's sale. * * * The proceedings supplementary to the execution have another object in view. They seek to subject the property itself to sale under execution, or the debt to collection. Under the provisions of the two hundred and forty-first section, the plaintiff must satisfy the judge, by affidavit or otherwise, that the person has property of the execution debtor, or is indebted to him. The plaintiffs in this case could not make affidavit at the time they issued their execution that the garnishee then had property in his hands belonging to the execution debtor, because before that time the property had been disposed of to others. Nor could they state that Landecker was then indebted to Hertzinger, for the reason that Landecker's liability, under section 127, was direct to the plaintiffs. The chapter relating to the writ of attachment provided no specific remedy, and the remedy by proceedings supplementary could not reach the peculiar state of the case." Considerable stress is put in this opinion upon the fact that the garnishee had disposed of the property, and was sued for the value thereof. I see no grounds for any distinction, and, if there were any, the case in hand would be on all fours with that. Here the defendant had not retained the personal property which he held at the time the attachment was served. It had been converted into cash by the process of collection. This case was not overruled in Herrlich v. Kaufmann, 99 Cal. 271, 33 Pac. 857, but was recognized, and the distinction pointed out between the proceedings provided by sections 717 et seq. and under section 544 were approved. The proceedings provided for in sections 717 et seq. do not imply any notice of garnishment whatever. It is a special proceeding, which can only be inaugurated after execution has been issued and returned unsatisfied in whole or in part. It may be commenced by affidavit or other proof showing that any person has property of the judgment debtor. No showing is required to the effect that a notice of garnishment has been served upon such person. In section 715 it is provided that, where it is sought to subject such property to the levy of the execution, the same proceedings may be had as those provided after the return of the execution. This expressly refers to sections 717 et seq. This section also fails to provide, as in section 544, for a direct liability to the plaintiff in the attachment suit. This distinction is also pointed out in Herrlich v. Kaufmann, 99 Cal. 271, 33 Pac. 857. This being so, it is plain that no equitable circumstances need be shown to justify the suit. If, in giving the right, the statute has not also provided a remedy, an action at law will lie upon the liability created by the statute. Roberts v. Landecker, supra.

As to the statute of limitations, if the garnishee is entitled to the plea as against the defendant in the attachment suit, he can plead it. The liability created by the garnishment is never barred. Of course, the garnishee can plead any defense he would have against his creditor, and also that the attaching creditor's debt has been satisfied, or that he failed to recover judgment, or that it has been reversed or has been barred. These last defenses might also have been made by the intervener. But the liability which arises from the attachment, as something entirely distinct from these, is not barred. The judgment is affirmed.

HIBERNIA SAVINGS & LOAN SOC. v. MATTHAI. (S. F. 528.)

RECORD ON APPEAL—SHOWING AS TO SERVICE OF SUMMONS — SUPPLYING DEFECT — SUBSTITUTING COPY—DEFAULT JUDGMENT—ENTRY BY COURT—PROOF OF SERVICE—AMENDMENT OF RECORD AFTER JUDGMENT.

1. Where the original summons, with proof of service, was lost from the files when the appeal was taken, but after the briefs were filed the court below ordered a copy substituted, and respondent, on suggesting a diminution of the record, filed a certified copy showing personal service on defendant, a contention in defendant's brief that the record did not show jurisdiction over him is untenable.

2. An order of court for the substitution of a copy of the summons and the indorsed proof of service, in place of the original, which had been lost from the files, is a determination that the copy is correct.

3. On failure of a defendant properly served to appear within the time allowed, the court may enter judgment against him without a prior formal entry of default by the clerk.

4. The court may enter judgment against a defendant who was properly served, but who did not appear in time, though the summons, with proof of service, had not been filed with the clerk.

5. Where the summons has been properly served, the record may be amended after judgment to show proof of service.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. Murphy, Judge.

Action by the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society against Mary Elizabeth Matthai. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Fowler, for appellant. Tobin & Tobin, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The appeal herein is from a judgment of foreclosure entered upon the default of the appellant. It is recited in the judgment that the defendants in the action were severally, personally, and duly served with the summons, together with a copy of the complaint; that the default of the appellant for not answering was duly entered; and that the cause came on regularly for trial by the court upon the complaint taken as confessed by her. The judgment roll, which is set out in the transcript as originally filed herein, did not contain a copy of the summons with proof of service upon the appellant; and it was contended by her in the briefs filed on her behalf that, by reason of the failure of the record to show that the court had acquired jurisdiction over her, the judgment must be reversed. At the time the appeal herein was taken, the original summons, with the proof of service thereof upon the appellant, had been lost from the files of the superior court; but afterwards that court, upon proof of the loss, authorized copies to be filed and used in place of the originals. Since the briefs herein were filed, the respondent, upon a suggestion of the diminution of the record, has filed herein a properly certified copy of the summons, with proof of service indorsed thereon, substituted as aforesaid, from which it appears that the appellant was personally served with the original summons issued herein, and a copy of the complaint, in the city and county of San Francisco, by the sheriff thereof, on the 28th of December, 1894. The points urged in support of the appeal have therefore been obviated, and it sufficiently appears from the record, as thus corrected, that the judgment against the appellant was properly entered.

The order of the superior court authorizing the copies to be filed was a determination by that tribunal that they were correct copies of the originals, and the papers thus substituted are entitled to the same weight as would be the originals. Knowlton v. Mackenzie, 110 Cal. 183, 42 Pac. 580. Upon the service of the summons, and the failure of the defendant to appear in the action within the time allowed therefor, the court acquired jurisdiction by reason of her default to enter a judgment against her, and it was not necessary that a formal default should have been previously entered by the clerk. Drake v. Duvenick, 45 Cal. 455. The court had jurisdiction to enter the judgment even though at the time the summons with proof of service had not been filed with the clerk. Herman v. Santee, 103 Cal. 519, 37 Pac. 509. (The ruling to the contrary in Reinhart v. Lugo, 86 Cal. 395, 24 Pac. 1089, was overruled in this case.) The court acquired jurisdiction of the appellant by the service of its process, and did not lose it by neglecting to make the proof of such service a matter of record. Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 600, 29 Pac. 220. And a subsequent amendment of the record by supplying this proof of service is as effective to support the judgment as if it had been filed before its entry. Freem. Judgm. § 89b; Allison v. Thomas, 72 Cal. 562, 14 Pac. 309; Perri v. Beaumont, 88 Cal. 108, 25 Pac. 1109; Herman v. Santee, 103 Cal. 519, 37 Pac. 509. The judgment is affirmed.

PEDLAR v. STROUD et al. (Sac. 286.)

APPEAL—NOTICE—DISMISSAL.

1. On the death of a judgment plaintiff the authority of his attorney ceases, and the service of a notice of appeal thereafter on him is of no effect.

2. Though proceedings taken for an appeal are ineffective to give the supreme court jurisdiction, where the records of the trial court show an appeal, the supreme court will order its dismissal to remove such apparent appeal.

3. Where judgment defendants unsuccessfully attempt to perfect an appeal after plaintiff's death and before any substitution is made in the trial court, the supreme court will not refuse to dismiss the appeal because there has been no substitution in such court, and the motion does not purport to be made on behalf of any interested party.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. R. Webb, Judge.

Action by one Pedlar against one Stroud and others, in which defendants appealed from the judgment. Motion to dismiss the appeal. Granted.

L. L. Cory and Jas. A. Burns, for appellants. Frank H. Short, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Judgment in this action in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants was rendered July 31, 1895, and entered August 7, 1895. July 6, 1896, the defendants Stroud filed with the clerk of the superior court and served upon Frank H. Short, who had been the attorney of record of the plaintiff, a notice of appeal from said judgment, and also from an order denying a new trial. The plaintiff in the cause died September 3, 1895. No substitution or order of substitution of the administrator or other personal representatives of the plaintiff was made in the cause, nor was any application made to the superior court for such substitution. A motion is now made to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that by reason of the death of the plaintiff before the appeal was taken this court is without jurisdiction over the same. Upon the death of the plaintiff the authority of Short as his attorney ceased, and the service of the notice of appeal thereafter upon him was ineffective to constitute an appeal, or in any respect affect the judgment that had been rendered. Judson v. Love, 35 Cal. 463; Shartzer v. Love, 40 Cal. 93; Sheldon v. Dalton, 57 Cal. 19. Although the proceedings taken by the defendants have been ineffective to give this court jurisdiction of the appeal, yet, as upon the face of the records of the case in the superior court an appeal has been taken, this court will order its dismissal for the purpose of removing such apparent appeal. Ditch Co. v. Bachtold, 109 Cal. 114, 41 Pac. 813. Neither is it a ground for denying the motion that there has been no substitution in this court of the personal representatives of the plaintiff, and that the motion does not purport to be made on behalf of any party interested in the judgment. An appeal of which this court has no jurisdiction will be dismissed of its own motion whenever its attention is drawn thereto. Bienenfeld v. Milling Co., 82 Cal. 425, 22 Pac. 1113. Lyons v. Roach, 72 Cal. 85, 13 Pac. 151, cited by appellant, does not hold a contrary doctrine. In that case the appeal had been perfected in the lifetime of the plaintiff, but he died before the transcript on appeal was filed in this court. A motion to dismiss the appeal for failure to file the transcript was served upon his attorneys of record before any substitution of his personal representatives had been made in the case, and was denied for the reason that by the death of the plaintiff the attorneys ceased to represent him in the cause, and this court had no jurisdiction over the personal representatives by which they would be bound by an order of dismissal. The court had jurisdiction of the appeal, but did not have jurisdiction of the motion, whereas in the present case the court has never acquired jurisdiction of the appeal. The motion is granted.

TIBBETS v. COHN et al. (S. F. 368.)

INSOLVENCY—ASSIGNEE AND RECEIVERS—ACTIONS.

St. 1891, p. 511, provides that the court shall in insolvency proceedings appoint the sheriff receiver to take charge of the estates of the insolvent, and to care for and dispose of the same until the appointment of an assignee, and that his powers shall in all respects be regulated by the general laws of the state applicable to receivers. Code Civ. Proc. § 568 (relating to receivers generally), provides that a receiver may sue and defend in his own name, take and keep possession of the property, receive rents, collect debts, compound for and compromise the same, make transfers, and do such acts respecting the property as the court may direct. Held, that a receiver appointed under the act of 1891 cannot sue for property transferred in contemplation of insolvency, but that the authority is vested solely in the assignee by the insolvency act (St. 1880, c. 87, § 21), which expressly authorizes him to recover from any person receiving a conveyance, gift, or payment from an insolvent contrary to the act.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by George A. Tibbets, receiver, against G. Cohn & Co. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, for appellants. Garber, Boalt & Bishop, and J. H. Ahern, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This action was brought to recover the value of certain property alleged to have been transferred to defendants within one month before the commencement of proceedings in insolvency, in violation of the insolvency act. In the complaint it is averred that on the 19th day of May, 1892, one Charles W. Pick, being insolvent, filed his petition alleging his insolvency, and praying to be discharged from his liabilities; that such proceedings were had that plaintiff was, on August 24, 1892, appointed receiver of the estate of said insolvent pending the election of an assignee. Facts are then alleged tending to show that, within one month before the commencement of said proceedings, the defendants, who were creditors of the insolvent, received a transfer of all the available assets of the insolvent, in payment of defendants' demand against the insolvent, and that Pick and the defendants well knew of the insolvency of Pick, and intended by said transfer thereby to prevent the property from coming into the possession of the assignee, etc. Before answering, the defendants demurred to the complaint, on the ground that the same does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. One of the defendants, G. Cohn, then answered, and the case was tried before a jury, which rendered a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal upon the judgment roll, without a bill of exceptions.

In 1891 section 63 of the insolvent act was repealed (St. 1891, p. 511), and section 6 amended so as to provide that the court shall make an order appointing the sheriff a receiver, to take charge and possession of all estate, etc., of the insolvent, and to keep and care for and dispose of the same until the appointment of an assignee, and that his powers shall in all respects be regulated by the general laws of the state applicable to receivers. Section 568, Code Civ. Proc., provides that a receiver have power, under control of the court, to bring and defend actions in his own name, to take and keep possession of the property, to receive rents, collect debts, to compound for and compromise the same, to make transfers, and to do such acts respecting the property as the court may direct.

The complaint discloses the fact that the plaintiff was not the sheriff of the county of Kern, in which the proceedings were pending, and the appellants therefore contend that the appointment was void. To this the plaintiff replies that the objection is not raised by a general demurrer. It is not that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, but that the plaintiff has not the legal capacity to sue. This objection must be taken by special demurrer or answer, and, if not so taken, is waived. Several cases are cited which seem to sustain this contention. Swamp Land Dist. v. Feck, 60 Cal. 403; Miller v. Luco, 80 Cal. 257, 22 Pac. 195; Wilhoit v. Cunningham, 87 Cal. 453, 25 Pac. 675. The view taken of this case, however, renders it unnecessary to definitely pass upon this question. If, conceding the validity of the appointment of plaintiff as receiver, the action is one that he could not maintain, the objection would not be to his capacity to sue as receiver, but that, being receiver, the complaint fails to show a cause of action in him. Our statute gives no further definition of the office of receiver, or statement of his powers and functions, than above recited. Section 6 of the insolvency act defines his duties to be to take into his possession the assets of the insolvent, and to care for them until the appointment of an assignee. The reference to the general laws of the state applicable to receivers must be to section 568, Code Civ. Proc., from which no further powers could be derived, save that he may sue and be sued in his own name, collect debts, and do such acts respecting the property as the court may direct. This language would not authorize him to bring suits not connected with his receivership, and necessary to enable him to perform its functions. The appointment of a receiver pendente lite does not change the title to property, and, in the absence of a statute to that effect, would not authorize the receiver to sue in his own name for property which has not come to his possession. His possession is only temporary, and for the purpose of preserving the property, that it may be subjected to the operation of the judgment which shall finally be entered. The purpose of the statute in the appointment is clearly stated in section 6. The actions which he can bring must be those which enable him to get and retain possession of the "estate, real and personal, of the debtor." He is not even to retain possession until the final judgment, but to deliver all to the assignee, who may be appointed at any time not less than 30 days after the adjudication. The powers of the assignee are defined in section 21 of the act. He is expressly authorized to recover from any person receiving a conveyance, gift, transfer, payment, or assignment, made contrary to any provision of the act, the property thereby transferred or assigned, or, in case a redelivery of the property cannot be had, to recover the value thereof, with damages. The property which can be thus recovered constituted no part of the estate of the insolvent, and the receiver is not authorized or directed to take charge of it, or given a right of action for its recovery.

Even the creditors had no right of action against the defendants in respect to the property here involved. On the contrary, if the assignment had not been made in the insolvency proceeding, and until it is made, the defendants were rightfully in possession of the property, for aught that appears, as owners. The debtor had the right to make the preference, unless it was done in contemplation of insolvency, and for the purposes mentioned in section 55 of the act, and even then the validity of the transfer could only be called in question by the assignee. The right of action is created by the act, and the assignee expressly authorized to sue. This right of action certainly was not in the insolvent, and ordinarily receivers can assert no rights which the owner could not have asserted to property. The exceptions are cases especially provided for by statute, or the rules of equity, in which the receiver is authorized to sue in the interest of creditors. Many such cases are cited by the respondent, but all of those were under special statutory provisions. Most are cases where the receiver was appointed in proceedings supplementary to execution, to discover and subject to execution concealed assets. In those cases it was held that, by virtue of the statute, the title of the debtor was vested in the receiver. As a rule, however, the receiver cannot sue to recover property which has not come to his possession, or which, being in the possession of the defendant, ought to have been delivered to him. He cannot maintain trover for property of the insolvent converted before the adjudication, nor to recover property transferred by the debtor in fraud of creditors. Lansing v. Manton, 14 N. B. R. 127, Fed. Cas. No. 8,077; Sutherland v. Davis, 10 N. B. R. 424; In re Steadman, 8 N. B. R. 319, Fed. Cas. No. 13,330; Francisco v. Aguirre, 94 Cal. 180, 29 Pac. 495. His appointment is intended to have the effect of a preliminary injunction to preserve the property. High, Rec., § 5.

It does not appear that there was any order of the court directing or authorizing the suit. The case of Adams v. Woods, 15 Cal. 207, has no reference to anything involved here. No question was there raised whether the suit was rightfully brought, and the suit was not to recover property fraudulently transferred by the debtor. In Re Real Estate Associates, 58 Cal. 356, it was only decided that, pending an appeal from the order of adjudication, the functions of the receiver are not suspended. Any suits which he could have maintained if the appeal had not been taken he may still maintain. The case of Ex parte Hollis, 59 Cal. 405, is not authority for the respondent. It was held that a person having property which he claimed adversely to the insolvent could not be required to deliver it to a receiver, and punished for contempt if he refused. The court should direct an action to be brought by the receiver or assignee. Even if such an action could have been brought by the receiver, it would not cover this case. There the right of action was in the insolvent. Here it is not. Dennery v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 7, 24 Pac. 147, goes no further than the case of In re Real Estate Associates, supra. No doubt, the receiver can maintain all actions necessary to preserve the property which constituted the estate of the insolvent. This falls far short of the exigencies of respondent in the present case. A right of action is created by the act, and the assignee expressly authorized to bring the suit. Can this action be instituted by a receiver whose functions are expressly limited to preserving the property until an assignee is appointed, which may be done in 30 days? I think not. First, because such action is not within the scope of the receiver's powers and duties; and, second, because the right is expressly conferred upon the assignee, and does not exist until his appointment.

Respondent's counsel seem a little forgetful as to the record. It contains no Exhibit B, showing what allegations were in the petition, but the complaint does show that there were no petitioning creditors. The record does not show that the receiver became also the assignee. If appointed after the suit was commenced, however, that would make no difference. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

PEOPLE v. TRUCKEE LUMBER CO.

(Sac. 209.)

Public Nuisance—Action to Enjoin—Sufficiency of Complaint.

1. In an action to enjoin a nuisance, the complaint alleged that defendant operated a mill on a river which was stocked with fish; that it placed deleterious refuse in such stream, which poisoned the waters, thereby killing the fish; that such acts were a public nuisance; and that defendant, unless restrained, would continue such wrongful acts. Held, that the complaint stated a cause of action under Civ. Code, §§ 3479, 3480, declaring an obstruction to the free use of property by a neighborhood a public nuisance.

2. The fact that a public nuisance is made punishable as a misdemeanor is not a bar to a suit to enjoin it.

3. The attorney general can maintain, on his own information, a bill to enjoin a public nuisance, without the intervention of a private relator.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; John Caldwell, Judge.

Action by the people of the state of California, on the information of the attorney general, against the Truckee Lumber Company, for an injunction. From an order refusing to vacate a preliminary injunction, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. F. McGlashan and Thos. S. Ford, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and Henry E. Carter, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

VAN FLEET, J. The action is in the name of the people, on the information of the attorney general, to restrain the commission of an alleged nuisance, the complaint alleging, in substance, that defendant, a corporation, maintains and operates a sawmill and box factory on the bank of the Truckee river, at the town of Truckee, in this state, in which it cuts and manufactures lumber and boxes; that said river is a fresh-water stream, having its source in the state of California and flowing into the state of Nevada, and is now, and for a long time prior hereto has been, stocked with fish; that defendant, in operating its mill and factory, has heretofore and does now place and allow to pass into the waters of said river large quantities of refuse matter, consisting of sawdust, shavings, slabs, edgings, waste, and other deleterious substances, the effect of which has been and is to pollute said stream and the waters thereof, and render the same unfit for use, and which substances are poisonous and deleterious to the fish in said stream, and are killing, destroying, and exterminating them, all of which is alleged to be in violation of the rights of the people, and a public nuisance; that defendant threatens to, and, unless restrained, will, continue to commit said wrongful acts, to plaintiff's irreparable injury. A preliminary injunction was granted ex parte on the filing of the complaint, which defendant subsequently moved to vacate. The motion was made upon the complaint alone, based upon the objection that the facts alleged made no case for relief. The motion being denied, this appeal ensued.

The sole question is whether the complaint states a cause of action, and this is to be determined precisely as if the pleading were subjected to a general demurrer.

The first point made against the complaint is that the facts alleged do not constitute a public nuisance, within the definition of our Code. But this objection would seem to overlook the most material feature of the complaint. It is alleged that the acts of defendant have the effect of polluting and poisoning the waters of the river, and thereby killing and destroying the fish therein. Anything which is "an obstruction to the free use of property so as to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of life or property by an entire community or neighborhood, or any considerable number of persons," is a public nuisance. Pen. Code, § 370; Civ. Code, §§ 3479, 3480. The fish within our waters constitute the most important constituent of that species of property commonly designated as wild game, the general right and ownership of which is in the people of the state (Ex parte Maier, 103 Cal. 476, 483, 37 Pac. 402), as in England it was in the king; and the right and power to protect and preserve such property for the common use and benefit is one of the recognized prerogatives of the sovereign, coming to us from the common law, and preserved and expressly provided for by the statutes of this and every other state of the Union. The complaint shows that, by the repeated and continuing acts of defendant, this public property right is being, and will continue to be, greatly interfered with and impaired; and that such acts constitute a nuisance, both under our statute and at common law, is not open to serious question. People v. Elk River Mill & Lumber Co., 107 Cal. 219, 40 Pac. 486. But defendant urges that the facts do not show the infringement of any public right; that the right, if any, shown to be interfered with, is solely that of fishery, or the privilege to take fish; that this is a public right only so far as it pertains to navigable waters, while, as to all other waters, it is exclusively in the riparian proprietor; that, as the Truckee river is not a navigable stream, the destruction of the fish therein is not an injury to the public for which the people can complain, there being no allegation that the riparian proprietors thereon have been injured. In the first place, the common right to take fish extends not alone to navigable waters, but exists as to all waters the lands underlying which are not in private ownership,—in other words, to all lakes, ponds, or streams, navigable or otherwise, upon the public lands of this state or the United States not protected by reservation; and, since there is no averment that the lands along the Truckee river are held in private proprietorship, we think the presumption must be that the title remains in the government. But, in the next place, if this is not the presumption the case would not be different. The dominion of the state, for the purposes of protecting its sovereign rights in the fish within its waters, and their preservation for the common enjoyment of its citizens, is not confined within the narrow limits suggested by defendant's argument. It is not restricted to their protection only when found within what may in strictness be held to be navigable or otherwise public waters. It extends to all waters within the state, public or private, wherein these animals are habited or accustomed to resort for spawning or other purposes, and through which they have freedom of passage to and from the public fishing grounds of the state. To the extent that waters are the common passageway for fish, although flowing over lands entirely subject to private ownership, they are deemed for such purposes public waters, and subject to all laws of the state regulating the right of fishery. Cottrill v. Myrick, 12 Me. 222; State v. Franklin Falls Co., 49 N. H. 240; State v. Roberts, 59 N. H. 256, 484.

For the purposes of the right involved in this action, then, the Truckee river, so far as it flows within this state, is a part of the waters to which the jurisdiction of the state in the protection of its fish supply extends. This court will take judicial cognizance of the fact that the river has its source in Lake Tahoe, a large navigable body of water lying partly in this state, and that it flows thence into the state of Nevada, and empties into Pyramid lake, also navigable; and the court may also take notice of a fact so common and notorious that between these two bodies of water the river affords, and has from time immemorial, a natural and free highway for the passage of the fish inhabiting these lakes. Even, therefore, if, as contended by defendant, the lands through which the stream flows are to be presumed, in the absence of contrary averment, to be owned in private proprietorship, it can make no difference as to the right here asserted. While the right of fishery upon his own land is exclusively in the riparian proprietor, this does not imply or carry the right to destroy what he does not take. He does not own the fish in the stream. His right of property attaches only to those he reduces to actual possession, and he cannot lawfully kill or obstruct the free passage of those not taken. "This right in the owner of the land must be regarded as qualified to a certain extent by the universal principle that all property is held subject to those general regulations which are necessary to the common good and general welfare, and to that extent it is subject to legislative control. It is a well-established principle that every person shall so use and enjoy his own property, however absolute and unqualified his title, that his use of it shall not be injurious to the equal enjoyment of others having an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor injurious to the rights of the public. Hence, while the riparian owner has the exclusive right of fishery upon his own land, he must so exercise that right as not to injure others in the enjoyment of a similar right upon their lands upon the stream above and below." State v. Roberts, 59 N. H. 256. The mere fact, therefore, that the interference or obstruction complained of may in fact be in a stream where the right of fishery is exclusively in private riparian owners, does not make the acts here complained of any less an invasion of the public right, nor prevent the state from protecting its general interest in the property.

The fact that acts of the character alleged are by the Penal Code made a misdemeanor, and punishable as such, does not make them less a nuisance, nor imply that the legislature intended to make the criminal remedy exclusive of the civil. Nor is there anything in the objection that the attorney general is not privileged to maintain the action upon his own information, without the intervention of a private relator. People v. Davidson, 30 Cal. 388; People v. Stratton, 25 Cal. 242; People v. Gold Run Ditch & Mining Co., 66 Cal. 138, 4 Pac. 1152.

The other objections made do not call for particular notice. Order affirmed.

BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS—BY-LAWS—VALIDITY.

1. A corporation for the purpose of dealing in real estate and carrying on any kind of real-estate business, in which natural persons may engage, is not a land and building corporation authorized to be organized by Code, § 639, providing for corporations organized for improvements on real property.

2. A by-law of a corporation providing for surrender of stock and withdrawal by giving notice, and for payment of surrender value, is illegal, under Civ. Code, § 309, forbidding the withdrawal by stockholders of any part of the capital stock except on dissolution.

3. Under Civ. Code, § 301, providing for the adoption of by-laws after organization of a corporation, a copy of by-laws prepared and signed by the stockholders before organization is invalid.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by one Vercoutere against the Golden State Land Company. Judgment for defendant on its counterclaim. Order for new trial denied, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John A. Wall and R. P. Clement, for appellant. Morrison & Foerster, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendant is a corporation under the laws of this state, and its certificate of incorporation was issued by the secretary of state June 6, 1890. The purposes for which the corporation is formed are stated in its articles to be "to accumulate funds by the payment of each stockholder in periodical installments, and of investing the same for the mutual benefit and advantage of its stockholders, and for that purpose to deal in, improve, and buy and sell, real property; also, for the purpose of carrying on and transacting any and all kinds of real-estate business in which natural persons may lawfully engage." Prior to the issuance of the certificate by the secretary of state, a code of by-laws had been prepared and signed by many who afterwards became stockholders, including the plaintiff, and was afterwards signed by others as they became stockholders in the corporation. Article 16 of this code of by-laws is as follows: "Any stockholder desiring to surrender his stock and withdraw from the corporation may do so by giving sixty days' notice, as provided in article 13, section 2, and shall upon surrender of his stock be entitled to receive the amount due him, to be determined in the manner and paid in the time as provided in article 13, section 2, of the by-laws." Article 12 of this code of by-laws provided that each shareholder should pay into the treasury his subscription to the capital stock in installments of one dollar each month, until the full amount of his subscription should have been paid. The plaintiff was an original subscriber for 100 shares of stock, and paid the installments thereon from the time of his subscription up to and including February 10, 1892, amounting to $2,910, and at that time gave notice of his withdrawal, as provided by article 16 of the by-laws, and demanded the repayment of the amount so paid by him. Upon the refusal of the defendant to make such payment, the present action was brought to recover the same. The defendant, in addition to denying its liability to the plaintiff, set up a counterclaim against him for the installments that fell due upon his subscription subsequent to February 12, 1892. Judgment was rendered against the plaintiff upon his complaint, and in favor of the defendant upon its counterclaim. A motion for a new trial was made by the plaintiff, and denied. The present appeal is from this order. No appeal has been taken from the judgment.

The appellant's contention that the defendant was incorporated under title 16, pt. 4, div. 1, §§ 639-647, Civ. Code, cannot be maintained. Section 639, as it stood at the date of the defendant's incorporation, is as follows: "Corporations organized for the erection of buildings, and making other improvements on real property, may raise funds in shares not exceeding two hundred dollars each, payable in periodical installments. Such bodies are known as land and building corporations, and may be organized with or without a capital stock." A comparison of the articles of incorporation of the defendant with the provisions of this section shows that the purposes for which it was incorporated are entirely different from those authorized by this section. A corporation for the purposes set forth in the defendant's articles of incorporation can be made only under the provisions of title 1 of part 4 of the Civil Code, and the finding of the court that the defendant was incorporated under the provisions of this title was fully justified.

The further finding that article 16 of the by-laws aforesaid was illegal and void necessarily followed. Inasmuch as under the provisions of sections 301 and 354, Civ. Code, the corporation can adopt only such by-laws as are not inconsistent with the constitution or existing laws of this state, it follows that any regulation or rule that it may adopt under the form of a by-law which contravenes the provisions of an existing law is invalid, and has none of the elements of a by-law. Section 309 of the Civil Code forbids the withdrawal or payment to the stockholders of any part of the capital stock of a corporation, except upon its dissolution, or at the expiration of its term of existence; and section 560 of the Penal Code makes it a misdemeanor for any director to concur in any vote or act of the directors by which it is intended to withdraw, or in any manner, except as provided by law, pay to the stockholders or any of them any part of the capital stock of a corporation. "The inhibition runs against the directors because they are, under the law, the managers of the business of the corporation. What the directors cannot do, the stockholders cannot do or authorize to be done." Kohl v. Lilienthal, 81 Cal. 387, 22 Pac. 692.

The finding of the court that the defendant has had a code of by-laws ever since about the time of its incorporation is not objected to, but the plaintiff merely assigns as error the finding that "it was not adopted in the manner provided by law." Section 301, Civ. Code, provides for the adoption of a code of by-laws after the organization of the corporation, either at a meeting of the stockholders called for that purpose, or by the written assent of the holders of two-thirds of the stock. As the code of by-laws of this defendant was prepared and signed by a large number of the stockholders before the creation of the corporation, the finding of the court was justified by this fact. The signature of the plaintiff thereto, though made before the organization of the corporation, constituted an agreement on his part which the corporation which was thereafter formed in pursuance thereof could enforce. West v. Crawford, 80 Cal. 19, 21 Pac. 1123.

Certain exceptions were taken to rulings of the court at the trial, but counsel have presented no argument in their support, and we find no error in the rulings. The order is affirmed.

KELLERMAN v. MAIER et al. (L. A. 204.)

SUBSCRIPTION TO CORPORATE STOCK—CONTRACTS BY DIRECTORS—SHAREHOLDERS.

1. In an action by creditors to enforce the liability of subscribers to corporate stock for an unpaid balance, findings that the defendants never subscribed to such stock, or agreed to pay any balance between the price paid for the stock and the par value, but that defendants purchased the stock respectively from the corporation for certain amounts, and paid therefor, justify a judgment for defendants.

2. Where directors are the only holders of corporate stock, payment by them for stock subscribed by transfer of land was not invalid.

3. Under Civ. Code, § 359, providing that no corporation shall issue stock except on payment therefor, certificates issued in violation of the section are void, and the parties receiving them do not become shareholders.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by J. M. Kellerman against Simon Maier and others. From an order refusing a new trial as to four of them, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. W. Burnett, for appellant. J. T. Houx, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. On January 15, 1895, the plaintiff recovered a judgment in the superior court of Los Angeles county against the Castica Oil Company, a corporation, for the sum of $2,632.50 and $9.50 costs of suit, on which an execution was issued, and returned unsatisfied; and 10 days later he commenced this action against the stockholders of the corporation to subject the amounts due upon their alleged unpaid subscriptions for stock to the payment of his judgment. The court below gave judgment in favor of all the defendants, and the plaintiff appeals from an order refusing to grant him a new trial as to four of them.

It appears from the record that the Castica Oil Company was organized as a corporation under the laws of this state by the respondents Maier, Phelps, Summerland, and Cook, and one Mason, since deceased. The articles of incorporation stated that the purposes for which it was formed were "to bore for, mine for, produce, manufacture, buy, sell, use, store, and refine petroleum and other oils, gas, brea, asphaltum, and kindred substances; and to manufacture, build, buy, sell, use, and lease oil and other mining plants," etc.; that the respondents and Mason should be the directors of the corporation for the first year; that the amount of the capital stock should be $100,000, divided into 100,000 shares of the par value of $1 each; and that each of the incorporators had subscribed for 10,000 shares of the stock. The articles were filed in the office of the county clerk on March 31st, and in the office of the secretary of state on April 2, 1891. On May 20, 1891, at a meeting of the directors held that day, the secretary reported that deeds to the corporation for 840 acres of oil land, which had been secured and paid for by the five incorporators, had been delivered, and thereupon a resolution was unanimously adopted as follows: "Whereas, all of the land deeded to the Castica Oil Company, being eight hundred and forty acres in all, was secured and paid for by the following named persons [stating their names]: Therefore, be it resolved, that for and in consideration of said land, and for the further consideration of twenty dollars, to be paid by each of the above-mentioned persons, being one hundred dollars in all, that the subscription of ten thousand shares of the capital stock of the Castica Oil Co., subscribed for by each of the above-mentioned persons, be considered fully paid, and that the said land and said one hundred dollars be accepted as full payment for the ten thousand shares of capital stock of the Castica Oil Co. subscribed for by each of the before-mentioned persons." Thereafter, on the same day, the deeds were received by the corporation, and the $20 in cash was paid by each of the incorporators, and a certificate for 10,000 shares of stock was issued to each of them as fully paid up stock. Four days later these certificates were surrendered and canceled, and in place thereof a new certificate for 8,248 shares of the stock was issued to each of said subscribers, as trustee. And on May 24, 1894, the last-named certificates were returned to the company and canceled, and no stock was afterwards issued in place thereof. The price first fixed by the board for the sale of stock was 50 cents per share, and on May 28, 1891, Maier and Cook each purchased and paid for 1,000 shares at that price. Afterwards, on October 6, 1891, a resolution was passed by the board authorizing the sale of stock at 25 cents per share, and directing the secretary to "issue additional stock to those persons who had subscribed and received their stock and paid for the same at fifty cents per share, in accordance with the reduced price." Pursuant to the direction contained in this resolution, the secretary issued to Maier and Cook additional certificates for 1,000 shares each, for which nothing was paid. In February, 1894, the price for the sale of the stock was again reduced by a resolution of the board, and with the consent of the stockholders, to seven cents per share; and at that price, on May 24, 1894, there were sold to Maier and Cook each 2,000 shares, to Phelps and Summerland each 1,000 shares, and to the plaintiff 3,000 shares, for which certificates were issued. In January, 1892, the plaintiff contracted with the corporation to sink a well on its land, and again, in June, 1894, made anotner contract; and it was under these contracts that the indebtedness for which he obtained his judgment arose. On the day plaintiff commenced this action he transferred his said 3,000 shares of stock in the company to one Kellogg, without any consideration whatever therefor.

It is alleged in the complaint, upon information and belief, that the defendants, of whom there were more than 30, were on and prior to January 2, 1895, subscribers to, and are still the owners and holders of, shares of stock of the corporation "to the amount hereinunder set forth opposite their names respectively,"—the number set opposite the names of Maier and Cook being 4,000 shares each, and the number set opposite the names of Phelps and Summerland being 1,000 shares each,—and that the four last-named defendants had each paid 32 cents per share upon one-half of their respective shares, and 7 cents per share upon one-half, and no more; and that said defendants agreed, at the time they became such subscribers, owners, and holders of said shares of stock, to pay the balance of the par value of said shares so remaining unpaid to said corporation, or for its use, when legally called upon to do so; but that no part of said balance has been paid, and that the said balance now remains due and unpaid. It is further alleged that the said corporation, by its officers, has neglected and refused, and still neglects and refuses, to make further assessments on said shares, or to collect the amount so remaining unpaid on said shares of stock from the defendants. And the prayer is: First, that the court will ascertain the amount due from each of said defendants as owners or holders of said stock of the defendant corporation; and, second, that the plaintiff have judgment against each of said defendants for the amount found due plaintiff on account of said judgment, and interest thereon, not to exceed the amount due from each of said defendants on their subscription of stock.

The court below found, among other things, as follows: (1) "That the defendants above named were not, nor were either or any of them, subscribers to any shares of the capital stock of the said Castica Oil Company on January 2, 1895, or at any time subsequent to the —— day of May, 1891." (3) "That the above-named defendants did not, nor did either or any of them, agree at any time, or at all, to pay the balance or any part of the par value of said shares remaining unpaid, or at all, to said Castica Oil Company, or for its use, or at all, when legally called on to do so, or in any manner or form, at any time or at all, and there is not any sum of money remaining unpaid or payable from each or any of said defendants to said Castica Oil Company." (4) "That said Castica Oil Company did not, by its officers or otherwise, or at all, neglect or refuse, and does not refuse or neglect, to make any further or any assessments on said shares, or any shares, or at all, and did not neglect or refuse to collect any amount remaining unpaid or otherwise on said shares of stock, or any shares of stock, from any of the defendants above named, and said Castica Oil Company has assets subject to execution." (10) "That each of said defendants purchased from said corporation, and it sold to each of them respectively, the said shares owned and held by them respectively, for the amount each respectively paid said corporation for said shares, and that the amount that each defendant has paid to said corporation for his respective shares as aforesaid was the full market value and price of said shares at the time of said sale and purchase and ever since." These findings are not assailed or objected to in the specifications attached to the statement, or in the brief of appellant's counsel. They are sufficient in form and substance to justify and support the judgment, and must be upheld as correct statements of the facts shown by the evidence. This being so, it is immaterial whether other findings objected to are justified by the evidence or not. Spaulding v. Bradley, 79 Cal. 449, 22 Pac. 47.

It is argued for appellant that the payment by the original incorporators for the stock subscribed for by them, by the transfer of land, was a transaction void on its face, because they, as directors, sold to the corporation their own property at their own price. But at the time of the transaction the five directors were the only stockholders of the company, and they continued to be so up to October following. The corporation was organized to bore for oil, and the corporators obtained title to the land, supposing, doubtless, that it contained oil, which, by boring, could be brought to the surface in paying quantities, and utilized. Why could they not organize a corporation to effect the objects they had in view, and turn over to it the land to be operated on for such price as they might themselves agree upon? No one was injured, and no public policy violated thereby. We fail to see how the cases cited can be held applicable to the facts of this case, since at the time of the transaction here complained of the directors were the only stockholders, and the only beneficiaries of the trust. Besides, the shares of stock first subscribed for are evidently not the ones involved in this action. The complaint alleges that each of the respondents is the owner and holder of a certain number of shares, upon which he has paid a certain part of their par value, and no more. These numbers correspond exactly with the number of shares afterwards purchased and paid for by respondents, and the shares so owned and held must, therefore, be the ones on which plaintiff based his right to recover.

It is further argued that nothing was paid for the 2,000 shares of stock issued to two of the respondents under authority of the resolution of October 6, 1891, and that the holders are liable for the par value thereof; but it is admitted that as to the remainder of the stock issued the evidence shows that it was sold at the highest market price, and under the decisions of this court the purchasers are not liable for any unpaid balance. It appears that certain stockholders had purchased and paid for stock at 50 cents per share, and that by the resolution of October 6th the price was reduced to 25 cents per share, and additional shares were to be issued to those who had purchased at 50 cents, in order to equalize the prices, so that the stock already purchased should cost no more than that to be purchased at the reduced price. Section 359 of the Civil Code provides: "No corporation shall issue stock or bonds except for money paid, labor done, or property actually received." The certificates for the 2,000 shares of stock referred to appear to have been issued in violation of this provision; and, if they were so issued, they were void, and the parties receiving them did not thereby become shareholders, nor make themselves liable to creditors as for an unpaid subscription. Christensen v. Eno, 106 N. Y. 97, 12 N. E. 648; Arkansas River Land, Town & Canal Co. v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 13 Colo. 587, 22 Pac. 954. If we are right in what has been said, then the other points discussed by counsel are immaterial, and do not require special notice. In our opinion, the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

SAN FRANCISCO PROTESTANT ORPHAN ASYLUM v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SANTA CLARA COUNTY et al. (S. F. 565.)

WILLS—PROBATE—CONTEST—PARTIES—PRACTICE.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1327, provides that the probate of a will may be contested at any time within one year after such probate. Section 1328 requires citation to be issued on the filing of the contest, without otherwise limiting the time for issuance. Section 1329 provides that the court must try the cause if citation has been served on "any of the persons named therein." Section 1713 makes applicable to probate proceedings the rules of procedure in civil actions, which provide (sections 406-408) that summons, alias or otherwise, must be issued within one year after the filing of the complaint. Held, that sections 406 to 408 did not apply, and where a valid petition of contest was filed, and thereupon a citation was issued to all necessary parties, all of whom were at once served, except one, as to whom the service was defective through mistake, the court acquired jurisdiction; and, the trial having been had in due season, jurisdiction was not lost, as by want of diligence in prosecution of the contest, by the fact that the defendant as to whom the service was defective was not duly served within a year from the filing of the petition; contestant's attention not having been called to the defect within that time.

2. The defendant as to whom service was defective being a necessary party, the court had power to order him to be brought in after expiration of the year, both under general equitable principles and practice, and under Code Civ. Proc. § 389, providing that "the court may determine any controversy between the parties before it when it can be done without prejudice to the rights of others, or by saving their rights, but, when a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court must order them to be brought in"; the application of said section not being limited to absent persons not named as parties in the first instance. Temple, J., concurring, on the ground that the court's power to bring in said defendant was inherent, and not conferred by the statute.

Department 2. Certiorari by the San Francisco Protestant Orphan Asylum against the superior court of Santa Clara county, and John Reynolds and W. G. Lorigan, Judges. Writ dismissed.

J. C. McKinstry, for petitioner. M. C. Hassett and H. V. Morehouse, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. Certiorari to review an order of the superior court directing a citation to issue to petitioner, the said San Francisco Protestant Orphan Asylum, in a pending proceeding for the revocation of the probate of a will. The facts necessary to be stated are these: Edward Barron died on the 24th day of November, 1893, leaving an estate worth nearly $2,000,000, and a will which was probated on January 5, 1894. On the 9th of April, 1894, within a year after the probate of the will, George Barron, a son of the deceased, filed in said superior court a petition to revoke the probate of said will upon various grounds. The next day a citation was issued to all the legatees and devisees named in the will, requiring them to appear on the 14th of May, 1894, to show cause why the said probate should not be revoked. By said will, about 15 persons were named as devisees. Several of the devisees, including the petitioner here, the said orphan asylum, were benevolent institutions. The citation was served within the year upon all of the parties named, except the said petitioner. There was an attempted service on the petitioner, but it was served on the matron of said petitioner, who, as it ultimately appeared, was not the proper person to be served. The said contestant, George Barron, supposed that petitioner had been properly served, and his attention was not called to the fact that the service was defective until more than a year after the probate of said will, to wit, in the year 1896. There was no intention on the part of said contestant not to serve properly the said petitioner herein. The petitioner did not appear in the case until April 23, 1896. In the meantime the other persons named in the citation appeared and filed their answers, and a trial of the contest was had, which resulted in a verdict of a jury that the testator was not of sound mind, and was unduly influenced by his wife. A motion for a new trial was made and granted, on account of supposed errors committed at the trial. Thereafter, on April 23, 1896, the petitioner herein appeared for the purpose only of making a motion to dismiss the will contest, so far as it concerned the petitioner, upon the ground that there had been no service of the citation upon petitioner within a year after the admission of the will to probate. This motion was by the court denied on the 18th day of said April, 1896; and thereafter, on the 25th day of the same month, the superior court ordered a citation to issue to the petitioner herein, requiring it to show cause on the 12th of June, 1896, why the probate of said will should not be revoked, and such citation was accordingly issued and served. This present proceeding was instituted here for the purpose of having said order last named set aside, as beyond the jurisdiction of the court to make, because not made within one year after the said probate of said will.

There is some contention on the part of the respondents, founded upon certain affidavits, that this proceeding should be dismissed because the petitioner is not a party aggrieved, for the reason that it has made arrangements with both parties to the contest that it shall receive its legacy of $5,000 in any event; but we do not think it is necessary to examine into this contention.

The Code provides that a contest of the probate of a will may be commenced by a petition in writing "at any time within one year after such probate." Code Civ. Proc. § 1327. The next section provides that a citation must be issued to certain named parties, but there is no time specifically mentioned within which such citation must be served. However, section 1713 provides that, "Except as otherwise provided in this title, the provisions in part 2 of this Code are applicable to and constitute the rules of practice in the proceedings mentioned in this title"; and it is contended, upon principle and authority, that, by analogy, a citation must be issued and served within the time and the manner prescribed for the issuance and service of the summons in an ordinary civil action, and that, therefore, a citation cannot be issued to any party after the expiration of a year. It is contended that this rule has been established by this court in the case of Bacigalupo v. Superior Court, 108 Cal. 92, 40 Pac. 1055. But that decision is authority only in a case where, after the expiration of a year from the time of the probate of the will, there is neither a valid citation nor petition in existence. In that case a citation had been issued, but it had been quashed, and the petition for the revocation had itself been dismissed; and it was held that the case stood as though no citation had ever been issued to any one or served on any one, and, indeed, as if no petition had ever been filed. The court say: "The fact that one citation was taken out within the year is immaterial, for that citation was quashed and set aside and discharged, and thereafter the case stood exactly as though no citation had ever been issued." The court further say: "Thereafter, and more than one year subsequent to the filing of said petition, it was dismissed upon motion of this petitioner;" and that "after its dismissal it possessed no life." It was held in that case that the court could not, after the expiration of a year, revive the petition, and order another citation to issue "to all parties interested"; and the case goes upon the theory that, when a year had elapsed without any service of a citation upon any one, there could be no further proceeding in the matter. But in the case at bar a valid petition was filed, and a citation issued within the year to all the necessary and proper parties interested, and, within the year, the said citation had been served upon all the parties except only the petitioner in this present case; and upon this petitioner there had been a defective service, and the defect had not been called to the attention of the contestant until it was brought to his attention by the motion of the petitioner herein to dismiss the proceeding. The court therefore had jurisdiction over the proceeding. Code Civ. Proc. § 1329, provides as follows: "At the time appointed for showing cause, or at any time to which the hearing is postponed, personal service of the citations having been made upon any of the persons named therein, the court must proceed to try the issues of fact joined, in the same manner as in an original contest of a will."

But the petitioner herein, the said San Francisco Protestant Orphan Asylum, being a legatee named in the will, was a necessary party to a complete determination of the controversy; and, not being before the court on account of said defective service, the court had the power, not only under general equitable principles and practice, but under the provisions of the Code, to order the said petitioner brought in as a party to that controversy. Section 389 of the Code is made applicable to the proceeding for the revocation of the probate of a will, and that section provides as follows: "The court may determine any controversy between the parties before it, when it can be done without prejudice to the rights of others, or by saving their rights; but, when a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court must order them to be brought in." It is contended that this section applies only to a person who was not named in the first instance as a party. Such a construction, however, is too narrow, and is incorrect. The "parties before it," within the meaning of that section, are evidently the parties actually before the court, who had been "brought in" either by actual service of process or by a voluntary appearance. If the petitioner had not been named in the citation, there could have been no question as to the propriety of the action of the court below which is here attacked. But the mere naming of a person as a party in an action or proceeding, without any further attempt to bring him within "the presence" of the court, does not make him a party before it. This meaning of the phrase "brought in" was evidently attached to it by this court in Fanning v. Foley, 99 Cal. 336, 33 Pac. 1098. In that case, Gaven, who was the owner of the fee in the land involved, "was made a defendant, but was not served with summons"; and the court say: "The owner of the fee had never been brought in by appearance or service." The Code never intended to provide, and does not provide, that where the petition has been filed within the year, and within that time a citation has been issued and duly served upon all of numerous necessary parties except one, the contest shall utterly lapse, and the rights of all contestants be entirely obliterated, because, from mistake or inadvertence, there has been a failure to properly serve that one within the year. It seems to be admitted by counsel that a decree in favor of the contestant without the presence of petitioner would be fruitless as to all the devisees named in the will. That being so, the petitioner, although interested in only a small fraction of the immense estate, could, if its position be tenable, defeat a legal inquiry into the proper disposition of nearly the entire estate; and the result would be the same whether petitioner is acting solely in its own interest, or, as contended by respondent, is allowing itself to be used in the interest of others. A court should not reach such an unjust conclusion unless driven to it by the imperative language of the law; and there is no such imperative language. We think that the court below, under the circumstances hereinbefore detailed, acquired jurisdiction of the proceeding, and that petitioner, being a necessary party to a complete determination of the controversy, and not being before the court, could be brought in by a citation or any appropriate method.

A few authorities are cited by counsel for both parties from New York, but we do not see that any of them are particularly applicable to this case. It is true that in Re Phelan, 51 Hun, 208, 4 N. Y. Supp. 408, cited by respondent, the court, dealing with a proceeding for the revocation of the probate of a will, say that the court "has power, where all persons who are necessary parties have not been cited or notified, to issue a supplemental citation for the purpose of bringing in such parties"; and that something of the same kind appears in Re Laytin's Estate (Surr.) 37 N. Y. Supp. 1125, and in Re Will of Gouraud, 95 N. Y. 256; but it is difficult to discover to what extent the decisions in those cases rested on peculiar statutory provisions. The order sought to be reversed is affirmed, and the writ of certiorari is dismissed.

TEMPLE, J. I concur in the judgment. The Code provides no limitation whatever in regard to the proceedings for the contest of a will after probate, except that the contest must be inaugurated within one year. Like all other proceedings in court, it is subject always to the power and the duty of the court to dismiss the contest if not prosecuted with due diligence. The contest here in question was commenced within the year, and has been diligently prosecuted. A judgment was once entered which was vacated on motion for a new trial, and, when the case was about to be called for retrial, a motion to dismiss was made by the petitioner, on the ground that the citation had not been served upon it. It turns out that the citation was served upon an employé of the petitioner who was apparently in charge of its asylum, but who it is conceded was not the person upon whom the citation should have been served. The motion to dismiss was denied, and a day was fixed for the hearing, which would give the contestant an opportunity to cite the petitioner, and a new citation was ordered.

It is contended that the order is void solely because the citation would be issued more than one year after the contest was commenced. It is claimed that it is jurisdictional, and that it makes no difference whether the matter has been prosecuted diligently or not. It is not contended that there is any such express limitation in the statute, but it is worked out upon the theory that Code Civ. Proc. § 1713, enacts: "Except as otherwise provided in this title, the provisions of part two of this Code are applicable to and constitute the rules of practice in the proceedings mentioned in this title." "This title" contains the entire procedure in probate matters, and part 2 the procedure in civil cases. But what provision is there in part 2 in its nature applicable to this proceeding? Section 1327 provides that a contest shall be inaugurated by filing a petition; section 1328, that, upon the filing of the petition, a citation must be issued requiring certain parties to appear upon a day named to show cause, etc. I find only two sections in part 2 in which any allusion is made to a right to issue a summons after the lapse of a year. Section 406 provides that the clerk must indorse on the complaint the date of its filing, "and at any time within one year thereafter the plaintiff may have a summons issued." How could this be read into, or even stand with, section 1328, which, as was said in Bacigalupo v. Superior Court, 108 Cal. 92, 40 Pac. 1055, requires the citation to issue forthwith upon filing the petition? The two provisions cannot exist together as applying to the same thing. It would be absurd to say that a person filing a petition for a contest may have a citation issued at any time within one year thereafter. The other section in which the time is mentioned is section 408, which provides that an alias summons shall not issue after the expiration of one year. This is equally inapplicable. There is no alias citation like an alias summons. The citation notifies the parties to appear at a time mentioned to show cause. If the court has the power to set the hearing, the citation may, of course, issue.

No one would contend that the provisions in regard to summons would apply generally to the various citations authorized in probate proceedings. It may be issued to require the performance of an act, and sometimes disobedience to it may be enforced by arrest and imprisonment (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1398, 1402, 1408, 1459, 1461, 1623, 1625); and when personal notice is required, and no other method is provided, it must be by citation. But I think the statute shows on its face that no provision in regard to summons applies to citations. Everything in regard to citations is provided for in title 11. Section 1707 states what it must contain; 1708 provides for its issuance; 1709, that it shall be served in the same manner as a summons. This would be unnecessary if the provisions as to the summons applied, and on that supposition no operation can be given this section. Unlike a summons, the length of the notice may be prescribed by the court; otherwise, it is five days. Section 1711. As a rule, its functions are very unlike those of a summons. It is simply a notice which may be molded to suit the occasion, and not a process which a party may sue out or not, and which, having sued out, he can serve when he pleases, provided it be done within three years.

In the Bacigalupo Case it is correctly said that the provision in regard to citation cannot be used for delay. Of course not, for it must be issued to notify the party interested of a day of hearing specially appointed by the court. It was therefore unnecessary to say anything about the time within which it can be issued. A summons, however, need not be issued at all unless the plaintiff wishes it, and then at any time within the year, and can be served at any time within three years thereafter. These can hardly be said to be provisions to prevent delay, and, as applied to the probate court, would be ridiculous. A proceeding in that court is expected to move continuously and quickly to an end. If applicable to proceedings in the probate court, their effect would be to authorize delay, not to prevent it. It is not expressly ruled in Bacigalupo v. Superior Court that the provisions above referred to in regard to the issuance of summons do apply to the proceeding for the contest of a will. It is said: "Giving section 1328 the widest latitude of construction possible, the power to issue a citation would, beyond all question, cease one year after the petition for revocation was filed." This is apparently a construction of section 1328, and evidently refers to the previous remark that the statute requires citations to be immediately issued; that is, where a statute requires an act to be done at once, it surely must be done within the year. The party contesting cannot file his petition, and then wait a year, before asking for a hearing and ordering citation. This is a declaration of a rule of due diligence, not an assertion of a plain statutory limitation. In this case no such state of things existed. A citation was issued at once, and the trial of the issues proceeded with due diligence. There has been no delay, and I am unable to discover by what means the court has lost jurisdiction. It is a proceeding in rem, and not inter partes. The court already had jurisdiction of the res, and could have proceeded with the trial of the contest without further notice, had the statute so provided. The contest could have been treated as an incident in the administration which was already pending. The office of the citation, then, was not like that of a summons, to give the court jurisdiction. It was an extra protection provided by the statute, and, if the court still had jurisdiction of the proceeding, its power to issue the citation cannot be doubted. It is not doubted that the service of the citation upon some of the parties gave jurisdiction as to them. Had the defect been discovered on the return day, it will not be disputed that the court might have continued the hearing to another day, to allow the completion of service. If this course had been kept up for a year, and service was still found incomplete, although all possible diligence had been used, I can see no rational ground for a claim that the court had thereby lost jurisdiction. It would require an express limitation to work such a result. Of course, all presumptions are against a construction which could have that effect.

I concur in the judgment for these reasons, which I understand accord with those expressed by Mr. Justice McFARLAND. I have not been able to persuade myself that Code Civ. Proc. § 389, has any application to this case.

WHITE v. HARRIS et al. (L. A. 138.)

STREET IMPROVEMENT—RESOLUTION OF INTENTION —INSUFFICIENT NOTICE.

1. A city council passed a resolution of intention to construct a public sewer along specified portions of eight different streets. Thereupon the superintendent of streets posted notices of such resolution along the designated route, describing the work proposed as a public sewer, within the defined limits on each street, but making no mention of its extension to any of the other streets named in the resolution. Held, that the notice was not a sufficient compliance with Act March 18, 1885, § 3 (amended St. 1889, p. 158), requiring such notice to describe briefly the improvement proposed.

2. The defect was not cured by the fact that the entire assessment was apportioned to feet frontage, since the cost per foot in one street might greatly exceed the cost per foot in another.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by S. White against Charles T. Harris and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John T. Jones, for appellant. Wells & Lee, Allen & Flint, Mulford & Pollard, and Calvin Edgerton, for respondents.

BRITT, C. Action to enforce an assessment for the expense of constructing a sewer in the city of Los Angeles. A judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint was reversed on a former appeal. 103 Cal. 528, 37 Pac. 502. After that decision, trial was had in the court below, and resulted in favor of defendants. The decision of one of several questions now argued by counsel will suffice for the disposition of the case. A resolution of intention was passed by the city council on June 20, 1889, declaring the purpose of the council to order the construction of a public sewer along specified portions of eight different streets. Thereupon it was the duty of the superintendent of streets, under section 3 of the "Act to provide for work upon streets," etc.[1] (amended St. 1889, p. 158), to post along the line of the contemplated work, and publish in a newspaper, notices stating the fact and date of the passage of the resolution, briefly the work or improvement proposed, and referring to the resolution for further particulars. It is not disputed that substantial compliance with such provision was essential to the validity of the subsequent proceedings. In this instance notices were posted along the designated portion of each street on which the sewer was to be constructed describing the work proposed as a public sewer within the defined limits on that street, but making no mention of its extension to any of the other seven streets named in the resolution. Thus, the work proposed was stated in the notices posted along College street to be "a public sewer on College street, from a point ten feet west of the center line of Buena Vista street to a point twenty-seven feet east of the east line of Ramona avenue." This notice was posted along the described part of College street, and not elsewhere. A like course was pursued as to the notices along the line of the sewer on each of the other streets, respectively. The publication made in a newspaper was found by the court to have been "similar in substance to the said posted notice." Thereafter a contract was let to plaintiff's assignor for the construction of the sewer as an entirety; and the subsequent assessment apportioned the cost of the work as a whole upon all the frontage along the eight streets where the sewer was laid.

Appellant argues that each notice pointed to additional work by referring to the resolution of intention for further particulars The statute, however, requires that the notice itself shall state briefly the work proposed; and we cannot allow that it is a compliance with this requirement to designate in the notice only a relatively small transverse section of an extended line or network of sewers. The case of Perine v. Erzgraber, 102 Cal. 234, 36 Pac. 585, relied on by appellant, does not meet the objection. The notice there identified the locality of the proposed work, and such identification was declared to be among the evident objects to be effected by the same. In that particular the notices in the present case were misleading. No one being apprised merely that a sewer was contemplated within certain limits on a single street would have any intimation that its locality extended over seven other streets also.

It is contended, further, that no owner of property to be assessed could be damnified by the omission; this, for the reason that, the assessment being apportioned according to feet frontage, any extension of the sewer beyond a single street is accompanied by a corresponding extension of assessable frontage. But the conclusion appears unwarranted when we reflect that the laying of the sewer on one street may involve only excavation in sand, while in other streets it might require the filling of a morass or blasting of rock, to the material enhancement of the general cost. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

KRELING v. KRELING. (S. F. 603.)

SUPERSEDEAS BOND—JUSTIFICATION OF SURETIES.

1. A judgment providing that defendant pay a certain indebtedness on two notes, and, in default, that certain real estate be sold, and that, if the proceeds are insufficient, a judgment for the balance be docketed against defendant, is not within Code Civ. Proc. § 942, requiring a bond for double the amount of the judgment on a stay of execution where the judgment directs the payment of money.

2. A decision of the clerk of the superior court on the justification of sureties on appeal cannot be reviewed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

[1] Act March 18, 1885.

Action by one Kreling, administratrix, against one Kreling. Defendant appeals from the judgment. Motion for writ of supersedeas. Granted.

J. D. Sullivan and Herbert Choynski (Thos. A. McGowan and F. H. Smithson, of counsel), for appellant. H. H. Lowenthal, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. A judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, that the defendant, within 10 days after its entry, pay, satisfy, and discharge certain indebtedness existing in favor of the Anglo-California Bank, Limited, upon two promissory notes, amounting to $5,000, held by it, and within said date procure a release of the plaintiff's intestate from liability on said notes; that in default thereof a certain parcel of real estate described in said judgment be sold by a commissioner who was appointed therefor, and that out of the proceeds thereof the amount of said notes be paid to said bank, and, if said proceeds were insufficient, judgment for the balance be docketed against the defendant, and execution issue therefor. From this judgment the defendant appealed, and gave an undertaking in the sum of $300 for the costs of appeal, and a further undertaking, in the sum of $2,500 (that amount having been fixed by the judge of the court which rendered the judgment), to the effect that the appellant would not, pending the appeal, commit, or suffer to be committed, any waste upon the real property directed to be sold. The plaintiff excepted to the sufficiency of the sureties on this undertaking; and upon their justification before the county clerk, upon notice therefor, that officer approved the undertaking and the sureties thereon. The present motion is for a writ of supersedeas, staying the execution of the judgment and all proceedings thereon pending the appeal, and is resisted by the plaintiff upon the ground that the appellant did not give an undertaking in double the amount of the judgment.

The provisions of section 942, Code Civ. Proc., requiring an undertaking in double the amount of the judgment for a stay of its execution, "if the appeal be from a judgment or order directing the payment of money," is inapplicable to the present case. That section is applicable to a judgment which directs payment by the defendant of a specific amount of money, and which can be directly enforced by a writ of execution, but has no application to a judgment which may be satisfied in either of two or more modes, or which cannot be enforced against the defendant until after the plaintiff has exhausted another remedy, and where he is personally liable for only a deficiency of the proceeds of certain property which is primarily chargeable therefor. Painter v. Painter, 98 Cal. 625, 33 Pac. 483; Boob v. Hall, 105 Cal. 413, 38 Pac. 977. If the judgment direct the sale of real property, and the defendant is liable only in case of deficiency of the proceeds of such sale, the provisions of section 945 control, and by that section it is only when the judgment is for the sale of "mortgaged" premises that the undertaking must provide for the payment of a deficiency.

We cannot review the decision of the clerk upon the justification of the sureties before him. The statute has designated that officer as a tribunal for hearing and determining that question, and has provided no mode by which his conclusion may be reviewed. Boyer v. Superior Court of San Francisco, 110 Cal. 401, 42 Pac. 892. It is a general rule that where a fact to be determined rests upon conflicting testimony, or the weight of evidence, or the credibility of witnesses, the decision of the tribunal to whom it has been intrusted will be accepted as correct. The motion for the writ is granted.

GRAHAM v. FARMERS' & MERCHANTS' BANK OF LOS ANGELES. (L. A. 215.)

GUARANTY — SCOPE OF CONTRACT — DRAFT FOR PRICE OF GOODS—ADVANCES ON GOODS NOT COVERED BY GUARANTY—EVIDENCE.

1. A guaranty of payment of a draft for the price of three car loads of fruit, which expressly states that the fruit has been loaded in cars having designated numbers, given to a bank to procure advances for the accommodation of the shipper, does not justify the bank in advancing money to him on shipments in other cars, where the bills of lading and bills of exchange presented with the guaranty showed on their face that they were drawn to cover shipments made in other cars.

2. In an action against a bank for a deposit sequestered by it to reimburse itself for advances on unpaid drafts guarantied by the depositor, a letter written by the guarantor, and presented to the bank with the guaranty, is admissible as part of the transaction to show that the guaranty was not intended to cover the advances actually made.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by Robert Graham against the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Los Angeles. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Graves, O'Melveny & Saankland, for appellant. Edward A. Meserve, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. Plaintiff sues to recover $312, which he had on general deposit with the defendant, but which defendant refused to pay upon his order. The defense is that the defendant had paid three drafts guarantied by plaintiff, amounting to $450, which drafts had not been paid by the drawee or drawer although demand had been made, and that thereupon the bank sequestered the deposit. The guaranty given by plaintiff was as follows: "Sacramento, Cal., July 25, 1895. H. J. Fleishman, Cashier F. & M.

Bank, Los Angeles, Cal.—Dear Sir: This is your authority to honor the draft of E. N. Altland & Company on P. Ruhlman & Company, New York, to cover shipments of three car loads of oranges loaded into fruit growers' express cars 12,312, 12,332, and 12,324. Said draft not to exceed $150 for each car, or a total of $450 for the three cars. I shall hold myself responsible for the payment of this draft by P. Ruhlman & Company on presentation. Yours, truly, Robt. Graham." This was presented to the bank July 29th, with three drafts as follows: "$150.00. Los Angeles, Cal., July 27, 1895. On demand, pay to the order of Farmers' & Merchants' Bank one hundred and fifty—100 dollars, ¢ A. R. L. 5,626, value received, and charge to account of E. N. Altland. No. 65. To P. Ruhlman & Co., New York City, N. Y." "$150.00. Los Angeles, Cal., July 27, 1895. On demand, pay to the order of Farmers' & Merchants' Bank one hundred and fifty — 100 dollars, ¢ A. R. L. 4,072, value received, and charge to account of E. N. Altland. No. 64. To P. Ruhlman & Co., New York City, N. Y." "$150.00. Los Angeles, Cal., July 29, 1895. On demand, pay to the order of Farmers' & Merchants' Bank one hundred and fifty — 100 dollars, ¢ F. G. E. 12,007, value received, and charge to account of E. N. Altland. No. 67. To P. Ruhlman & Co., New York City, N. Y." Accompanying each was a bill of lading for a car load of oranges packed in the three cars respectively mentioned in the bills of exchange. No notice whatever was given to Graham of the acceptance of the guaranty, the advance on the drafts, or of their nonpayment. The officers of the bank knew nothing of any correspondence or of the relations between Graham and Altland except as above. Evidently the bank was not charged with any duty with reference to the fruit which had been loaded into the cars named. They were, however, charged with knowledge of certain facts, to wit, that plaintiff supposed that the fruit already loaded in the cars named would be shipped to P. Ruhlman & Co., in consideration for which P. Ruhlman & Co. would pay the drafts. The fact that the numbers of the cars in which the oranges were loaded were given was itself a significant fact. The officers of the bank may well have asked why these particular cars were mentioned, if it was immaterial in what cars the fruit was shipped. It turns out that these cars were about one week on the road, and could have been diverted by telegraph so as to reach New York in a day or two,—ten days or so earlier than those shipped in the other cars could reach New York. According to the testimony of Graham, this was quite material to P. Ruhlman & Co. Upon presenting the letter containing the guaranty, Altland also presented three bills of exchange, each one of which informed the bank, or its officers, that it was not drawn against the shipment in the three cars specially mentioned, but against shipments made in other cars. Perhaps a car load of oranges indicates a certain quantity of fruit. Upon that there was no issue. But if Graham was willing to guaranty that certain car loads would be purchased by P. Ruhlman & Co., and that they would net at least $150 per car load, that does not prove that he would be willing to make the same guaranty as to other car loads; and the judgment of witnesses and the court cannot be substituted for that of Graham himself. They cannot change his contract. If the shipment was merely the consideration which moved Graham to give the guaranty, as appellant suggests, the bank should have concluded that Graham had some hold upon those cars, and for that reason should not have advanced the money upon entirely different shipments. The fact that the bank took bills of lading itself shows that it did not regard the recital as merely stating a fact which was of no concern to it. I do not see how the telegram to Altland can help appellant. If it really was authority to change the guaranty so as to apply to other shipments, no doubt Graham would be liable, even though the bank officers did not know of it. But it was, in fact, no such thing. As sent by Graham, it was a refusal to guaranty payment for any other shipment. As only actual authority from Graham could help the bank, it cannot profit by any mistake made in its transmission.

The court did not err in permitting the letter from Graham to be read. The telegram expressly refers to it as explanatory, and I think it was admissible as showing the surrounding circumstances, and that the shipment of the car loads specially mentioned was deemed material by Graham in making the guaranty, and that he at the time intended that the guaranty should apply only to them. Graham had no interest whatever in the shipments made. His guaranty was wholly a friendly act, designed to assist Altland. The judgment is affirmed.

RUTAN v. WOLTERS et al. (S. F. 567.)

TROVER AND CONVERSION—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT—JUDGMENT—CONSTRUCTION—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. A complaint alleged that plaintiff was "heretofore" the owner and entitled to the possession of certain personal property, and that defendants, "within two years last past," took possession of it, and converted it to their own use. Held, that the complaint was sufficient, after verdict, though it did not state the precise time plaintiff was the owner, or when defendants converted the property.

2. In conversion against L., and against "L. as sheriff of," etc., a judgment against "L., sheriff of," etc., was against L. individually.

3. In conversion against a certain person, individually and as assignee in insolvency, he cannot complain that the judgment is against him in his representative capacity, where the jury found that he converted the property to his own use.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by one Rutan against one Wolters and others for the conversion of personal property. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Dorn & Dorn and Dunne & McPike, for appellants. R. H. Countryman, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. 1. The complaint herein sufficiently states a cause of action. It alleges that the plaintiff was "heretofore" the owner and entitled to the immediate possession of certain personal property, and that the defendants, "within two years last past," took possession and control of the property without the consent of the plaintiff, and converted the same to their own use and benefit, to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $1,619. The complaint does not allege the precise time at which the plaintiff was the owner, or at which the defendants took or converted the property, and was open to a demurrer for ambiguity in this respect. No such demurrer was filed, but the cause was tried before a jury upon the answer of the defendants denying the allegations of the complaint, and a verdict thereon was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. It is as consistent with the averments in the complaint to hold that the "heretofore" therein named included the time at which it is alleged that the defendants converted the property, as that it was prior thereto; and as, after judgment, every intendment is to be made in support thereof, it must be assumed that the proofs at the trial were sufficient to justify the verdict.

2. Two of the defendants named in the caption to the complaint are "Leopold Cassell, as assignee in insolvency of the St. Helena Wine Company, an insolvent debtor," and "C. S. Laumeister, as sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco." These persons are also named individually in the caption as defendants in the action, and the conversion of the property is alleged to have been by "the said defendants." The answers were filed in their behalf both as individuals and in the capacity in which they were sued. The judgment rendered is that the plaintiff "do have and recover from C. S. Laumeister, sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, and L. Cassell, as assignee in insolvency of the St. Helena Wine Company, an insolvent debtor, two of the defendants, the sum of $1,389." It is contended by the appellants that Cassell could not commit a tort in his capacity as assignee of an insolvent debtor, and that the judgment against him, in his representative capacity, for the conversion of the property, was erroneous. The judgment, however, is not against the estate of the insolvent, but is against Cassell "as assignee"; and, as the verdict implies that the jury found that he converted the property to his own use, it is not for him to complain that the judgment is against him in his representative capacity. Whether he shall be reimbursed from the estate of the insolvent, in case he satisfies the judgment out of his own property, will be determined by the court which appointed him the assignee. The judgment against Laumeister is against him as an individual, notwithstanding the addition of the words, "sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco." The judgment is affirmed.

COUNTY BANK OF SAN LUIS OBISPO v. GREENBERG et al. (L. A. No. 121.)

NOTE—CONSTRUCTION—PLEADING.

1. In an action on a note payable in one year, with the clause, "This note is given to secure overdraft," the complaint is insufficient if it does not allege the existence of an overdraft when the note was due.

2. Where a note provides that it is given to secure an overdraft and is payable in one year, and the overdraft, at the time it is given, is less than the face of the note, the overdraft secured is the amount due at the time the note is payable, not exceeding the face of the note.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Action by the County Bank of San Luis Obispo against Meyer Greenberg and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant B. Schwartz appeals. Reversed.

Graves & Graves and Louis Lamy, for appellant. Wilcoxon & Bouldin, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This action is upon a promissory note made by Meyer Greenberg, L. J. Greenberg, and B. Schwartz, dated March 5, 1894, at one year, to order of the plaintiff, for the sum of $5,000, with interest at 10 per cent. until paid; and at the end thereof, above the signature of the makers, it was added: "This note is given to secure overdraft of Greenberg Bros." The complaint is in the usual form, sets out a copy of the note, and alleges that no part of it has been paid. A general demurrer to the complaint was overruled, the defendants answered, and upon trial before a jury the plaintiff had verdict, and judgment was entered thereon against the defendant Schwartz, the other defendants having been discharged in insolvency pending the suit. This appeal is from the judgment, upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained. The instrument sued upon is not an absolute and unconditional promise to pay a certain sum of money at the time specified, but is a collateral agreement to pay the overdraft of Greenberg Bros., on March 5, 1895, not exceeding the sum of $5,000 and accrued interest. The action is properly brought upon the instrument, but as the liability of the defendants depended upon a fact not appearing upon its face, namely, the existence of an overdraft at the time the action is brought, such fact must be alleged. In Tooker v. Arnoux, 76 N. Y. 397, the action was upon the following order drawn upon the defendant in favor of the plaintiff: "Please pay William T. Tooker the sum of $556 out of the money to be realized from the sale of the houses on the north side of 46th street, city of New York, and known as Nos. 305, 307, and 309 East 46th street. James Watson." This order was accepted by defendant, and, before suit, $100 was paid thereon. There was no allegation that the houses, or any of them, had been sold. Defendant's counsel, at the beginning of the trial, moved to dismiss the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The motion was denied. Plaintiff offered evidence of the sale of the houses, to which defendant objected on the ground that it was not averred in the complaint. Verdict for plaintiff. Upon appeal the court said: "We think the complaint was clearly bad. The sale of the houses mentioned in the order, and the receipt of money from such sale, were conditions precedent to the defendant's liability on his acceptance, and those facts should have been averred. In the absence of such averments, no indebtedness appeared." So in the case before us there was no indebtedness upon the note unless there was an indebtedness of Greenberg Bros. upon their account with the bank, and no such indebtedness was averred. A judgment by default would not have been supported by the undenied averments of the complaint. It was not even averred that anything was "due" upon the instrument set out in the complaint, the averment being "that no part of the principal sum, or the interest thereon, has ever been paid,"—an averment which might be strictly true, though the overdraft had been fully paid.

The conclusion we have reached necessitates a reversal of the judgment, but, as the plaintiff may desire to amend its complaint, one question made by defendant will doubtless arise on a new trial, and should be briefly noticed. Defendant contends that at the time the instrument in question was executed the overdraft of Greenberg Bros. amounted to $3,700; that afterwards, and before this action was brought, they deposited in the bank at various times sums amounting to over $37,000; and that said subsequent deposits should have been applied, so far as necessary, to the payment of said overdraft. The intention of the parties, to be ascertained from the terms of the instrument read in the light of the surrounding circumstances, must determine that question. No specific overdraft as to amount is mentioned. The amount then due was much less than $5,000, the amount named in the obligation. If it had been intended that the definite amount then due should only be secured, that sum would doubtless have been named, or, if it had been intended that the first deposits made by the Greenberg Brothers should apply to the satisfaction of the overdraft then existing, there could have been no good reason why the larger sum should bear interest. We think the evident intention was that the overdraft might be increased, and that the obligation in question was intended to secure whatever overdraft might exist on March 5, 1895, not exceeding the amount of the obligation and accrued interest thereon; in other words, that it was intended to strengthen and enlarge the credit of Greenberg Bros., and contemplated continued transactions between them and the bank. The judgment appealed from should be reversed, with directions to the court below to sustain the demurrer to the complaint, with leave to the plaintiff to amend.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is reversed, with directions to the court below to sustain the demurrer to the complaint, with leave to the plaintiff to amend.

SAWTELLE v. MUNCY et ux. (L. A. 196.)

DEFAULT—WAIVER—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. A default for want of an answer was waived where the defaulting defendant subsequently joined her co-defendant in a demurrer and an answer, without objection by plaintiff till the close of the latter's testimony.

2. On foreclosure of a mortgage executed by husband and wife to secure the former's note, plaintiff's failure to establish his demand against the husband renders harmless a refusal to enter judgment against the wife for want of an answer.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Riverside county; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Action by C. A. Sawtelle against R. E. Muncy and wife to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. Wright, for appellant. Collier & Evans, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. Action to foreclose a mortgage executed by R. E. Muncy and Sadie E.

Muncy, his wife, to secure the payment of a promissory note for $1,295, made by R. E. Muncy, September 7, 1888, and payable on or before two years after date, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum. Defense: Want of consideration, menace, and fraud. Defendants had judgment. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and supports his appeal by a bill of exceptions. The cause was tried by the court, without a jury.

The findings show that the note in suit was made without valuable consideration; that the note and mortgage were procured by false representations on the part of plaintiff, and by menace, consisting of threats of a criminal prosecution against defendant R. E. Muncy, and of consequent injury to his character, and that the mortgage was executed by defendants, and each of them, under the influence of such menace, and would not otherwise have been made or executed. Appellant contends that the findings are not supported by the evidence, and specifies various particulars in which the evidence fails to support the several findings. For the sake of brevity, we shall consider the objections together. The evidence may be epitomized as follows: Plaintiff introduced the note and mortgage, and rested. Defendant R. E. Muncy testified that he contracted to purchase the mortgaged premises in May, 1887, from one Moses Bollinger, and introduced the contract; consideration, $652.51. When the last payment was made, defendant had the deed made to his wife, Sadie E. Muncy. After defendant had contracted, land rose in price, and he made a contract with one Townsend to sell him the same land at, say, $200 per acre. $200 or $300 was paid as a bonus, and the residue of, say, $1,500, was to be paid at a specified time, or the bonus to be forfeited. Townsend was in default for a year or so, and went into insolvency. About the date of the note and mortgage, plaintiff came to this defendant, and represented to him that he had received a note from Townsend for, say, $1,250, secured by an assignment of the Muncy contract for the sale of the land; that, in conveying the land to his wife, R. E. Muncy was guilty of a crime, and unless he fixed it up at once, and "no fooling," he would institute criminal proceedings against him. Defendant's wife was in a delicate situation. He had recently come to the state, and engaged in business, and, fearing the effect of a prosecution, was induced to give the note and mortgage. Defendant's wife corroborated the evidence as to threats by plaintiff of a criminal prosecution, etc. In rebuttal, the deposition of plaintiff, who resides in Oregon, was read in evidence, stating, in substance, that one N. G. Yoakum had contracted to purchase the land covered by the mortgage, and had contracted to sell it to defendant R. E. Muncy; that there was a balance of $1,295 due to Yoakum from Muncy; that Yoakum assigned his contract of purchase and his contract of sale to plaintiff; and that the sum due from defendant constituted the consideration for the note in suit. In reply to this, defendant R. E. Muncy testified that he never at any time had any dealings whatever with Yoakum,—barely knew him; Yoakum never had any interest in the land that he knew of; that he never contracted with Yoakum in reference to this or any other land or thing; that, shortly after he bought the land of Bollinger, Yoakum disappeared, leaving his family, and has never been heard from since. The parties to the suit were the only witnesses.

From the foregoing synopsis of the evidence it is quite apparent that there was evidence to support the findings, and that if the court below believed the defendants, as it evidently did, it could not well have found otherwise. According to their testimony, there was no consideration whatever for the note, and hence it matters not whether the menace was sufficient to defeat the instrument. It seems strange, if plaintiff testified truthfully, that he did not fortify his position by some of the agreements of which he speaks, or by extrinsic evidence in support of his statement. It is sufficient, however, for us to say that the court was amply justified in its findings.

Appellant further contends that the court erred in refusing judgment against defendant Sadie E. Muncy after default. The record shows that the defendant Sadie E. Muncy was served with summons on the 1st day of November, 1892, and that her default for want of an answer was entered by the clerk November 22, 1892. December 7, 1892, both of the defendants demurred to the complaint, which demurrer was overruled December 23d. January 20, 1893, defendants answered; and, after leave from the court so to do, they, on the 7th day of March, 1894, filed an amendment to their answer. No objection seems to have been taken to the appearance of the wife defendant up to the close of plaintiff's testimony, when judgment was asked against her, and the court took the motion under advisement, and reserved its ruling.

1. We think the default was waived. In Hestres v. Clements, 21 Cal. 425, default was entered against a defendant, who afterwards served and filed a demurrer, and acceptance of service of the demurrer was held a waiver of the default. Upon like principles, failing to raise objections to the various pleadings filed by the defaulting defendant, and going to trial upon the merits, should be regarded as a waiver of the default.

2. If it be conceded that the default was not waived, we are at a loss to see how plaintiff was injured. The defendant Sadie E. Muncy was not a party to the note in suit, and the only relief sought against her was the foreclosure of her interest in the land in satisfaction of plaintiff's demand. Manifestly, the establishment of that demand against her co-defendant was a predicate to such foreclosure, and, as plaintiff failed in establishing his demand against her co-defendant, he had no claim to satisfy out of the property of Sadie E. Muncy. The facts as found support the conclusions of law, and we recommend that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PEOPLE v. GEIGER. (Cr. 201.)

INSANE PERSONS — DISCHARGE FROM ASYLUM — CRIME—INSANITY AS A DEFENSE—SPECIAL TRIAL OF ISSUE—BURGLARY—INDICTMENT.

1. Shortly after the escape of a patient from the insane asylum, the resident physician, who had intended to discharge him in a few days, and who believed that the patient was then restored to reason, caused his discharge to be recorded as "recovered." Held a valid exercise of the physician's authority, under St. 1875–76, p. 135, to discharge such patients as, "in his opinion," have recovered.

2. The fact that the accused had been in the insane asylum, and that his discharge as recovered was not entered till after his escape from the asylum, is insufficient to warrant submitting to trial the question of his present insanity, under Pen. Code, § 1368, authorizing such submission "if a doubt arises as to the sanity of the defendant."

3. Where the designation of the local vicinage of the building burglarized is not necessary for its identification, the variance between an allegation that the building is at S., in a specified county, and proof that it is over a mile from S., is immaterial.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; E. D. Ham, Judge.

Ernest Geiger was convicted of burglary, and from the judgment and order denying a new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. E. Colwell, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and W. H. Anderson, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

BRITT, C. Defendant was charged with the crime of burglary, perpetrated on October 9, 1895. When the case was called for trial he moved the court to stay all proceedings against him, and assigned as ground for such motion that he had been regularly committed as an insane person to an asylum for such persons, had not been legally discharged therefrom, and was then insane. The proof was that on November 9, 1892, he was duly committed by a judge of the superior court to the state asylum for the insane at Napa. He escaped therefrom on December 24, 1894, and never returned. No attempt was made to retake him. The resident physician, being of opinion that he was restored to reason, had, before his escape, intended to order his discharge if his condition did not change in a few days; and, believing him to be then so restored, said resident physician caused an appropriate record to be made of his discharge as "recovered" very shortly after the escape. On this showing, the court rightly denied the motion. The statute concerning the management of the asylum provides that the resident physician shall be the executive officer of the institution, and shall discharge such patients as, "in his opinion, have permanently recovered their reason." St. 1875–76, p. 135. And the fact that defendant had escaped when his recovery was thus determined by competent authority is no ground for impeaching such determination. The statute did not make his corporeal presence a condition of the valid exercise of the power to discharge him. See Kellogg v. Cochran, 87 Cal. 192, 25 Pac. 677.

Defendant next moved the court to submit to trial the question of his present insanity, under the provision for such submission in section 1368, Pen. Code, "If a doubt arise as to the sanity of the defendant." The motion was not supported by any evidence in addition to that produced on the motion for a stay, and it was denied. We see no error. Prima facie, defendant had been restored to reason, and it cannot be said that the showing was such as must necessarily have constrained a doubt in the mind of the judge as to defendant's sanity. Webber v. Com., 119 Pa. St. 223, 13 Atl. 427, where this question is examined at length.

The trial of the information proceeded, and defendant was found guilty. It is urged that the evidence showed conclusively that he was insane when the burglary was committed. There was certainly evidence that he acted at times like a lunatic, and that, in the opinion of some who knew him well, he was crazy. On the other hand, there was testimony that he made false statements of the means by which he procured the property stolen at the time of the burglary, and several of his neighbors and intimate acquaintances testified their belief that he was sane. The record also informs us that "other witnesses in corroboration were examined." How strong such corroboration may have been, we cannot know. It must be said that the evidence regarding his sanity was conflicting. The trial judge considered it sufficient to justify the verdict, and its insufficiency cannot be assumed here.

There was a request for an instruction directing the jury to acquit on the ground of variance between allegation and proof, in this: The information charged a burglary in entering, etc., a building at St. Helena, in the county of Napa, while the proof was that the building is situated a mile and a half from St. Helena. It does not appear that a designation of the local vicinage of the building was at all important for its identification, and, unless necessary for that purpose, it was surplusage to allege or prove its situation, further than that it was in the county of Napa. People v. Handley, 100 Cal. 370, 34 Pac. 853; 2 Bish.

Cr. Proc. § 135. The judgment and order denying a new trial should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

GRANT v. MURPHY et al. (S. F. 466.)

PARTITION—INTERLOCUTORY DECREE.

Where it appears, on partition of property which cannot be equitably divided by metes and bounds, but must be sold, that a contest is pending in probate court between certain of the parties over the interest of a deceased co-tenant, the court may make an interlocutory decree, definitely fixing the proportion to which each party is entitled, so far as undisputed, and also the quantity belonging to the estate of the deceased co-tenant, leaving the rights of the contesting claimants, as between themselves, to be determined by the probate court.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Suit for partition by Adam Grant against Daniel T. Murphy and others. From the interlocutory decree, defendants Mary Helen Dominguez and others appeal. Affirmed.

Metcalf & Metcalf and A. A. Moore (George D. Metcalf and Myrick & Deering, of counsel), for appellants. Lloyd & Wood, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal from an interlocutory decree in a suit for partition. The point made by the appellants is that the decree does not determine the interest of all the various parties in the premises, and that for this reason it is invalid, and should be reversed. The facts found by the court and admitted by the parties, which are necessary to be noticed, are these: The premises consist of a city lot in San Francisco, upon which there is a large business building; and it is found by the court, and admitted, that it cannot be divided, but must be sold. On the 3d day of June, 1885, the owners of the premises were Adam Grant and Daniel T. Murphy, each owning an undivided half as tenant in common with the other. On that day the said Daniel T. Murphy died, leaving a will; and afterwards his half of the property was distributed by the proper probate court as follows: One-half thereof, or six twenty-fourths of the whole property, to his widow, Anna L. Murphy, and one twenty-fourth to each of his six children, Eugene K. L. Murphy, Daniel T. Murphy, Samuel J. Murphy, Mary Helen Murphy (now Mary Helen Dominguez), Frances Josephine Murphy, and Mary Margaret Isabella Murphy. There was also another daughter, Anna Wolseley (formerly Anna Murphy), to whom nothing was given by the will of said deceased. Daniel T. Murphy and Samuel J. Murphy each afterwards conveyed his one twenty-fourth to the plaintiff herein, so that at the time of the decree the plaintiff was the owner of fourteen twenty-fourths of the premises. Afterwards the widow, Anna L. Murphy, died, leaving a will, by which it is claimed by some of the parties that she devised her six twenty-fourths to her three daughters, the aforesaid Mary Helen Dominguez, Frances Josephine, and Mary Margaret Isabella. This will was admitted to probate in the superior court of Alameda county, but it was afterwards contested by the brothers and said Anna Wolseley, and the probate thereof was set aside by the court. But upon appeal the judgment of the said superior court was reversed in this court, and judgment ordered admitting the said will to probate. After the remittitur went down, however, another appeal was taken, which is still pending. The said three daughters of Anna L. Murphy, deceased, who claim under her will as aforesaid, set up in their answers that each of them, in addition to the ownership of one twenty-fourth part of the premises, is also entitled to an undivided one-third of the one-fourth of said lands held by their said mother. The defendant Victor H. Metcalf, who is the administrator of the estate of said Anna L. Murphy, deceased, set up in his answer that the estate was the owner of the undivided one-fourth of said premises. The said Anna Wolseley, Daniel T. Murphy, and Samuel J. Murphy filed answers, in which they denied the validity of the said will of their mother, Anna L. Murphy, and set up that each is entitled to an undivided one-seventh of the undivided one-fourth of said premises, which belonged to their mother at the time of her death. The said Eugene K. L. Murphy also died, leaving a will, and there is a contest between his heirs and certain trustees named in his will as to his one twenty-fourth of the premises; but, as there is no appeal taken by the trustees or heirs, or any other person, from that part of the decree which disposes of his one twenty-fourth, that part of the decree need not be here considered. The court found, and the interlocutory decree adjudges, that the plaintiff is the owner of fourteen twenty-fourths of the premises; that Mary Helen Dominguez is the owner of one twenty-fourth; that Frances Josephine Murphy is the owner of one twenty-fourth; that Mary Margaret Isabella Murphy is the owner of one twenty-fourth; and that the successors in interest of Eugene K. L. Murphy, deceased, are the owners of one twenty-fourth; and there is no objection made by any one to those parts of the findings and decree above stated. However, as to the remaining one-fourth, or six twenty-fourths, which belonged to Anna L. Murphy at the time of her death, the court finds that it belongs to those who are entitled to the real estate of which said Anna L. Murphy died seised, but does not determine who of the several parties are so entitled, and in what proportion they are entitled. The decree determines that said one-fourth is in the estate of said Anna L. Murphy, deceased, but leaves it to the probate court, where the administration of said estate is pending, to determine how it should be distributed. From this decree Mary Helen Dominguez, Frances Josephine Murphy, Mary Margaret Isabella Murphy, and Victor H. Metcalf, administrator, appeal; and the point made by them for reversal is that the decree does not definitely ascertain and determine who of the various parties are entitled to the interest of the said Anna L. Murphy, deceased, and in what proportion they are so entitled. This is the only question presented in the case.

Under these circumstances it would seem just to allow the sale to be made, leaving that part of the proceeds which goes to the successors in interest of Anna L. Murphy, deceased, to await the determination of the said contest in the probate court; but, under former decisions of this court, and the provisions of the Code upon the subject, the question involved is not free from difficulty. If the court below had retained the case for a reasonable time, to allow the probate court to determine the contest before it,—a course pursued by courts of equity in early times, when they held that they could not try title in an action for partition,—some embarrassment which now arises might perhaps have been avoided. But we have to take the case as we find it, and the question now is, must the decree be reversed for the said reasons urged by appellants? It seems to be settled by the authorities that, as a general rule, all parties to an action for partition are actors; that each party, whether plaintiff or defendant, has the same rights, other things being equal, as any other party; that each party may set up in his pleading the nature and extent of his interest in the premises involved, and have the same ascertained and adjudicated; that the adjudication must appear in the interlocutory decree; that these principles apply ordinarily to a case where the premises cannot be divided, and must be sold, as well as to a case where there can be a strict partition; and that a decree which does not adjudicate the interests of the respective parties is invalid. Morenhout v. Higuera, 32 Cal. 290; De Uprey v. De Uprey, 27 Cal. 336; Bollo v. Navarro, 33 Cal. 459; Lorenz v. Jacobs, 53 Cal. 24; Emeric v. Alvarado, 64 Cal. 529, 2 Pac. 418; Stevens v. McCormick, 90 Va. 735, 19 S. E. 742; Freem. Coten. § 516. It is to be observed, however, that in the cases above cited the subject was being dealt with generally, and not in view of any such particular phase of the question as is presented by the case at bar. In some of the cases there had been no ascertainment or adjudication at all by the trial court of the interests of any of the parties to the action. In the case at bar a sale of the premises was confessedly necessary. The interests of all the parties in the proceeds of the sale were definitely settled by the decree, except only the interests, as between themselves, of certain parties who were contesting claimants of the interest of a deceased co-tenant; the quantity of interest which belonged to said co-tenant at the time of her death, and which became part of her estate, was also definitely determined; and a contest between said claimants involving their conflicting rights to said deceased co-tenant's interest had been inaugurated, and was pending and undetermined, in the probate court, which had full jurisdiction of that subject. These facts, or facts similar to them, did not exist in any of the cases to which our attention has been called; and they cannot, therefore, be held as determining definitely how the law should be applied to a peculiar condition not contemplated when the decisions were made. For instance, Lorenz v. Jacobs, 53 Cal. 24, and De Uprey v. De Uprey, 27 Cal. 330, are the only cases decided by this court which involved a decree for the sale of the land instead of a partition by metes and bounds. In the Lorenz Case, the trial court had decreed a sale of the water ditch involved, without having ascertained or determined the interest of any one party to the action; and the De Uprey Case involves questions of pleading, practice, parties, variance, etc., which are quite different from the question presented in the case at bar. Therefore, general expressions used in the opinions in those two cases are to be taken as pertinent to the facts then before the court and the questions there involved, and not as applicable to and determinative of a question not then in contemplation. We think, therefore, that the question now before us is, so far as former decisions go, an open one; and, as the conclusion of the court below is apparently a just one, the decree should not be reversed unless it is violative of some statutory provision.

The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure upon the subject of partition are not extremely clear and definite, and some of them are almost irreconcilably inconsistent and contradictory. They certainly do not define with precision the proper procedure to be taken if the action should come to the point reached in the case at bar, namely, where a co-tenant had died, and, although the quantity of interest going to his estate had been definitely ascertained, there was a contest between claimants of his estate pending in the proper probate court, which could not be ousted of the jurisdiction of such contest. Of course, in such a case, neither a plaintiff nor a defendant other than the said contestants can have any control over the proceedings in the probate court, and new complications might arise from deaths of other parties. Must they wait until proceedings which they cannot hasten have terminated in the probate court, and which might remain there unsettled for many years, or may they proceed to a division, leaving the contestants to a particular interest to settle their claims among themselves in the proper court? We think that the latter course is a proper and just one, and within the general scope of the law and the jurisdiction of the court, at least where there is to be a sale of the entire premises and a deposit of the proceeds in court. We need not inquire whether the rule could be properly applied to a case of strict partition of the premises by metes and bounds. Appellants rely a good deal upon section 759, Code Civ. Proc., and respondents upon section 774; and it is very difficult to construe the two sections so that both can stand,—which, of course, ought to be done, if possible. Section 759 provides that: "When a sale of the premises is necessary, the title must be ascertained by proof to the satisfaction of the court, before the judgment of sale can be made; * * * except that where there are several unknown persons having an interest in the property, their rights may be considered together in the action, and not as between themselves." But section 774 provides that: "When the proceeds of the sale of any share or parcel belonging to persons who are parties to the action, and who are known, are paid into court, the action may be continued, as between such parties, for the determination of their respective claims thereto, which must be ascertained and adjudged by the court;" and provision is made for further evidence, pleadings, etc. No very satisfactory construction of these two apparently conflicting sections is given by counsel for either side. We do not, however, consider it necessary in the case at bar to absolutely determine what these sections, taken together, mean; for they evidently cannot be applied to the particular condition of this case. They clearly apply only to issues over which the court in which the partition suit is pending has jurisdiction. "The court" mentioned in either section is the court into which the parties had been brought by the action for partition, and both sections are based upon the assumption that the matters therein mentioned are matters over which that court had jurisdiction. But where the estate of a deceased co-tenant is unsettled, and the administration thereof is pending in the proper probate court, and there is also pending there a contest between heirs and devisees as to who are the rightful owners of the interest of such deceased co-tenant, there is no jurisdiction in the court in which the partition suit is pending to hear and determine the issues between the hostile claimants of the interest of the deceased co-tenant; such jurisdiction is in the probate court. And where, as in the case at bar, the court has determined all matters over which it has jurisdiction, and has definitely ascertained all the interests of all the co-tenants, except only the issues between contesting claimants in the probate court of the interest of a deceased co-tenant, over which issues it has no jurisdiction, and the premises must be sold in order to effect a just division, there a decree of sale leaving the rights of said contesting claimants to be determined in the court having jurisdiction thereof is proper, is warranted by the general law of partition, and is not violative of any provision of the Code. Section 786, which provides that the referees who make the sale may take a purchaser's receipt for his share of the proceeds, is not determinative of the question. There are other instances provided for by the Code in which it could not be applied. The decree is affirmed.

APPEAL—REVIEW—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The findings of the trial court as to the location of a division line will not be disturbed where the evidence is conflicting.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by Victor Ponet against William Le Moyne Wills and Charlotte Wills, in which there were findings and judgment for plaintiff. From an order denying their motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Geo. H. Smith and Smith & Winder, for appellants. J. Brousseau, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Action to quiet title. Findings and judgment were for the plaintiff, and defendants appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial, upon the ground that the findings are not justified by the evidence.

Plaintiff and defendants own contiguous lots in the city of Los Angeles, fronting on Buena Vista street, formerly known as Eternity street. Said street runs nearly north and south. Bellevue avenue, formerly known as Short street, crosses Buena Vista street at a point north of the premises in dispute, and plaintiff's lot lies on the north side of defendants' lot. Plaintiff alleges that defendants entered upon his lot in 1893, and erected a fence thereon parallel to his south side line, and 11.2 feet north thereof, and claim to own said land so fenced off from plaintiff's lot, or that they have some adverse interest therein. The sole question is as to the true location of the line between said lots. That the evidence in this case is conflicting is apparent from the briefs of counsel of the respective parties, as well as from the evidence contained in the record. An extended discussion of the evidence is, therefore, unnecessary. The lot now owned by plaintiff was conveyed by the city of Los Angeles to Carlos Cruz, July 11, 1868, by the following description: "All that certain piece or lot of land situated, lying, and being in the city and county of Los Angeles, bounded and described as follows, to wit: Facing on Eternity street in said city sixty (60) feet and back in depth one hundred and sixty-five (165) feet; bounded north by Henry Bohring and south by city lands, as appears by a map made 8th July, 1868, by L. Seebold, deputy county surveyor." This conveyance was made upon the petition of Carlos Cruz, accompanied by said map, a copy of which is attached to the findings and to the complaint. This map shows that the south line of the Bohring lot, which is also the north line of the Cruz lot, is 241 feet south of the south line of Short street (now Bellevue avenue), and also shows a house upon the Cruz lot, the north side of which coincides with the north line of the lot. The answer alleges, and the court finds, "that defendant Charlotte L. Wills is the owner of lot 4, block E, of the Fort Hill tract, according to the survey of L. Seebold, made in July and August, 1868, and adopted as the official map No. 3 by the mayor and council of Los Angeles, November 17, 1868." Said lot was conveyed by the city to Jacob Hommel, December 29, 1884, the deed referring to said map made by Seebold last above mentioned. Appellants contend that these two maps were made by the same surveyor, from the same survey, and therefore the conveyances under which the parties respectively claim do not conflict; that respondent attempts to establish his case by measuring from the south line of Bellevue avenue as it is now established, assuming that it is the same as the south line of Short street as it existed at the time of Seebold's survey; appellants further contending that the lines of Short street have been changed by the city council so that the south line of Bellevue avenue is now 20.2 feet further south than the south line of Short street as shown by Ord's survey of 1849. This change is exhibited by a map made by A. Solano in 1894, put in evidence by appellants, purporting to show the lines of Short street by Ord's survey, also the lines of the same street according to a resolution of the council made in 1875, and the present lines of Bellevue avenue, which coincide with the lines fixed in 1875 so far as its intersection with the west line of Buena Vista street is concerned, though there is a material divergence as the lines of the street are extended westerly. It is apparent that from July, 1875, at least, the northeast corner of an adobe house situated at the southwest corner of Bellevue avenue and Buena Vista street marked the south line of Short street at its intersection with the west line of Buena Vista street; and if we assume that on July 8, 1868,—at the time Seebold made the survey and map of the lot conveyed by the city to Carlos Cruz,—the south line of Short street intersected the west line of Buena Vista street at the same point, the court below rightly found in favor of the plaintiff.

Upon this point the plaintiff called several witnesses, who gave testimony tending to show that there had been no change in the south line of Short street at its intersection with Buena Vista street since said survey and map were made. But the map made by Seebold for Carlos Cruz presents stronger evidence, if not of the true location of the south line of Short street as it existed in 1868, at least of the point which he took as the initial point of his survey, and which he assumed to be the south line of Short street; and, if said initial point can be determined, it must control, whether he was mistaken as to the location of the line of the street or not, as it will identify the precise boundaries of the land conveyed to Cruz. Upon said map Seebold marked a house, the north side of which coincides with the north line of the Cruz lot now owned by the plaintiff, and which is identical with the north line of the lot as marked in green lines upon defendants' Exhibit A, which, if correctly located, shows defendants' encroachment of 11.2 feet. The house so marked by Seebold was, according to his survey, 241 feet from the point which he took as the south line of Short street. Mr. Botello testified that he had a faint recollection of that house; that it was built of wood, and was located about 28 or 30 feet from the house in which his mother now lives. Applying the scale to Solano's map, we find the distance from the adobe house marked "Isabel Acuna" to plaintiff's north line, as designated by the green lines, to be 30 feet, and that line is 241 feet from the northeast corner of the adobe house which marks the south line of Bellevue avenue at its intersection with the north line of Buena Vista street. Mrs. Donaciana Reihm, who lives on the Bohring lot, testified that there was a house on the northeast corner of the Cruz lot, very near to the house in which she is now living; that it adjoined her lot, and was right on the line; and the house Cruz lived in in the seventies was there at the corner; that house has been torn down. That Cruz lived in the house at the northeast corner of his lot was also testified to by Emil Dubordieu, though there was testimony to the effect that Cruz lived in another house, near the south side of the lot. Mr. Botello also testified that he lived on the Bohring lot 11 or 12 years, in a house which was a foot and a half or two feet on the Cruz lot. This house was not the adobe house in which his mother now lives. The witness called it a cottage. Solano's map shows a building abutting on the south line of the Bohring lot, but it is not designated by any name. Whether it is the cottage to which the witness refers, the record does not show, unless by inference. If that be the house mentioned by Mr. Botello, the blue lines on Solano's map, which purport to be made according to Seebold's survey, instead of cutting off "a foot and a half or two feet" of said house, cut off about 18 feet. It is not probable that Seebold would show on the map he made for Carlos Cruz a house on the Cruz lot abutting the north line, when in fact the line cut off 18 feet of a house on the Bohring lot, without noting that fact also. There is also evidence tending to show that a house was built on what was supposed to be the Cruz lot, near the south line; that it was burned about 1880, but that the excavation made for it is still visible, the greater part of which is between the fence built by the defendant and the north line of plaintiff's lot as shown by the findings of the court. We think the evidence we have referred to is quite sufficient to sustain the findings, and the fact that it shows that Seebold must have taken the south line of Short street to be marked by the adobe house which now marks the south line of Bellevue avenue does not affect the case, even though the true south line of Short street was at that time 20 feet further north. No other questions are discussed by counsel. We think that the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

LAMBERSON et al. v. JEFFERDS, County Auditor. (Sac. 231.)

APPEAL BY COUNTY—BOND.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1058, declaring that in a civil action no appeal bond can be required of the state or any officer thereof who is a party in his official capacity, "or of any county," etc., without mentioning county officers, applies to an appeal by a county auditor where the county is the real party in interest.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; Wheaton A. Gray, Judge.

Action by Charles G. Lamberson and others against E. W. Jefferds, auditor of Tulare county. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appealed, and plaintiffs move to dismiss the appeal. Motion denied.

F. B. Howard, Dist. Atty., and T. C. Clark, Dep. Dist. Atty., for appellant. Power & Alford and Lamberson & Middlecoff, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. Respondent asks that the appeal herein be dismissed on the ground that no undertaking on appeal was given, nor was there an order of court dispensing with the undertaking, as authorized by section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Appellant claims that his case comes within the provisions of section 1058 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows: "Any civil action or proceeding wherein the state, or the people of the state, is a party plaintiff, or any state officer, in his official capacity, or in behalf of the state, or any county, city and county, city, or town, is a party plaintiff or defendant, no bond, written undertaking or security can be required of the state, or the people thereof, or any officer thereof, or of any county, city and county, city, or town; but on complying with the other provisions of this Code, the state, or the people thereof, or any state officer acting in his official capacity, have the same rights, remedies and benefits as if the bond, undertaking or security were given and approved, as required by this Code." It will be observed that the section makes special mention of the state and state officers, but, while it mentions counties, it omits the mention of county officers; hence it is argued with considerable force that the design was to exclude them. And as it is provided in section 940 that no appeal is effectual unless an undertaking be given, every exception must be express, and none can be implied. The county is, however, the real party in interest. It was held in Scheerer v. Edgar, 67 Cal. 377, 7 Pac. 760, that in such matters the auditor does not act in his individual right, but in that of the city and county. For that reason it was held that section 946 was applicable, and the court might, by order, dispense with the undertaking. If that be so, the county is the real party in interest, and the case is evidently within the reason of the rule laid down as to counties. But it is said the respondent can only get judgment for costs against the individual. That is also the case where a state officer is a party. Sections 1038 and 1039 only authorize costs to be paid from the state or county treasury when the state or county—as the case may be—is a party. It has been held that the auditor is not protected by an order of the board of supervisors allowing a claim which cannot be a charge against the county. Linden v. Case, 46 Cal. 171; Connor v. Morris, 23 Cal. 447; Carroll v. Siebenthaler, 37 Cal. 193. If he refuses to issue a warrant for an illegal claim, he is acting for the county, and is protecting it against the unlawful acts of the board of supervisors. If the auditor of a county or the comptroller of state refuse to issue a warrant, improperly, and when there is no just cause to doubt the validity of the claim, he would have no just claim against the state or the county for reimbursement, and may justly be cast in costs. Dispensing with the undertaking does not necessarily imply that a personal judgment for costs or damages may not be rendered. The main question—whether the county being the real party in interest brings this case within the purview of the statute or not—is determined, in my opinion, by the case of People v. Supervisors of Marin Co., 10 Cal. 344. It was provided in an act concerning appeals in certain cases (St. 1856, p. 26) that a city or county or town may appeal from a judgment against it, and have a stay of proceedings, without filing a bond. In the case mentioned the appeal was by the board of supervisors from a judgment against it awarding a writ of mandamus. That act made no express mention of the officers of such city, county, or town, and yet the supreme court held the statute applicable to the board of supervisors. I think this establishes a rule of construction directly applicable to this case, and I see no good reason for changing it. The motion is denied.

GILLIAM v. BROWN et al. (L. A. 212.)

CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT — WARRANTY — INSTRUCTION—SUBMISSION TO JURY OF QUESTION OF LAW.

1. In a contract to construct a ditch, which was guarantied to carry all the water of a creek for two years after its completion, the guaranty is in the nature of a warranty, and does not require the contractor to wait for two years after completion of the ditch before being entitled to payment therefor.

2. The question of whether the levy of an assessment by a company on its members for the purpose of paying for a ditch for which the company had contracted constituted an acceptance from the contractor of the ditch as then constructed is one of law, and its submission to a jury for determination is erroneous.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; A. R. Conklin, Judge.

Action by T. J. Gilliam against Andrew Brown and others on a contract. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

B. Brundege, for appellants. E. Rousseau, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an action upon a contract whereby plaintiff agreed to construct a ditch. The defendants are associated farmers of Kern county. The complaint charges them as partners in a certain ditch under the firm name of the Whitney Creek Ditch Company. Plaintiff avers that he and defendants entered into an agreement in writing, whereby he agreed to construct the ditch, for which defendants contracted to pay $1,000; that he constructed the ditch, and defendants accepted it as complete, but have not paid. The defendants, besides their denials of plaintiff's allegations, aver that plaintiff contracted to make an open cut along a described line from Whitney creek, at a depth below the creek, and of capacity sufficient to carry all the water that Whitney creek contains at all times, into the south fork of Kern river, to complete the work within two years, and to maintain such cut in such condition that it will divert and carry all the waters of the creek for two years after the completion thereof, and they charge that he has failed to perform this contract. The only evidence of a written contract at the trial consisted of a written proposal for bids, signed by certain persons as trustees, representing themselves to be trustees of the Whitney Creek Ditch Company, and plaintiff's acceptance thereof. The proposal for bids was as follows: "Notice to Bidders. Whitney Creek Ditch Co. According to the decision of the members of the above company, bids will be received by the trustees of above company for a contract to make a cut where the tunnel now is. The cut to be made so as to convey all the water that Whitney creek contains at all times. The successful bidder to guaranty and see that all the water of said creek runs through the cut for two years from completion of the work. The successful bidder to give bonds for double the amount of his bid. Work to commence not later than June 1, 1892. Bids will be opened on November 10, 1891, in presence of the bidders, by the full board of trustees. The trustees reserve the right to reject any and all bids. By order of the company. South Fork, September 14, 1891. [Signed] Wm. Scodie, Frank Fugitt, C. J. E. Taylor, Trustees." In his bid, plaintiff agree to fulfill the requirements of the trustees set out in the notice inviting the same. By the terms of this contract, as shown by the proposal for bids, plaintiff was entitled to his money when a cut was made sufficient in capacity and grade to carry all the waters of Whitney creek at all times. The guaranty that all the water shall run through the cut for two years was in the nature of a warranty. For that the company took the responsibility of the plaintiff. He was not required to wait for the two years, and then show that the ditch had carried all the water at all times, to enable him to recover. This view shows that many matters over which there was much controversy at the trial were immaterial. Upon every material point there was a conflict of evidence, and, whether the verdict was in accordance with the preponderance of testimony or not, we cannot say that it was unsupported by testimony.

Plaintiff contended that he had fully performed his contract, and was on that ground entitled to his pay. He also contended that the defendants had accepted the ditch as completed. This was not, as contended by counsel for defendants, a claim that the contract had been varied, but that the defendants had accepted the work, and thereby agreed that it had been done in all respects as required, or, if it had not been fully performed, that further performance was waived. It was competent for the parties to accept the work done, and to bind themselves to pay for it, although the contract had not been fully performed. If this is an alteration of the contract, it was at once an executed agreement. I do not therefore deem the refusal to give the instruction asked by defendants upon the subject of the verbal alterations of written contracts injurious, even if the instructions were not substantially given elsewhere by the court.

The instruction in regard to the levy of an assessment is of doubtful import, but seems to tell the jury that it is for them to determine whether the levy of an assessment of $1,000 was an alteration of the contract to the extent that it constituted an acceptance of the work. This was doubly erroneous. The so-called "levy" of an assessment could not of itself constitute an acceptance of the work, and, if it did, it would do so as a matter of law, and its effect would be for the court to declare. I do not find in the record any evidence whatever of an acceptance of the work. An agreement to pay the workmen, while denying that the contract has been performed, and claiming that nothing is due plaintiff, would not constitute such acceptance. For this reason, also, the instruction was erroneous. Quite likely the verdict was based upon this proposition.

For these reasons, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

McLAUGHLIN v. CLAUSSEN. (L. A. 172.)

DISMISSAL FOR WANT OF PROSECUTION—DISCRETION OF COURT.

It is not an abuse of discretion for a court to dismiss an action for want of prosecution where it was dropped from the calendar nearly three years before by a verbal agreement between the attorneys, not authorized by the defendant, to await the determination of another action; there being no agreement filed as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 283.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by James McLaughlin against Henry Claussen on a note. From a judgment dismissing the action for want of prosecution, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

P. W. Dooner, for appellant. Schutze & Luckel, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action upon a promissory note for $400 executed by the defendant to the plaintiff on December 27, 1887, and payable four months after date, with interest. The complaint was filed October 27, 1888. The answer admitted the making of the note, and that plaintiff was the owner and holder thereof, and that no part of the same had been paid. It then set up facts which it was claimed constituted a defense to the action. The plaintiff demurred to the answer upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense, and the demurrer was sustained. The defendant declined to amend his answer, and thereupon judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff. From that judgment the defendant appealed to this court, where it was held that the facts set up in the answer were sufficient, if true, to constitute a defense to the action. The judgment was accordingly reversed, and the court below was directed to overrule the demurrer. McLaughlin v. Clausen, 85 Cal. 322, 24 Pac. 636. The remittitur was filed in the court below on September 19, 1890. Thereafter, as shown by the minutes of the court, the case was on April 6, 1891, "set for trial April 28, 1891." On the last-named day the "trial of cause passed by consent." On July 6, 1891, the case went "over." On October 5, 1891, the case went "over." On January 5, 1892, the case went "off calendar." Nothing more appears to have been done in the case until October 15, 1895, when plaintiff caused a writ of attachment to be issued and levied on the property of defendant. On October 23, 1895, defendant served and filed notice that he would move the court to dismiss the action upon the ground that "plaintiff has failed and neglected to prosecute this action, and has willfully kept this action pending for an unreasonable length of time without making any effort whatever to bring it to trial." The motion was heard on November 4, 1895, and granted; and, three days later, judgment dismissing the action was duly filed and entered of record. From that judgment the plaintiff appeals.

At the hearing of the motion the judgment roll, the minutes of the court, and the remittitur in the former appeal, and also the remittitur in the case of Witmer Bros. Co. v. Weid, 108 Cal. 569, 41 Pac. 491, which was filed in the court below on September 28, 1895, were produced and called to the attention of the court, and affidavits on behalf of the respective parties were introduced and read. That the court had power to dismiss the action for want of prosecution is settled law. Grigsby v. Napa Co., 36 Cal. 585; Simmons v. Keller, 50 Cal. 38; Pardy v. Montgomery, 77 Cal. 326, 19 Pac. 530; Kubli v. Hawkett, 89 Cal. 638, 27 Pac. 57. And the only question is, did it abuse its discretion in so doing? It will be observed that there is nothing in the record, except the affidavit read for plaintiff, showing that any order of the court postponing the case, after that of April 28, 1891, was made with the knowledge or consent of the defendant or his attorney. The names of the attorneys were placed on the calendar when it was made up by the clerk before the case was called, but, so far as appears, the orders may have been made in the absence of the attorneys for both sides. The affidavit read for the plaintiff was made by his attorney, Mr. Dooner, and it stated that "the orders of April 28, 1891, July 6, 1891, October 5, 1891, and January 5, 1892, were made and entered by the consent of the parties in open court; this affiant representing the plaintiff, and John Robarts, now deceased, representing the defendant, therein." It further stated, in substance, that the cause of the last continuance was as follows: That affiant had instructions to commence the suit of Witmer Bros. Co. v. Weid as soon as practicable, under the difficulties of procuring the necessary evidence therein; that this suit would be based upon the promissory notes of Weid, made to McLaughlin and assigned to the Witmer Bros. Co., of the same date and under the same contract of subsidy as the Claussen notes; that a question as to the sufficient delivery of the Weid notes would be likely to arise under the refusal of said Weid to regularly deliver his said subsidy notes, while no such facts existed in the case of the delivery of the notes of Claussen; "that affiant and the said Robarts were both of the opinion, and so expressed such opinion, each to the other, that the determination of the issues in the case of Witmer Bros. Co. v. Weid, aforesaid, would, in all reasonable probability, determine the rights of the parties in the present case"; that in the month of January, 1892, affiant informed Robarts "that he had such instructions, and that in the event that final judgment should go against the plaintiff in the case of Witmer Bros. Co. v. Weid, aforesaid, he would advise the dismissal of the above-entitled cause, but that otherwise it should be regularly set for trial and tried; that said cause was thereupon, and in pursuance of said understanding, taken off the calendar by consent of the parties plaintiff and defendant as aforesaid"; that thereafter, in April, 1893, the action of Witmer Bros. Co. v. Weid was commenced, and on March 3, 1894, judgment therein was rendered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, which said judgment was thereafter affirmed upon appeal; and that in July, 1894, Robarts died. A counter affidavit, made by defendant, was read, in which it was stated, in substance, that, when the supreme court rendered its decision in this case, affiant was told by his attorneys that that decision had settled the whole case, and that it would never again be tried; that he never authorized Mr. Robarts to continue the case or keep it pending, as stated in the affidavit of Mr. Dooner, or at all; on the contrary, his instructions to his attorneys had all along been to push the case to a final determination, and they well knew that he wanted the case pushed to a trial, if any trial was to be had in it; that "there never was a written stipulation to continue and keep in abeyance this action between the said Dooner and the said Robarts, and, if said Robarts did make such a stipulation by parol, he did it without any authority from me, and against my positive instructions in the case." Under this showing, we cannot say that the court abused its discretion in making the order. Section 283 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "An attorney and counselor shall have authority: (1) To bind his client in any of the steps of an action or proceeding by his agreement filed with the clerk or entered upon the minutes of the court, and not otherwise." It is not pretended that there was any agreement filed with the clerk, or entered upon the minutes of the court in regard to the continuance of this case pending the decision in the proposed Witmer Bros. Co. case; and, if any verbal stipulation as to the matter was made, it was executory, and not binding upon either party. Borkheim v. Insurance Co., 38 Cal. 623. Verbal stipulations with reference to proceedings in pending actions cannot be regarded, except so far as they are admitted by the parties against whom they are sought to be enforced, or have been wholly or in part executed. Reese v. Mahoney, 21 Cal. 306; Smith v. Whittier, 95 Cal. 279, 30 Pac. 529. And, if a party against whom a verbal stipulation is invoked denies that such a stipulation was made, the court will not hear the parties for the purpose of settling the dispute. Johnson v. Sweeney, 95 Cal. 304, 30 Pac. 540. The rule invoked by appellant, that "he who seeks equity must do equity," is universally recognized in courts of justice, but we fail to see how it can have any application to this case. It certainly was not incumbent upon the defendant to pay the note sued on before he could move the court to dismiss the action. The judgment, in our opinion, should be affirmed.

McFARLAND and HENSHAW, JJ. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

TEMPLE, J. I do not think section 283 of the Code of Civil Procedure has any application to the facts of this case, but I concur in the judgment, because I think plaintiff failed to excuse his delay.

ADAMS v. CRAWFORD et al. (L. A. 216.)

RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL—QUIETING TITLE—LOCATION OF MINING CLAIMS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—TRIAL BY THE COURT—FINDINGS—APPEAL—REVIEW.

1. It is not error to refuse a jury trial where the party demanding it did not comply with the rule of court requiring such party to deposit the jury fees with the clerk.

2. In an action in which the issue was whether defendants' location of two mining claims was valid, their evidence was that monuments were erected at the center of each end of the two claims, and also at each of the four corners of each claim; that notices of location were posted on the initial monument of each of the claims, and were duly recorded. The notices, which were in evidence, appeared to be sufficient. Plaintiff and his witnesses admitted that they found the initial monument on each claim near the point where plaintiff had first discovered ore, but that they "saw" no other monuments, though they looked for them. Held, that findings for defendants would not be disturbed.

3. In an action to quiet title to mining claims, the complaint was in the usual form in actions to quiet title, under Code Civ. Proc. § 738, except that it did not call on defendants to set out their interest, title, or claim. It alleged that defendants were in possession, and that title and ownership were in plaintiff. Held, that defendants could prove a valid location by them prior to plaintiff's location, under a general denial, and without setting out in their answer the facts showing their ownership, or alleging title by location.

4. A question not raised below nor presented on the record cannot be considered on appeal upon the suggestion of counsel in his brief.

5. The court need not make findings as to merely probative facts.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Riverside county; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Action by H. R. Adams against J. S. Crawford and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. B. Cole, for appellant. Wilfred M. Peck, Wm. J. Hunsaker, J. S. Callen, L. Gill, and John M. Lucas, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. This action is prosecuted by the plaintiff to quiet title to a certain mining claim, called the "Adams Mine." The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and written findings were filed in favor of the defendants. This appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying the plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

Appellant's first contention is that the court erred in denying plaintiff a trial by jury. The record shows that on the day of the trial no jury was in attendance, nor had any been demanded or ordered for the trial of said cause; that after the cause was called for trial, and the parties respectively announced that they were ready, the plaintiff for the first time demanded that said cause be tried by jury. The complaint was not verified, and the defendants' answer denied each and every allegation of the complaint. Rule 28 of the superior court of Riverside county, in which said action was tried, is as follows: "A party demanding a jury trial shall deposit the jury fees with the clerk within five days after making such demand. Should a trial of an action by a jury continue for more than one day, the party demanding the jury shall deposit with the clerk at or before the opening of the court, on each day, the jury fees for each day so occupied in the trial." The plaintiff did not then make, nor had he at any time made or offered to make such deposit. We think the court did not err in denying plaintiff's demand for a jury trial, because the rule of the court above quoted was reasonable, and had not been complied with. Therefore we need not inquire whether this particular action was in its nature equitable or not.

Appellant also contends that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings. This controversy is over a mining claim situated in the Chuckawalla range of mountains, about 40 miles northeast from Salton, in Riverside county. The plaintiff and one Bailey discovered the lode on the 12th of April, 1894, but left without making any location. Plaintiff returned to San Bernardino, but went back on the 8th day of May to locate the claim, and made a location thereon on the 9th day of May, 1894. Prior to the plaintiff's location, namely, on the 28th of April, 1894, the defendants found and located said claim. At the time the plaintiff and Bailey first discovered the lode in question, they dug down to the depth of 18 or 20 inches, and took out some specimens of ore, which the plaintiff took with him to San Bernardino to have tested. A sufficient test was made upon the ground to ascertain that the ore contained gold. Bailey then said he did not want the claim. It appears that Bailey subsequently informed some of the defendants of the discovery made, and gave some directions that might aid them in finding it. They succeeded in finding it, and made their locations at the time above stated; one locating the claim from the discovery northward, and others locating a claim from the same point southward. The court found as follows: "First. That plaintiff was not at the time of the commencement of this action, is not now, and never has been, the owner of the real property described in plaintiff's complaint, or of any part thereof. Second. That the defendants answering herein are the owners of said real property, and of every part thereof." As a conclusion of law the court decided that the plaintiff take nothing by his action. The discovery of the ore by Adams on April 12th vested in him no right or title to the property. The discovery is but one step in acquiring title to a mining claim. It must be followed by a location, which consists of the marking of the claim by monuments so that its boundaries can be readily traced, the posting of a notice thereon, and, where the state or district law requires it, the recording of such notice. It is therefore clear that, if the defendants' location is valid, the plaintiff acquired no right by his subsequent location, made some two weeks after the location made by defendants. The testimony on the part of the defendants shows that monuments were erected at the center of each end of the two claims, and also at each of the four corners of each of said claims; that notices of location were posted on the initial monument of each of these claims; that the notices were duly recorded. And these notices, which were put in evidence by the defendants, appear to be sufficient in every respect. As against this, the plaintiff and his witnesses, in rebuttal, admitted that they found the initial monument on each claim near the point where the plaintiff had first discovered ore, but that they "saw" no other monuments, though they looked for them. The most that can be said of this rebuttal testimony is that it tended to raise a conflict with the affirmative testimony given on the part of defendants, and in such case we cannot disturb the findings of the trial court.

The claim running northerly from the point of discovery was made by Felix Lohrer. Counsel for appellant says in his brief, "There was no evidence that Felix Lohrer was a citizen of the United States, or had ever made application to become one." This location notice recites that he is a citizen of the United States, over the age of 21 years. There is no specification of the invalidity of his location upon the ground that he was not a citizen, nor was any objection made to the introduction of the notice on that ground. This question was not raised in the court below, nor is it presented upon the record, and it cannot now be considered upon the suggestion of counsel in his brief.

Appellant also contends that the court failed to find upon several issues. The specifications in that regard are all of probative facts, such as that the court failed to find whether the plaintiff made a valid location, whether the allegations of certain paragraphs of the complaint were true, and other matters of like character. The court found, as ultimate facts, that the plaintiff is not, and was not at any time, the owner of the property described in the complaint, and that the defendants are the owners of said property. These are the ultimate facts in the case, and include the finding of all probative facts necessary to sustain the finding of the ultimate facts.

Several errors are alleged to have been committed by the court in its rulings upon the admission and rejection of evidence. Most of these rulings are upon immaterial matters, which could not control or affect the material facts in the case, and therefore need not be noticed. Some others, however, should receive brief attention.

Defendant Crawford was asked by his counsel: "State when you first discovered this claim." Answer: "On April 27, 1894." A general objection was made at this point to what the witness did with reference to any discovery of the mine in question; among other things, upon the ground that no such issue was made by the pleadings in the case. The objection was overruled, and the plaintiff excepted. This objection was made to a number of other questions put to the defendants or their witnesses, and like rulings were made. The complaint was in the usual form in actions to quiet title under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure, with the exception that it did not call upon the defendants to set out their interest, title, or claim. The complaint not being verified, the defendants denied generally all its allegations. The objection above noticed seems to be based upon the ground that the defendants did not set out in their answer the facts showing their ownership of the mining ground in dispute, or allege title by location. In support of his contention, counsel quotes Landregan v. Peppin, 94 Cal. 465, 29 Pac. 771, where the court said, "And unquestionably it is the duty of the defendant to set out his interest, whatever it may be, when called upon, under this section of the Code"; and counsel again quote, "As already suggested, it is well settled that in an action of this character the defendant must set up whatever right of possession he may claim." The facts of that case were peculiar. The plaintiff had judgment in his action to quiet title against defendant, and afterwards moved for an order directing the sheriff to place him in possession of the property. The defendant opposed the motion upon the ground that after the rendition of the decree in plaintiff's action he obtained judgment on the merits against the plaintiff in an action of ejectment to recover possession of the same land, and also set out the acquisition by himself of an outstanding title, created since the action was tried and determined. The court ordered the writ of possession to issue, and from that order the appeal was taken. It is in view of these facts that the language of the court last above quoted was used; the meaning being that, where the defendant asserted different rights or sources of title, he should litigate all of them, to the end that all controversies affecting the property, as between the parties, should be determined. In the case at bar the complaint alleged that the defendants were in possession, and alleged title and ownership in the plaintiff. The defendants being in possession, it is not material to the plaintiff as to whether they were rightfully in possession or not, unless he were the owner and entitled to possession; and, as his right to possession was based solely upon his alleged ownership, the only question material to be determined was as to the validity of his claim of ownership. Such claim might be determined by showing that he never performed any of the acts necessary to the location of the mining claim, or by showing, if such acts were performed, that a prior location existed which precluded the possibility of a valid location having been made by the plaintiff. Such proof could properly be made under a general denial of the plaintiff's title and right of possession. Pennie v. Hildreth, 81 Cal. 127, 131, 22 Pac. 398.

Appellant also alleges that the court erred in overruling his objections to the admission in evidence of the location notices of defendants. These objections were on the ground that they were "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial." But the specifications do not show in what respect they were incompetent, irrelevant, or immaterial, nor does he point out in his brief any ground upon which such objection could be sustained. These notices of location appear to be sufficient in every particular. Upon a careful examination of the entire record, we find no error which would justify a reversal of the judgment, and advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

McFARLAND and HENSHAW, JJ. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

TEMPLE, J. I concur. I wish to say, however, that I do not think it is usual, in actions of this character, in the complaint to call upon the defendant to set out his interest, title, or claim. When such matter is contained in a complaint, it is simply surplusage. The defendant is not called upon to set up his title, unless that be necessary under ordinary rules of pleading to enable him to introduce the evidence necessary to his defense. I think, in all cases in which the defendant is in possession, actions of this character are actions at law, and the legislature cannot convert it into an equitable action by styling it an action to quiet title.

REED v. CROSS. (L. A. 53.)

JUDGMENT—EFFECT AS ADJUDICATION.

1. Where a defendant pleaded as a counterclaim one-half of the amount of a payment made by him on a note which he alleged was given for the joint benefit of himself and plaintiff, and issue joined on such allegation was determined in his favor, and judgment rendered for his counterclaim, such judgment constitutes an adjudication, as between the parties, that each is liable for one-half the note, and estops the plaintiff from denying his liability in an action to recover on account of a subsequent payment made by defendant thereon.

2. A judgment for defendant in an action to recover money is a bar to a counterclaim for the recovery of the same money in a subsequent action between the parties, though not based entirely on the same grounds, where the evidence to sustain the counterclaim would have authorized a recovery in the former action.

Commissioner's decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Action by F. C. Reed against John Cross. From the judgment both parties appeal. Reversed on plaintiff's appeal; affirmed on defendant's appeal.

W. H. Spencer, William J. Variel, and William H. Davis, for plaintiff. Hughes & Garrison and Anderson & Anderson, for defendant.

SEARLS, C. In this case a judgment was entered in the court below, by which it was adjudged (1) that plaintiff was not entitled to take anything upon the cause of action set forth in his complaint; (2) that defendant, John Cross, do have and recover nothing of and from F. C. Reed upon the said defendant's cross complaint; (3) that defendant recover his costs, amounting to the sum of $19.-95. Plaintiff appeals from so much of the judgment as denies his right of recovery against the defendant and awards costs against him. His appeal is supported by a bill of exceptions. The defendant also prosecutes a separate appeal (No. 70) from so much of the same judgment as denies his right of recovery upon his cross complaint, and his appeal comes up on the same judgment roll, in a separate record, without any bill of exceptions.

As the facts, except as to the bill of exceptions, are precisely alike in the two cases, it will facilitate progress and avoid useless repetition of facts by considering this case and No. 70 together. We accordingly pursue that course. The action was brought to recover $1,903.60, together with interest thereon from July 25, 1891, for one-half of the money alleged to have been paid out by plaintiff for the benefit of defendant, in a joint enterprise in which plaintiff and defendant were engaged, in which some 80 acres of land were purchased in San Luis Obispo county, in 1887, for the sum of $23,700. Defendant answered denying most of the allegations of the complaint, set up fraud in the transaction on the part of plaintiff, and pleaded the statute of limitations (section 339 and the first paragraph of section 342, Code Civ. Proc.) in bar of the cause of action. Defendant also pleaded the bar of a judgment for the same cause of action in a former action in which the defendant herein was plaintiff and the plaintiff herein was defendant, instituted in the county of San Luis Obispo, in which action the plaintiff here had judgment for $677 and costs against the defendant here. Defendant also filed a cross complaint in the action to recover back from the plaintiff $8,000, paid by him on account of the investment mentioned in the complaint on the ground of fraud practiced by said plaintiff in the transaction, setting out in apt terms the facts constituting the alleged fraud. Plaintiff answered the cross complaint of defendant, denying most of its allegations. He also sets up in bar of the cause of action set out in defendant's cross complaint an action brought by said defendant against him in the county of San Luis Obispo to recover the same sum of $8,000 here sought to be recovered by defendant; that plaintiff here, who was defendant there, interposed a counterclaim against the plaintiff there and defendant here; and that upon the issues made a trial was had and judgment rendered against the plaintiff in that suit, and in favor of the defendant therein on his counterclaim for $677 and costs, which judgment was thereafter, on appeal of said plaintiff, John Cross, to this court, duly affirmed. See No. 14,522, decided in 1892 (29 Pac. 244), affirming judgment and order, and not officially reported. The cause was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury. It seems necessary to set forth the findings in full. They are as follows:

"Findings.

"This cause came on for hearing before the court sitting without a jury, the same having been waived by the parties; Messrs. Variel & Davis appearing for plaintiff, and Anderson & Anderson and Hughes & Garrison appearing for defendant; and the court, having heard the evidence and argument of counsel, and the cause being submitted, now finds as follows:

"(1) That in April, 1887, plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement whereby they were to purchase from one W. L. Beebee eighty acres of land situate in San Luis Obispo county, California, at and for the sum of $24,000, each to pay the one-half of such purchase price and to acquire an un divided one-half interest in said land. That in pursuance of such agreement, plaintiff and defendant, on May 3, 1887, purchased of said Beebee said land, each acquiring an undivided one-half interest therein, for the sum of $23,700, defendant then paying of said purchase price $8,000, and plaintiff then paying of said purchase price $7,700; and by agreement between plaintiff and defendant said Beebee conveyed said land to plaintiff only; and plaintiff borrowed of the Bank of San Luis Obispo $8,000, executing to said bank his note therefor, and a mortgage upon said land to secure its payment; and with said $8,000 so borrowed plaintiff paid to said Beebee the remainder of said sum of $23,700, the purchase price of said land. That thereafter, and on May 3, 1894, plaintiff conveyed to defendant an undivided one-half interest in and to said land subject to said mortgage. That thereafter plaintiff and defendant paid to said bank a part of said mortgage, and on July 25, 1891, there remained unpaid of the said mortgage debt the sum of $3,807.21, plaintiff having up to that time paid upon said debt $300 more than defendant had paid thereon. That on July 25, 1891, plaintiff paid to said bank the remainder of said mortgage debt, to wit, the sum of $3,807.21, no part of which has ever been repaid to him.

"(2) That for some years prior to the times in the complaint referred to the plaintiff and defendant had sustained towards each other confidential and friendly relations, and had frequently engaged in joint ventures and speculations. That during the months of April and May, 1887, the plaintiff invited and requested defendant to enter into a joint speculation with him, and offered to invest money for defendant in joint purchases with plaintiff. That defendant consented to unite with plaintiff in the purchase of a certain tract of sixty acres of land in the corporate limits of San Luis Obispo for the sum of $18,000, and authorized plaintiff to draw on him for the amount necessary to pay for the interest of defendant so purchased jointly with the plaintiff. And on the 14th day of April, 1887, the plaintiff wrote and notified defendant that he had purchased said tract of land, and had drawn on defendant for $10,000 to pay for defendant's interest in such investment. That the defendant paid said draft upon presentation, relying entirely upon statements made by plaintiff that said land so to be purchased jointly with defendant was said sixty-acre tract within the corporate limits of San Luis Obispo for a total price of $18,000, as then represented, and that said sum of $10,000 should fully pay for such interest of defendant therein. That thereafter, on the 27th day of April, 1887, defendant went to the city of San Luis Obispo, and there met plaintiff, who showed him the land which plaintiff represented that he had purchased for $24,000, and had paid thereon the sum of $16,000, $10,000 of which was paid with the money of defendant. That defendant was dissatisfied with said purchase, and claimed to plaintiff that the purchase was not one such as had been represented when the draft of $10,000 was paid, and demanded that plaintiff pay back to him the money which he had obtained by draft on him as aforesaid.

"(3) That plaintiff then represented to defendant that he had no money, but did not promise to take the entire interest, or any interest, in this transaction, or any interest off his hands, or to pay him back any amount which had been drawn by him. That plaintiff thereupon gave defendant his note for $2,000, which has been paid, but defendant did not hold the title to an undivided one-half interest thereafter conveyed to him by plaintiff as security for $8,000, but held the same in fee as his own property. That plaintiff then fraudulently claimed that the money had already been paid on said purchase at an agreed price of $24,000, and thereby induced defendant to leave the transaction in the condition in which it then was, and the defendant believed such representations, and believed that $16,000 in cash had already been paid on such purchase, and believed that the purchase price was $24,000, as then fraudulently alleged by plaintiff; and defendant, believing plaintiff's representations that the plaintiff had already paid over defendant's money, and could not then pay it back to defendant, but did not rely on plaintiff's promise to take the entire transaction off his hands, and defendant did not then at once attempt to recover the balance of said $8,000. That the purchase price paid for said land was $23,700, and that plaintiff, although pretending to be defendant's friend, and pretending to make a partnership or joint purchase for himself and defendant, but not for the purpose of cheating and defrauding defendant, retained said sum of $300 for his own individual use and benefit, and concealed from defendant the fact that the purchase price of said land had been reduced to $23,700; and plaintiff continually left defendant under the belief that the plaintiff had paid for said land $24,000, $16,000 of which had been paid in cash,—$8,000 by plaintiff and $8,000 by defendant,—whereas, in fact and in truth, the plaintiff had paid on his part but $7,700. That at the time of defendant's visit to San Luis Obispo on or about the 27th day of April, 1887, the money which had been obtained from defendant by the draft as aforesaid was then still in plaintiff's hands unexpended, and that the defendant's consent to let plaintiff have the money, after defendant had expressed his dissatisfaction with the investment, and repudiated the transaction as far as he was able, was obtained by the false and fraudulent representation that the money had already been paid on the purchase. That thereafter, to wit, on the —— day of ——, 189–, the defendant filed suit in the superior court of San Luis Obispo county to recover said $8,000 from plaintiff on the ground of plaintiff's promise to take the entire interest in said transaction off defendant's hands, and repay him the amount of $8,000. That plaintiff denied said promise, and this defendant, having no preponderance of evidence, failed to recover the said $8,000, or any part thereof. That said action was tried in the superior court of San Luis Obispo county on the 16th and 19th days of March, 1891, and at said trial defendant learned for the first time that at the time of his visit to San Luis Obispo the money advanced by him was still in plaintiff's hands, and at the time of said trial the defendant first learned that the purchase price of said land was $300 less than his confidential friend and would-be partner had represented. That the defendant repudiated the transaction in toto, and offered to reconvey to plaintiff all interest he might have in said land upon the payment by him of the amount he had advanced. That defendant's interest therein was foreclosed, and the equity of redemption was worth much less than the mortgage debt thereon. That on the —— day of March, 1891, said land was sold, and at said sale bought in by the mortgagee, and a deficiency judgment docketed against the plaintiff herein on his promise to pay said mortgage debt. That said land was never redeemed by any one from said sale, and defendant's interest therein was at all times after he learned of the fraudulent acts and representations of the plaintiff, in the answer set forth, totally and absolutely worthless. That upon the discovery of the fraudulent representations and acts of plaintiff in this transaction, how plaintiff had falsely represented to him that the money had already been paid on said purchase when the defendant first repudiated the transaction, and demanded that his money be repaid, and how plaintiff had falsely represented and concealed the true cost of the land from defendant, but not with the aim of cheating and defrauding defendant, to the extent of the difference between the price represented and the true price paid, the defendant withdrew from all connection with said purchase, repudiated his ownership of any part of said land, or of any interest therein, refused to be interested with plaintiff in this or any other transaction, and rescinded any and all agreements for partnership or joint ventures, and in particular rescinded and repudiated any agreement which might be thought or construed to involve this defendant in any liability for the payment of any part of the mortgage debt referred to in the complaint.

"(4) That at the time of the meeting of plaintiff and defendant in the city of San Luis Obispo, as aforesaid, plaintiff and defendant visited and examined said land together, and, after some talk between them with reference to the purchase of said land, plaintiff and defendant agreed that they would buy said land together, that each should own an undivided one-half thereof, and that each should contribute equally with the other in paying the purchase money and all the interest thereon. That plaintiff and defendant further agreed that they would pay for said land to William L. Beebee, the owner thereof, $24,000, and pay the same as follows: The plaintiff to pay the sum of $8,000, the defendant to pay the sum of $8,000, and that plaintiff, Reed, would, for the use of both plaintiff and defendant, borrow from the Bank of San Luis Obispo, upon a mortgage upon said land, the remaining $8,000, so as to pay said Beebee in cash all of said purchase price of $24,000. That on May 3, 1887, plaintiff and defendant purchased from said Beebee the said land, each acquiring an undivided one-half interest therein, at and for the sum of $23,700, of which purchase price plaintiff paid $7,700, defendant paid $8,000, and the remaining $8,000 was paid to said Beebee by borrowing upon a mortgage upon said land $8,000 from said Bank of San Luis Obispo. That for convenience of said parties, when said purchase was made, said Beebee conveyed said land to plaintiff only, and that thereupon plaintiff executed to said bank the note and mortgage mentioned and referred to in the complaint herein, and that thereafter, and on May 3, 1887, plaintiff executed his deed to defendant, thereby conveying to defendant an undivided one-half interest in said land. That there was no other or further arrangement or agreements between plaintiff and defendant with reference to the purchase of said land.

"(5) That in said action above referred to issue was joined and the trial had upon the answer to the third amended complaint and a supplemental complaint thereto. That in said answer a counterclaim was set up. That said action was tried by the judge of the superior court of San Luis Obispo county without a jury. That said court found and decided in said action that none of the allegations of fraud in said complaint were true; that the allegations of defendant's counterclaim were true; that plaintiff there (defendant here) recover nothing by his said action, and that the defendant there (plaintiff here) recover of and from plaintiff there (defendant here) the sum of $677, together with his costs. That judgment for said amount and costs, amounting to $16.75, was entered accordingly against plaintiff there (defendant here). That thereafter said John Cross appealed to the supreme court of the state of California from said judgment, and that said supreme court thereafter affirmed said decision of said superior court of San Luis Obispo county. That when plaintiff and defendant first met in the city of San Luis Obispo, as hereinbefore stated, he told defendant that the purchase price of said land was $24,000, and not $23,700, the actual purchase price of said land. That the $300 difference between the intended purchase price and the actual purchase price was not fraudulently appropriated and kept by plaintiff, nor was it ever used by plaintiff for his own use and benefit, but was used for the benefit of the partnership venture, to wit, used in the payment of interest upon said note and mortgage. That on March 13, 1889, he paid as interest upon said note and mortgage the sum of $1,528.12,—the $300 above referred to, the partnership money, and the sum of $1,228.12 of his own private funds.

"(6) That plaintiff's cause of action is not barred by the first paragraph of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California.

"(7) That plaintiff's cause of action is not barred by the first paragraph of section 342 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California.

"(8) That on the 21st day of March, 1891, at the city of San Luis Obispo, state of California, in an action there pending in the superior court of the county of San Luis Obispo, state of California, betwee John Cross, plaintiff, and F. C. Reed, defendant, for the recovery of the same $8,000 sought to be recovered by defendant in his cross complaint herein, judgment was duly given and made by which the plaintiff in this suit recovered from the defendant herein the sum of $677 and costs; but that said action was not for the same cause of action as set forth in the complaint herein.

"Wherefore, as a conclusion of law, the court finds that plaintiff is not entitled to take anything upon the cause of action set forth in his complaint herein, and that defendant is not entitled to take anything upon the cause of action set forth in his cross complaint herein, and that defendant is entitled to recover his costs herein."

The appellant correctly says that "the principal question, and perhaps the only question, raised on this appeal is whether the judgment in the case of Cross v. Reed is a bar or estoppel against the defense made by the defendant." The court did find that the former action was not a bar to plaintiff's cause of action herein. In the case at bar the defense is that the contract made between plaintiff Reed and defendant Cross for the purchase of the Beebee land, under which said land was purchased, was fraudulently procured by Reed. The findings of the court in this case sustain the defense of fraud, and hence the judgment against plaintiff. The point is this: Was the defendant here estopped from making the defense of fraud by the judgment in a former action between the same parties? Turning to the bill of exceptions, where the judgment roll of Cross v. Reed, which was in evidence in this case, is set out, and we find that the former action was brought by Cross to recover from Reed $8,000 paid on the contract for the purchase of the Beebee land, upon the ground of fraud on the part of said Reed. It averred that the alleged contract price of the land was $24,000, while in fact it was $23,700; that defendant had converted the $300 to his own use; had, without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, given a mortgage on the land for $8,000, etc. The complaint admits the conveyance to plaintiff of a deed for the undivided one-half of the land, and tenders a reconveyance thereof to defendant. Defendant answered, denying all the allegations of fraud, and by way of counterclaim set up that he had paid on account of the mortgage the sum of $1,528.12, for one-half of which, less $300, viz. $614.06, he asks judgment. In a supplemental complaint plaintiff alleged that the mortgage had been foreclosed, and an order of sale of the land had been decreed. That cause was tried March 19, 1891. The findings are, in substance, that the parties agreed to purchase the land for $24,000, each to pay $8,000, and to borrow on note and mortgage $8,000 to make up the purchase price; that defendant afterwards procured the land for $300 less than the supposed price, took a deed to himself, executed a note and mortgage for $8,000, and conveyed one-half to plaintiff subject to the mortgage, and afterwards paid the $300 on account of interest. The court finds that all the allegations of the counterclaim are true, and that none of the allegations of fraud are true. Thereupon judgment was entered against plaintiff upon his demand, and in favor of defendant on his counterclaim for $677 and costs. Since that action was tried, the mortgaged property has been sold, leaving a deficiency of $3,807.21, which was paid by the plaintiff Reed, and this action is brought to recover one-half thereof, viz. $1,903.60.

"There is no doubt that a judgment or decree necessarily affirming the existence of any fact is conclusive upon the parties or their privies whenever the existence of that fact is again in issue between them, not only when the subject-matter is the same, but when the point comes incidentally in question in relation to a different matter, in the same or any other court, except on appeal, writ of error, or other proceeding provided for its revision." Freem. Judgm., § 249, and cases there cited; Gray v. Dougherty, 25 Cal. 272; Caperton v. Schmidt, 26 Cal. 493; Garwood v. Garwood, 29 Cal. 521; Woolverton v. Baker, 98 Cal. 628, 33 Pac. 731. The case of Wiese v. Society, 82 Cal. 645, 23 Pac. 212, is in most respects similar to the case at bar. In that case plaintiff had sued in justice court to recover sick benefits. Defendant set up as a defense a by-law under which benefits were limited to six months, and showing the payment thereof for said period. Judgment was given for plaintiff upon the ground that the by-law was invalid for want of power in defendant to impose such a limitation. By lapse of time and plaintiff's continued sickness, new installments were claimed to be due, and another action was brought to recover them, and it was held that the former judgment was conclusive in the action for subsequent installments, and estopped the defendant from a defense upholding the by-law. Applying the principle of Wiese v. Society to this case, and we find that in the former action the right of plaintiff to recover by way of contribution from defendant for what he had then paid out on the note secured by mortgage, was a sharply defined issue in the case. Plaintiff attacked the giving the note and mortgage by the defendant there (the plaintiff here) as being without authority, and fraudulent. The findings were in favor of the plaintiff here, and judgment went accordingly. The judgment estops the defendant here from again interposing the same defense a second time, and, plaintiff having shown in this case that he had subsequently paid a further sum on the same obligation, he was entitled to judgment therefor. We recommend that the portion of the judgment appealed from by plaintiff be reversed.

2. The appeal of defendant Cross from that portion of the judgment denying his recovery of $8,000 claimed in his cross complaint comes up on the judgment roll, without any bill of exceptions. (This appeal is No. 70.) The only point made for reversal is that the court below erred in holding upon the findings that the judgment of the court in San Luis Obispo was a bar to the recovery by defendant Cross in this case. Taken together, the findings in this case show that the sum of $8,000 sought to be recovered by plaintiff in his cross complaint here is the same $8,000 which, as plaintiff, said Cross sought to recover in the San Luis Obispo case; that in the San Luis Obispo case issue was joined on the pleadings, and tried by the court; "that said court found and decided in said action that none of the allegations of fraud in said complaint were true," etc., and rendered judgment against the plaintiff Cross. This finding shows that the question of fraud on the part of Reed was litigated and determined in the former action. It is true that the findings in this case show that Reed fraudulently represented to Cross that $16,000 of the purchase price of the land had been paid prior to his (Cross') visit to San Luis Obispo, April 27, 1887, while in fact such sum had not then been paid, and was still in Reed's hands, and that he (Cross) did not learn this fact until during the trial of that case in March, 1891. No reason is shown why this additional evidence of fraud was not introduced in evidence at the trial at which it was discovered. If the pleadings were not broad enough to include it, they could have been amended; or, if too late for that, it might have afforded cause for a new trial upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence. We know from the appeal by plaintiff in the case just what the judgment roll in the former case contained, but we may not avail ourselves of that knowledge on this appeal, for the reason that, as before stated, the appeal here does not include in the record that judgment roll. We think, however, it may properly be inferred from the findings in this case that the evidence necessary to sustain a judgment in favor of Cross here would have authorized a judgment in his favor in the former action. This being so, the former judgment was a bar to the cause of action set up by Cross here. It is true that the court found that the former action to recover the $8,000 was on the ground of plaintiff's promise to take the entire interest in said transaction off defendant's hands, and repay him the amount of $8,000. But it is equally true that the question of fraud was also made an issue in said action, and, as we have seen, was decided in favor of the defendant there and plaintiff here. In the present case the court finds against the contract on the part of plaintiff to take the property off of defendant's hands. As the decision is against defendant upon the ground of the bar of the former action, and as the court below had the judgment roll in the former action before it, we must presume it was sufficient to support the findings. We recommend that so much of the judgment as is appealed from by the defendant here be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, so much of the judgment as is appealed from by the plaintiff, F. C. Reed, is reversed, and so much of the judgment as is appealed from by defendant, Cross, is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SEHORN. (Crim. 202.)

HOMICIDE—PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION—DOCKET ENTRIES—DE FACTO JUSTICE—COMMITMENT—SPECIAL VENIRE—ELISORS—EVIDENCE—CROSS EXAMINATION—SCOPE OF OBJECTIONS.

1. A justice of the peace before whom a complaint for felony is made may call in another justice of the same county to hold the preliminary examination, under Code Civ. Proc. § 105, authorizing a justice of the peace to hold the court of another justice of the same county.

2. An order by a justice of the peace requesting another justice to act for him need not state the reason therefor, no statute requiring it to do so.

3. Code Civ. Proc. § 105, requiring a justice acting for another to make in the docket "proper entry of the proceedings * * * subscribed by him," requires only such entries as the original justice would have been required to make; and hence, since no statute requires any particular proceedings on preliminary examination to be entered, failure of an attending justice holding a preliminary examination to subscribe his name to the docket affects no substantial right of defendant.

4. The requirement that the order holding defendant to answer on preliminary examination must be indorsed on the depositions is sufficiently complied with by an indorsement thereof on the complaint.

5. The fact that defendant was committed on preliminary examination on the order holding him to answer, without a formal commitment running to the sheriff, as required by Pen. Code, §§ 876, 877, is material only while he is in custody thereunder, and is not ground for reversal of a conviction.

6. A justice of the peace, the boundaries of whose township were so changed after his appointment as to make him a nonresident thereof, but who has not been ousted and continues to act, is a justice de facto, and his right to hold a preliminary examination cannot be questioned on appeal from conviction.

7. It is in the discretion of the court to summon jurors by special venire after exhausting a drawn venire, but without exhausting the regular list.

8. An elisor may be appointed where the disqualification of the sheriff is admitted, and it is shown that the coroner is disqualified, under Pen. Code, § 1074, subd. 4, because having been a member of the coroner's jury.

9. On a trial for murder the people may prove that the deceased was not armed at the time of the homicide, where there is evidence that defendant believed that he was.

10. On a trial for murder it is not prejudicial error to permit testimony as to the unfriendly relations between defendant and deceased, where the witness stated fully the facts on which his testimony was based, and other testimony to the same effect was afterwards introduced without objection.

11. Where a witness for the people on a trial for murder testified to a conversation with defendant, and that defendant asked him to go up the street with him, questions on cross-examination as to what occurred at deceased's store when witness and defendant arrived there are properly excluded, as not relating to the matter testified to in chief.

12. A physician, who has testified for defendant on a trial for murder that he found certain injuries on defendant's person, may be asked on cross-examination if they were such as to require medical treatment.

13. On a trial for murder, objection to a threatening article published by defendant, as "not competent or material," does not raise the question whether the article on its face refers to deceased.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Glenn county; Frank Moody, Judge.

W. A. Sehorn was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Affirmed.

H. M. Albery, Charles L. Donohue, and K. E. Kelley, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and W. H. Anderson, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The defendant was charged by the information with murder, and was convicted of manslaughter; and he appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

A great part of appellant's brief is devoted to technical points touching the regularity and validity of the proceedings before the committing magistrate on the preliminary examination upon which the information is founded; and it is contended that, on account of alleged defects in said preliminary proceedings, defendant's motion to set aside the information should have been granted. The general rule as to such points is that after a defendant has been tried upon an information, and convicted, the conviction will not be set aside for mere irregularity in the preliminary examination, which does not affect any of the substantial rights of the defendant. As was said by this court in People v. Rodrigo, 69 Cal. 602, 11 Pac. 481: "To justify the quashing of the information, it must at least appear that the defendant was deprived of some substantial right." The facts in the case at bar touching these points, so far as they are material, are as follows: On October 7th complaint was duly made before Frank McNorton, justice of the peace of the First judicial township in Glenn county, charging the appellant with the murder of one John E. Putman; whereupon the said justice issued his warrant, and indorsed thereon that said appellant "is hereby committed to the sheriff of the county of Glenn, without bail, until he can be tried or examined on said charge." The preliminary examination was then set by said justice for October 15, 1895, and on the 14th day of October it was agreed that the examination should commence on that day, instead of the day following. Thereupon the said Justice McNorton called in Justice George Jansen, of the Second judicial township of said county, to hold the examination, who proceeded to do so. Upon the close of the examination, on October 16th, the said justice entered an order in the justice's docket, as follows: "I adjudge defendant, W. A. Sehorn, guilty of the crime of murder, and commit him to the custody of the superior court for trial." At the same time, on said October 16th, the said Justice Jansen indorsed on the complaint the following order: "It appearing to me that the offense of murder has been committed, and that there is sufficient cause to believe the within-named W. A. Sehorn, defendant, guilty thereof, I order that he be held to answer the same, and committed to the sheriff of the county of Glenn. [Signed] George Jansen, Justice of the Peace." No order was indorsed upon any deposition other than the complaint; and it does not appear that the said Justice Jansen subscribed his name to the docket, except as the same appears in a document which the said Jansen sent to the clerk of the superior court, called a "Statement of the Case." Neither does it appear that a commitment in the form prescribed by sections 876 and 877 of the Penal Code was made out and delivered to the sheriff. Neither does it appear that Justice McNorton, in his order requesting Justice Jansen to act for him, set forth any reason why said request was made.

It is contended by appellant that one justice of the peace has no power to call in another for the purpose of making a preliminary examination; but that point has been determined against appellant's contention in People v. Sansome, 98 Cal. 240, 33 Pac. 202.

It is contended also that the order requesting another justice so to act should set forth the reason why the request was made, but there is no statutory provision to that effect

It is also contended that the preliminary examination is void, because the justice requested to act as aforesaid did not subscribe the docket, as provided in section 105 of the Code of Civil Procedure; but that provision is only to the effect that the "proper entry of the proceedings before the attending magistrate subscribed by him shall be made in the docket of the justice for whom he so holds the court," and refers only to those proceedings which are necessary to be entered in the docket, and which should have been so entered by the original justice if he had been himself acting; and our attention has not been called to any material proceeding which must be so entered and subscribed in the case of a preliminary examination. If it can be held to apply to a preliminary examination, it is merely directory, and affects no substantial rights of the defendant in such proceeding. The contention that the order holding the appellant to answer is invalid, because it was not indorsed upon the depositions other than the complaint, is not tenable. It has been held that it is sufficient if such an order be indorsed upon the complaint. People v. Young, 64 Cal. 212, 30 Pac. 628; People v. Wilson, 93 Cal. 377, 28 Pac. 1061; People v. Dolan, 96 Cal. 315, 31 Pac. 107.

There is nothing in the contention that the case should be reversed because there was no formal commitment running to the sheriff, as required by sections 876 and 877. The defendant was originally committed to the custody of the sheriff by the order indorsed upon the warrant of arrest, and afterwards by the order indorsed upon the complaint committing the appellant to the sheriff of the county of Glenn. This was a substantial compliance with the law; but, under any view, the question whether the sheriff was properly holding the appellant under the commitment would have been material only during the time when the sheriff was so holding him. As was said in Ex parte Baker, 88 Cal. 84, 25 Pac. 966: "The phrase 'legally committed,' as used in the foregoing sections, refers to the examination of the case, and the holding of the defendant to answer, as prescribed by title 3, c. 7, of the Penal Code."

It is contended that Jansen, who was called in to conduct the preliminary examination, was not a justice of the peace, and could not legally commit the defendant. The facts upon which this contention is made are these: After Jansen had been appointed justice of the peace of the Second judicial township, the board of supervisors of the county undertook to change the boundaries of that township in such a manner as to make him a nonresident thereof. It is somewhat doubtful upon the record whether any valid order was ever made changing the boundaries of said township, but assuming that it was legally made, and that thereafter the said Jansen was not a resident of the township as thus changed, still he continued to act as such justice, and to do business as the justice of said township. No other person was appointed to fill said office, and he continued to perform the duties of said office up to and during the said preliminary examination. He never was ousted from said office by quo warranto, or any other similar proceeding. He was therefore a de facto justice of the peace of said township, and his right to exercise the functions of his office cannot be questioned in this or any other collateral proceeding. Throop, Pub. Off. §§ 625, 631, and cases there cited; People v. Roberts, 6 Cal. 214; Case v. State, 69 Ind. 46; Woodside v. Wagg, 71 Me. 207; Sheehan's Case, 122 Mass. 445; People v. Hecht, 105 Cal. 621, 38 Pac. 941; Hull v. Superior Court, 63 Cal. 177.

These views dispose of all the technical points made by appellant as to the irregularity and invalidity of the commitment of the appellant upon the preliminary examination necessary to be noticed. A great many other points are made by appellant, none of which are, in our opinion, maintainable. We will refer to those which seem to call for special notice.

After a drawn venire of 30 jurors had been exhausted, the court made orders for additional jurors to be summoned from the body of the county, under the provisions of section 226 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and appellant contends that this was an abuse of discretion and error. This contention is not sound. There may, no doubt, be cases where, as was said in Levy v. Wilson, 69 Cal. 111, 10 Pac. 272, the drawing of the entire jury from the box would be "more consistent with the correct administration of justice"; but it has frequently been held with respect to both grand and trial jurors that, after the venire drawn from the regular jurors has been exhausted, the court may order additional jurors to be summoned from the county at large, and that such proceeding is valid, at least unless there has been a gross abuse of discretion, which does not appear in the case at bar. People v. Davis, 47 Cal. 95; People v. Devine, 46 Cal. 47; Levy v. Wilson, supra; People v. Vincent, 95 Cal. 427, 30 Pac. 581; People v. Leonard, 106 Cal. 318, 39 Pac. 617; People v. Durrant (Cal.) 48 Pac. 75.

There was no error committed by appointing an elisor. It was admitted that the sheriff was disqualified, and it was shown that the then coroner had been a member of the coroner's jury, which disqualified him, under subdivision 4 of section 1074 of the Penal Code. People v. Young, 108 Cal. 13, 41 Pac. 281.

There was evidence introduced by defendant that he believed the deceased to be armed at the time of the homicide; and therefore it was not error for the court to allow testimony to the point that, as a matter of fact, the deceased was not armed. People v. Powell, 87 Cal. 362, 25 Pac. 481.

There was no prejudicial error committed in allowing the witness Hulet to testify to the unfriendly relations between appellant and the deceased. We need not inquire whether or not the testimony was of that class in which a witness, owing to special opportunity for observation, but not as an expert, may testify as to the manner in which another person acted, and as to his demonstrations of affection or dislike, etc., which class is recognized by the authorities (see Bish. New Cr. Proc. § 1178; Whart. Cr. Ev. 460); for in this case the witness stated very fully the facts upon which his testimony was based, and, moreover, the same kind of testimony was afterwards introduced without objection. Duffy v. Duffy, 104 Cal. 605, 38 Pac. 443.

We do not think that the case should be reversed on account of the admission in evidence of what is called the "Bulldozer Article," written by appellant, and published in his newspaper. It was admitted that, at the time of the publication of that article, the deceased was a member of the board of town trustees, and was the chairman of that board. The article is about the said board, and particularly about the "Chief" of the board; and we cannot say, as a matter of law, that the article could not be fairly construed as containing a threat against the deceased. The point made here for the first time by appellant, that the article does not, on its face, refer to the deceased, can hardly now be considered, as the only objection at the trial was that it was "not competent or material" (People v. Foo, 112 Cal. 21–24, 44 Pac. 453, and cases there cited); but, in the first place, the article on its face might well be taken as referring to the deceased, and, in the second place, it appears from the record that evidence was introduced "to identify the parties referred to in the article heretofore referred to as the 'Bulldozer.'"

There was no error committed in sustaining objections to certain questions asked by appellant on cross-examination of Adams and Furnish, witnesses for the people. Their testimony in chief was, in substance, that on the day of the homicide they met the appellant "on the street in front or near Mr. Freeman's hardware store," and had a conversation with him about certain matters, and that he asked them to walk up the street with him. On cross-examination it appeared that they walked up the street with him to the place of business of the deceased, Putman. The witness Adams was then asked by appellant (and the cross-examination of Furnish as to the point was substantially the same) the following questions: "Did you see Mr. Putman there?" "Did you witness any difficulty there, Mr. Adams?" "Did you hear any conversation between Mr. Putman and Mr. Sehorn there?" These questions were objected to, as not proper cross-examination; and the objections were properly sustained on that ground. The questions did not refer to any matter testified to by said witnesses in their testimony in chief. Moreover, Adams and Furnish were called by appellant as his own witnesses, and testified fully as to the said matters which he sought to ask them about on cross-examination; so that he was not prejudiced by said rulings of the court, even if they could be held erroneous.

The testimony given by the witness Furnish touching the intoxication of the defendant (given in answer to a question which was modified by the court) was nothing more than a statement that, judging from his appearance, he had been drinking, and was therefore properly admitted. 1 Bish. New Cr. Proc. § 1178; People v. Monteith, 73 Cal. 8, 14 Pac. 373; People v. Sanford, 43 Cal. 32, 33; Clary v. Clary, 2 Ired. 78.

Appellant's witness Dr. Tooley, having testified in chief that he found a contusion, an enlargement, and a discoloration on appellant's person, was asked on cross-examination if they were such as to require medical treatment; and it was not error to allow the question over the objection of appellant. It was clearly proper cross-examination. Moreover, the testimony of the witness in response to the question was of no appreciable importance.

We do not deem it necessary to notice at large the positions taken by appellant, that the witness Henning was improperly allowed to testify to a statement made by appellant shortly after the homicide; that the venue was not proven; that the jury were not in charge of the proper person; that there was improper conduct on the part of the jury; that certain jurors were incompetent to serve; that the evidence was not sufficient to justify the verdict; and that a new trial should be granted on account of newly-discovered evidence. It is sufficient to say that no one of these positions is tenable. The record presents no good reason for the granting of a new trial, or the reversal of the judgment. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—BREACH OF CONTRACT —SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT.

1. Error in overruling a demurrer to a complaint which improperly joined two causes of action was harmless where the court limited the evidence to one of the causes.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 3306, providing that the detriment for breach of an agreement to convey an estate in real property shall be the price paid and expenses incurred, etc., adding thereto, "in case of bad faith, the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate * * * at the time of the breach," etc., a complaint averring a contract by defendants to convey land and certain water rights for a lump sum, which plaintiffs paid, and a refusal, without reason therefor, to convey the water rights, the value of which, at the time of the refusal, was alleged, states a cause of action without alleging the amount paid for such rights, since the measure of damages would at least be the value at the time of the breach.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. M. McKinley, Judge. Action by Mary E. Clark and another against Hannah T. Yocum and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. E. Arthur and A. R. Metcalf, for appellants. L. G. Kellogg and W. S. Wright, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to recover damages for the failure to convey certain water and water rights, and also to recover damages claimed on account of the defendants entering upon the premises of the plaintiffs, and shutting certain water off from plaintiffs' lands. Plaintiffs bought a certain tract of land, and also certain water rights and privileges, from defendants, and paid therefor the lump sum of $4,400. Defendants conveyed the land to plaintiffs, but refused to convey the water rights, and judgment for damages in the sum of $2,000 was awarded against them for such breach of the contract. From that judgment, and also from an order denying a new trial, this appeal is prosecuted. Defendants set forth three grounds upon which they rely for a reversal of the judgment and a new trial: (1) That the court erred in overruling defendants' demurrer to the complaint; (2) that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; (3) that the evidence was insufficient to justify any judgment for the plaintiffs.

If it be conceded that the court committed an error in overruling the demurrer to the complaint, which demurrer raised the question as to the misjoinder of causes of action, still the error resulted in no injury, for at the trial by an express order the court limited the evidence to the single question of the breach of the contract in not making a conveyance of the water rights, and the cause was tried upon those lines alone. For this reason, if there was error, it became harmless by the subsequent action of the court.

It is claimed that the complaint failed to state a cause of action in not alleging the amount of money paid for the water rights. Section 3306 of the Civil Code provides: "The detriment caused by the breach of an agreement to convey an estate in real property is deemed to be the price paid and the expenses properly incurred in examining the title and preparing the necessary papers, with interest thereon; but adding thereto in case of bad faith the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate agreed to be conveyed at the time of the breach and the expenses properly incurred in preparing to enter upon this land." In view of the fact that the land and water rights were purchased for a lump sum, the proportion of that sum paid for the water rights could not be segregated, and therefore no allegation as to such amount could be made. But there is an allegation found in the complaint that at the time the conveyance was demanded and refused the value of the water rights was $2,000; and this allegation completes the statement of a cause of action. In many cases, where a vendor agrees to convey two separate tracts of land for a lump sum, and, conveying one tract, refuses to convey the other, it would be difficult to apply the measure of damages provided for the vendee by the foregoing section, for in such cases it would be impossible to segregate the purchase price between the two tracts. But no such difficulty arises here, for the section provides that, if bad faith upon the part of the vendor is shown, then the vendee is entitled to additional damages; that is, additional damages to the extent that the value of the property at the time of the breach exceeds the purchase price. In other words, in a case of bad faith upon the part of the vendor the measure of damages will be the value at the time of the breach, if such value exceeds the purchase price; and, if the value of the land at the time of the breach is less than the purchase price, then that price will be the measure of damages. In the present case defendants were the owners of certain water rights and privileges. They agreed to convey those rights and privileges to plaintiffs, who paid them the purchase price therefor. Without any just reason or excuse upon their part, they refused to perform their contract. This was bad faith in the eyes of the foregoing section of the Civil Code. Bad faith being present, the measure of damages would at least be the value of the property at the date of the breach of the contract. For these reasons we conclude that the complaint stated a cause of action.

It is claimed that the evidence does not sustain the judgment as to the amount of damages awarded. In this regard the evidence is sufficient. Judgment and order affirmed.

Ex parte WILLIAMS. (Cr. 296.)

CRIMINAL LAW—DEMURRER TO INDICTMENT—DISCHARGE OF PRISONER.

Under Pen. Code, §§ 1008, 1009, providing that the allowance of a demurrer to an information is a bar to another prosecution, and that defendant must be discharged unless the court "directs" a new information to be filed, a mere permissive order, sustaining a demurrer, "with leave" to file a new information, entitles defendant to a discharge.

Van Fleet, J., dissenting.

In bank. Petition by Henry Williams for a discharge upon habeas corpus. Petition granted.

H. C. Head, for petitioner. Z. B. West, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The petitioner seeks his discharge upon habeas corpus, and shows the following facts: To the indictment charging him with forgery, he interposed a demurrer, which demurrer was by the court sustained, "with leave to the district attorney to file a new information." Section 1008 of the Penal Code provides that the allowance of a demurrer to an information or indictment is a bar to another prosecution for the same offense, unless the court, being of opinion that the objection on which the demurrer is allowed may be avoided by a new indictment or information, directs the case to be submitted to another grand jury, or directs a new information to be filed. This section plainly contemplates that the filing of a new indictment or information after demurrer sustained shall rest in the discretion of the court, and not in the discretion of the district attorney, and that it shall be filed upon the court's direction or command to the district attorney so to do. We have frequently been compelled to comment upon the apparent unwillingness of trial judges to obey the plain mandate of the statute, and their carelessness in conforming to the clear requirements of the law. It would have been extremely simple for the court, in this instance, to have adopted the language of section 1008, and if, in its view, a new information should have been filed, to have directed the district attorney accordingly. Indeed, upon demurrer to an earlier information in the same case (for the information proposed to be filed will be the third), the court followed the provisions of the statute, and directed the district attorney to file a new pleading. But in the present instance, instead of so doing, and without warrant in law, the court merely extended leave to the district attorney to file such information, leaving the decision of the matter as to whether or not such new information would be filed to rest entirely in the discretion of that officer. This, however, was an attempted transfer of the duty of deciding from the court, where the law places that responsibility, to the district attorney, who, under the law, is not authorized to exercise it. It cannot be held that a permissive order granting leave is equivalent to a mandatory order dictating the performance of a given act. Under the order of court directing the filing of a new information, the district attorney, for his failure so to do, would be guilty of misfeasance or nonfeasance, and would be punishable accordingly. Under the permissive order given by the court he would violate no duty, and be amenable to no punishment, if he should never file a new information. It cannot be held, therefore, that the order here given is equivalent to the order which the statute contemplates should be made. The "leave" given to a party to file an amended pleading after demurrer sustained is never an order or direction to the party that he must file such pleading. As the only order which the court could properly make was an order directing a new information to be filed, and as the order in fact made by the court cannot be considered to be equivalent thereto, it follows, under sections 1008 and 1009 of the Penal Code, that the prosecution is at an end, and that the prisoner must be discharged. It is ordered accordingly.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; TEMPLE, J.; McFARLAND, J.; HARRISON, J.

VAN FLEET, J. I dissent. The order, in full, as made by the court below, omitting the part sustaining the demurrer, was this: "And it appearing to the court that the objections raised by the demurrer to the information may be avoided, leave is granted to the district attorney to file a new information." This order very clearly shows that the intention of the court was to direct that a new information, curing the suggested defects, should be filed, and I think the language used by the court equivalent to the direction provided by the statute. I am unable to coincide with the view expressed in the main opinion, that the language was merely a permissive direction, to be acted upon at the discretion of the district attorney. I think the petitioner should be remanded.

HERMAN v. HECHT et al. (S. F. 293.)

CORPORATIONS—STOCKHOLDERS' LIABILITY—PLEADING—VARIANCE—ASSIGNMENTS—EVIDENCE.

1. The requirement that an action to enforce the liability of stockholders for the corporation's debt must be on the original debt is substantially complied with by a complaint setting out a note of the corporation, and alleging that on the date of the note the corporation borrowed the amount thereof from the payee "on the terms and conditions, and according to the tenor and effect," of said note, since the inception of the debt and the execution of the note are coincident.

2. A finding that a corporation did not "borrow" a certain sum from a bank on its note, in an action against the stockholders on the note, is not justified where the undisputed evidence is that the note was given to the bank in exchange for a partnership note held by the bank, which the corporation had assumed, since the transaction was, in substance, a loan, and a payment of the partnership note with its proceeds.

3. The variance, if any, between a complaint alleging a loan, and proof of such exchange of notes, is immaterial, under Code Civ. Proc. § 469, providing that no variance is material which has not actually misled a party to his prejudice, where the facts as to the consideration of the note were alleged in the answer.

4. The indorsers of the note of a corporation for $40,000 paid it, and subsequently assigned it, in writing, for an expressed consideration of $5. They testified that they hoped to get something out of the collection of the note from the stockholders, but had no arrangement with the assignee therefor. Held, that the assignee was the "real party in interest," and could sue to enforce the liability of the stockholders.

5. Evidence that plaintiff's assignors were also stockholders of the corporation is immaterial in such an action.

6. The pendency of a suit and attachment proceeding on the note by the assignee against the corporation is no defense to the stockholders.

7. If a defense, it is not available unless pleaded.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Alexander Herman against Abraham E. Hecht and others. Judgment for defendants on facts found by the court. A new trial was denied, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wm. B. Sharp, for appellant. Wilson & Wilson, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. This action is brought by plaintiff against Abraham E. Hecht and 14 other defendants to recover from them, as stockholders in the Pacific Jute-Manufacturing Company, a California corporation, their proportion of a promissory note made by said corporation to the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Los Angeles, dated April 20, 1881, for the sum of $40,000, payable 15 days after demand, with interest at a specified rate. Said note was indorsed by William Scholle, J. Brandenstein, and I. Cahn. The defendants' answer, in addition to denials which put in issue the averments of the complaint, alleged, in substance, that in 1879 the said corporation borrowed from said Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Los Angeles the sum of $40,000, and gave its note for said sum; that upon the maturity of that note a new note was given by said corporation for the same sum; that on or about March 10, 1880, said corporation sold and conveyed all its property and assets to the Oakland Bag Company, a co-partnership composed of William Scholle, Israel Cahn, and Jos. Brandenstein; that said co-partnership assumed all the liabilities of the corporation existing at the date of sale, and shortly thereafter said co-partnership gave its own note to said bank, and took up the note made by the said corporation; that on or about March 25, 1881, said corporation, the Pacific Jute-Manufacturing Company, purchased from said co-partnership all the real and personal property, effects, and assets then owned, used, and employed by them under said co-partnership name, and immediately thereafter said corporation commenced and carried on the business for which it was incorporated; that on April 20, 1881, said corporation executed to said bank the note here in suit, and took up the note made by said co-partnership to said bank; and that said note was so executed and delivered by said corporation in substitution of the said note of equal amount then held by said bank, and without any consideration being then, or at all, paid to said corporation. And as a further defense it was alleged that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest, but that said note sued on by him was at the time of the commencement of the action held and owned by said Brandenstein, Scholle, and Cahn, the said indorsers thereof. The action was tried by the court, and the following findings of fact were made: "(1) The plaintiff, Alexander Herman, is not the real party in interest in this action. (2) The Pacific Jute-Manufacturing Company did not on the 20th day of April, 1881, or at any time, for the uses and purposes of its business, or otherwise, borrow from the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of the City of Los Angeles the sum of $40,000, or any part thereof, or any sum of money." Upon these findings, judgment was entered for the defendants. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, and this appeal is from an order denying said motion.

Appellant specifies, in proper and sufficient form, that said findings are not justified by the evidence, and also that the court erred in certain rulings upon the admission of evidence.

The exception to the second finding will be first considered. The complaint set out a copy of a promissory note dated April 20, 1881, made by the Pacific Jute-Manufacturing Company to the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Los Angeles, for the sum of $40,000, payable at 15 days after demand, and alleged that said corporation, in its corporate name, and for the uses and purposes of its business, on said date "borrowed the sum of $40,000" from said bank, "upon the terms and conditions, and according to the tenor and effect," of said note. These allegations show that the inception of the debt, obligation, or liability, and the execution of the note, were coincident; and therefore, so far as the question of pleading is concerned, respondents' contention that the action must be upon the "original indebtedness" is without merit. Knowles v. Sandercock, 107 Cal. 629, 40 Pac. 1047. And as to the evidence it was shown that on April 20, 1881, the day upon which the note was executed, the board of directors of said corporation by resolution authorized the president and secretary to borrow money in such sum as might be necessary, not exceeding $500,000, and to execute the note or notes of the corporation therefor, and that the note set out in the complaint was executed in pursuance of said resolution. At the time of the sale by the corporation to the co-partnership,—the name and style of which was the Oakland Bag Manufacturing Company,—said co-partnership assumed all the debts and liabilities of the corporation, and when the co-partnership afterwards sold to the corporation all its property and assets the corporation assumed all the debts and liabilities of the co-partnership. At the time last mentioned the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank held the note of the Oakland Bag Company, indorsed by Brandenstein, Scholle, and Cahn, for $40,000, dated January 31, 1881, at 15 days, and at the time the note of the corporation set out in the complaint was executed the note of the bag company was taken up; or, as claimed by appellant, no money passed from the bank to the corporation, but the note of the corporation, indorsed by Brandenstein, Scholle, and Cahn, was substituted for it. It is not questioned that this transaction was the origin of the liability of the corporation to the bank, which is here in question, nor that the note of the bag company was thereby paid, and the liability of the co-partnership extinguished. The former liability of the corporation to the bank which existed at the time of the sale to the Oakland Bag Company was paid by the bag company, whether in money or by its note is immaterial; so that from that time until the transaction of April 20, 1881, the corporation was not indebted to the bank. So far as the actual liability of the corporation and its stockholders to the bank is concerned, it is immaterial whether the bank actually paid to the corporation $40,000, and took its note for that sum, or surrendered the note of the bag company for the same sum; for in either case there was a valuable consideration for the note. The question, therefore, is whether these facts, about which there is no conflict in the evidence, justify the finding that the corporation did not "borrow" from the bank $40,000, or any sum of money. There is no question that the note was executed by the corporation, nor is it questioned that the bank parted with value to the amount stated in the note. The transaction was, in effect, a loan of that sum to the corporation. If the cashier had counted out the money to the agent of the corporation, and he had taken it to the collection clerk, and there paid the same money and taken up the note of the bag company, there could be no question that it was a "borrowing" by the corporation. The law looks at the substance of the transaction, in determining its character, and does not require the doing of vain things. In Hamilton v. Starkweather, 28 Conn. 138, it was held that money paid to B. at the request of A., and upon A.'s promise to repay it, is money lent to A., and can be recovered under a count in general assumpsit for money lent. The court said: "The plaintiff having paid the money as requested, we think it was, in substance, a loan. And whether it might also have been treated as money paid is of no importance. There is no principle that requires a manual transfer of money into the borrower's hands in order to constitute a loan. The question is not so much what was the form of the transaction, as what was the substance of it. * * * The transaction has every characteristic of a loan, except that it was not paid over into defendant's hands. And this, in Wade v. Wilson, 1 East, 195, was held to be unnecessary." But, whether this be so or not, the finding should have been in favor of the plaintiff upon the issue of the defendants' liability for their proportion of the money represented by the note of the corporation; for, if it could not be considered as a loan of money by the bank, the facts show a liability of the corporation for the amount named in the note, and for which a stockholder's liability exists, and in that case it is a mere question of variance between the allegation of the complaint and the proof, and "no variance between the allegation in a pleading and the proof is to be deemed material, unless it has actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense upon the merits. Wherever it appears that a party has been so misled the court may order the pleading to be amended upon such terms as may be just." Code Civ. Proc. § 469.

It cannot be said that the defendants were misled to their prejudice, since the fact that the money was not actually paid into the hands of the corporation, but was applied to the satisfaction of the bag company's note, or was given in lieu of it or in substitution for it, was distinctly alleged in the answer; and if no other issue had been raised, or defense pleaded by the defendants, the plaintiff would have been entitled to judgment on the pleadings. As it was, the court should have found according to the evidence, under section 470, Code Civ. Proc., and, if no other defense was established, should have entered judgment thereon for the plaintiff. The court found, however, that the plaintiff is not the real party in interest. This finding cannot be sustained. Said note was indorsed by Brandenstein, Scholle, and Cahn. It was not paid at maturity, and was duly protested for nonpayment, and the liability of the indorsers became fixed on April 19, 1883, and on May 31, 1883, they paid said note, and it was thereupon delivered to them; and afterwards they assigned and transferred it to the plaintiff by the following instrument: "In consideration of five dollars to us paid by A. Herman, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, we hereby sell, assign, and transfer to said A. Herman a certain promissory note, dated 20th day of April, 1881, made by the Pacific Jute-Manufacturing Company, payable fifteen days after demand, for $40,000, and interest at the rate of four per cent. per year, indorsed and taken up by us. And we authorize him to collect the same against the maker of said note (but not against us, indorsers thereof) for his sole use and benefit. Witness our hands this 5th day of June, 1883." The indorsers who signed the above instrument were examined touching said transfer, and were asked whether Herman paid any consideration for the note, and whether they were to participate in the fruits of the litigation if the plaintiff should recover. The replies were to the effect that they thought five dollars was paid, but did not distinctly remember it; and to the second question the reply was that they had no legal or absolute right to get anything, but would be disappointed if they did not, or that they hoped to get something out of it, but that there was no understanding that they were to get anything. It was also admitted that these indorsers, Brandenstein, Scholle, and Cahn, were each stockholders in said corporation. It is contended by appellant that said finding is but a conclusion of law. Whether this be so or not, we need not inquire; for, if it be conceded that it is a finding of fact, it is not sustained by the evidence. The assignment vested the legal title to the note in the plaintiff, and, if the action had been against the corporation upon the same note, it is clear that this defense would not have availed it to defeat the action. See Giselman v. Starr, 106 Cal. 651, 657, 40 Pac. 8. That the assignment transferred to the plaintiff the indebtedness of the corporation is beyond question, and the liability of the stockholder must accrue to the creditor of the corporation, and cannot exist as to any one who it not such creditor. It is true that plaintiff's assignors are stockholders, but that does not affect the liability of the defendants; nor does the fact that they did not sue as plaintiffs affect any right of the defendants. Each defendant could be held liable only for his proportion of the debt of the corporation, and, such liability being several, one or more or all the stockholders may be joined as defendants, or a stockholder who is also a creditor may sue other stockholders. Knowles v. Sandercock, 107 Cal. 629, 40 Pac. 1047, where it is also held that the assignment of the note carried with it the original debt. It is immaterial whether plaintiff's assignors received the money consideration mentioned in the assignment, or whether they hope to obtain a benefit from a recovery by the plaintiff. The writing imports a consideration sufficient to sustain the assignment, and as the defendants do not show that they have some equity or defense against plaintiff's assignors which they do not have against the plaintiff, or show that a judgment against them in favor of the plaintiff would not protect them, they are not concerned with what the plaintiff may do with the fruits of such judgment. Giselman v. Starr, 106 Cal. 657, 658, 40 Pac. 8.

The court erred in admitting evidence that plaintiff's assignors were stockholders in the Pacific Jute-Manufacturing Company. The fact that they were stockholders would have been no defense to the action if they had been the plaintiffs (Knowles v. Sandercock, 107 Cal. 629, 40 Pac. 1047), and therefore could not be a defense to an action by their assignee.

The court also erred in admitting evidence that the plaintiff had sued the corporation and caused a writ of attachment to issue, and that said action was still pending. That fact constituted no defense to plaintiff's action; but, if it did, it was a defense which was not pleaded, and therefore not available to the defendants. The order denying a new trial should be reversed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is reversed, and a new trial granted.

TERALTA LAND & WATER CO. v. SHAFFER, County Auditor. (L. A. 167.)

TAX SALES—REDEMPTION—VESTED RIGHTS.

Pol. Code, § 3817, which provided that where real estate had been sold for delinquent taxes, and the state had become the purchaser, and had not disposed of it, redemption might be made by paying the amount of the tax due, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, subsequent taxes, costs, and a penalty of 25 per cent., was amended by Act March 28, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 309), in terms made retroactive, requiring the redemptioner to pay a penalty of 10 per cent. if redeemed within six months, 20 per cent. if redeemed within one year, etc., increasing the penalty by 20 per cent. each year till the fifth and subsequent years, the maximum penalty being 100 per cent. Held that, as applied to sales prior to its passage, the act is unconstitutional, as disturbing vested rights, since to the right to redeem it adds new conditions, more onerous than those which existed when such sales were made.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Writ of mandate, on the petition of the Teralta Land & Water Company, to compel E. E. Shaffer, auditor of San Diego county, to furnish an estimate of the amount required to redeem certain lands from tax sale. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Sweet, Dist. Atty., for appellant. Collier, Pillsbury & Collier, W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and Henry E. Carter, Dep. Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SEARLS, C. The Teralta Land & Water Company (a corporation), respondent herein, filed its petition, duly verified, in the superior court in and for the county of San Diego, showing that it was the owner of certain described lands, situate in said county of San Diego, which were sold for delinquent state and county taxes duly levied for the fiscal years 1889–90, 1890–91, and 1891–92, and purchased by the state of California. On the 25th day of September, 1895, plaintiff, being desirous of redeeming said lands, applied to defendant, auditor of the county of San Diego, to furnish to it an estimate of the amount required to redeem the same, and demanded that such estimate be made under the statutes in force at the date of the respective sales of said land, and prior to the year 1895. The auditor refused to furnish the estimate as demanded, upon the ground that the act of March 28, 1895, was the only statute in force relating to the redemption of real estate from sales for delinquent taxes, whether such sales took place prior to the passage of said act or afterwards. He offered to furnish an estimate under the act of 1895, but refused to do so under any prior statute. An alternative writ of mandate issued to defendant, who came in and demurred to the petition, upon grounds substantially involving the proposition that the petition or sworn statement of the plaintiff did not state facts entitling plaintiff to redeem from the sales therein mentioned under any law or laws except the statute of March 28, 1895. The court overruled the demurrer, and, defendant failing to answer, his default was entered, and the writ of mandate was made peremptory. Defendant appeals from the judgment.

Under the Political Code (section 3817) as it existed prior to 1895, where real estate was sold for delinquent taxes, and the state had become the purchaser, and had not disposed of the same, the former owner or his heirs, etc., had the right to redeem by paying to the county treasurer the amount of the tax due, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, together with all taxes that were a lien on the real estate at the time said taxes became delinquent; an amount equal to the percentage of all subsequent taxes; interest thereon; all costs and charges; and a penalty of 25 per cent., etc. It became the duty of the county auditor to furnish the person desiring to redeem an estimate of the amount necessary therefor. The act of March 28, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 309), amended section 3817 of the Political Code so that, in lieu of the penalty of 25 per cent., the redemptioner is required to pay a penalty of 10 per cent. if redeemed within six months from the date of sale, 20 per cent. if redeemed within one year, 40 per cent. if redeemed within two years, 60 per cent. if redeemed within three years, 80 per cent. if redeemed within four years, and 100 per cent. if redeemed within five or any greater number of years after the date of sale. The section in terms applies: "In all cases where real estate has been or may hereafter be sold for delinquent taxes to the state, and the state has not disposed of the same, the person whose estate has been or may hereafter be sold," etc.

The sole question presented for determination is this: Is the owner of the land entitled to make redemption obliged to pay the amount to redeem required by the act of March 28, 1895, or can he redeem by paying the amount required under the laws in force at the date of sale? No part of the Political Code is retroactive unless expressly so declared. Pol. Code, § 3. This applies to amendments thereto equally with the original. Railroad Co. v. Shackelford, 63 Cal. 261. That the legislature intended to make the amendment of 1895 to section 3817 retroactive is amply attested by the language used: "A retrospective statute affecting and changing vested rights is very generally considered in this country as founded on unconstitutional principles, and consequently inoperative and void. But this doctrine is not understood to apply to remedial statutes which may be of a retrospective nature, provided they do not impair contracts or disturb vested rights, and go only to confirm rights already existing, and, in furtherance of the remedy, by curing defects and adding to the means of enforcing existing obligations." 1 Kent, Comm. 455. Remedial statutes which are retrospective, but do not impair contracts or disturb vested rights, are not unconstitutional; and the legislature may from time to time alter, change, or modify the remedy, provided in so doing they do not affect the right; but whenever they so far alter the remedy as to impair, destroy, change, or render the right scarcely worth pursuing, they necessarily impair the obligation of the contract upon which such right is founded. Smith v. Morse, 2 Cal. 524; Scarborough v. Dugan, 10 Cal. 305; People v. Seymour, 16 Cal. 332; Moore v. Martin, 38 Cal. 428; Redemption Co. v. Sedgwick, 15 Cal. 515; Oullahan v. Sweeney, 79 Cal. 537, 21 Pac. 960;

Appellant very properly admits that "an act which impairs the obligation of a contract, or devests a vested right, is in conflict with section 10, art. 1, of the federal constitution, and with section 16 of article 1 of the constitution of the state of California." He contends, however, that the amendment of 1895 to section 3817 of the Political Code does not impair the obligation of a contract, or devest a vested right. His theory is that a tax duly levied has the effect of a judgment against the person, and the lien created thereby has the force and effect of an execution duly levied against all the property of the delinquent (Pol. Code, § 3716), and that the sale of property upon default of payment and the right of redemption as an incident thereto is a remedy which may be changed at any time at the will of the legislature, and, though retroactive, will not be invalid for that reason. In support of this position, and of the argument in favor thereof, counsel cite: Redemption Co. v. Sedgwick, 15 Cal. 525; Loan Soc. v. Hayes, 56 Cal. 303; Oullahan v. Sweeney, 79 Cal. 537, 21 Pac. 960; and several other cases. In Redemption Co. v. Sedgwick the change in the redemption law was made before the sale took place. In Lumber Co. v. Olmstead, 85 Cal. 80, 24 Pac. 648, which was an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, after a portion of the materials had been furnished, the law was amended, and it was held that the amendment shortening the time for filing a lien, but which afforded an adequate remedy, was not retroactive, and applied to pending cases of uncompleted buildings. In the Oullahan Case the court held that an amendment to the statute after a tax sale, requiring the purchaser to give notice before applying for a deed, went to the remedy only, and was applicable to cases existing at the time the law took effect. The court assumed, for the purposes of that case (but did not decide), "that the legislature cannot make an absolute extension of the time for redemption of property previously sold."

We think it well settled that the legislature may, at any time before a sale of property under a decree or execution, amend the law in relation to redemption, by extending or shortening the time therefor, and apply it to existing cases. The question here, however, is: Can the legislature, after a tax sale, lawfully amend the law so as to apply new and more onerous conditions to the right to redeem than those which existed when the sale was made? We think this question is answered in the negative by the elementary writers, and by the adjudicated cases. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, at page 353 (6th Ed.), says: "So, a law is void which extends the time for the redemption of lands sold on execution, or for delinquent taxes, after the sale has been made; for in such a case the contract with the purchaser, and for which he has paid his money, is that he shall have title at the time then provided by the law; and to extend the time for redemption is to alter the substance of the contract, as much as would be the extension of the time for payment of a promissory note; so a law which shortens the time for redemption from a mortgage after a foreclosure sale has taken place is void, the rights of the party being fixed by the foreclosure and the law then in force." Black on Tax Titles, at section 175, says: "The right of redemption from a tax sale must be governed by the law in force at the time of sale. It cannot be affected by subsequent legislation." He quotes from Merrill v. Dearing, 32 Minn. 479, 21 N. W. 721, as follows: "The right of property acquired by the purchaser at this sale, and the right of redemption remaining to the owner, must both be governed by the law in force at the time of sale. Neither, in our judgment, could be either abridged or enlarged by subsequent legislation. This is unquestionably so as to the right of the purchaser. The same rule ought to apply in favor of the owner as against any statute shortening the time to redeem, as it is equally unjust to legislate against the owner of the land as in his favor." Negus v. Yancey, 22 Iowa, 57; Goenen v. Schroeder, 8 Minn. 387 (Gil. 344); Robinson v. Howe, 13 Wis. 380; Conway v. Cable, 37 Ill. 82; Moody v. Hoskins, 64 Miss. 468, 1 South. 622; Caruthers v. McLaran, 56 Miss. 371; Wolfe v. Henderson, 28 Ark. 304. Blackwell on Tax Titles, at section 729 (5th Ed.), expresses the same views in the following language: "The law in being at the time of sale governs the right of redemption. The time can be neither lengthened nor shortened by subsequent legislation. * * * The right to redeem is a condition attached to the sale, and the legislature cannot defeat it by a subsequent act. A provision affecting the period of redemption can only apply to sales after the day on which the act took effect."

The enforced sale of property on execution, or for the nonpayment of taxes, institutes a contract with the purchaser which cannot be materially altered without his consent. The right of the owner to redeem is perhaps, strictly speaking, one not resting in contract, but is a right vested in him under the law,—a right pertaining to the contract itself, and which, in reason and justice, is not more open to attack than that of the purchaser. It has been said in a few of the many cases on the subject that, so far as the right to redeem is concerned, it is not derived from any contract, but is given by the law only, and the time within which it may be exercised may be shortened by the legislature, provided a reasonable time is left within which to exercise it, without impairing the obligation of the contract. We think these cases are opposed to the weight of authority; but, concede that they are not, and we think the case at bar is clearly distinguishable from them.

Here an additional burden is cast upon the redemptioner, whereby his right to redeem is subjected to the payment of a sum of money greatly in excess of that required of him under the statute which conferred the right upon him. To require a party to perform an act at a time different from that required by a former statute is a difference only in point of time, and may be said to affect the remedy only; but to require him to pay a sum of money greatly in excess of that required by a former statute is to impose upon him a burden having no relation to the remedy. In Hillebert v. Porter, 28 Minn. 496, 11 N. W. 84, it was held that a law which increased the rate of interest to be paid on redemption of a pre-existing mortgage could not be upheld. What the state could sell under the tax sale was limited by what the purchaser could purchase, and that was the right to have the title subject to the owner's right to redeem upon the payment of a given sum of money at any time before the state parted with its interest in the property. This right of redemption became a condition of the contract of purchase, and could not, in reason or justice, be ignored or changed by a subsequent statute, any more than the sale itself. It was an essential element of the contract of sale, and not a mere naked right, to be changed or abridged as a mere matter of public policy. Though intimately connected with the remedy, it was not a part of the remedy, but a substantive right preserved to the redemptioner, and equally sacred with those acquired by the purchaser, which latter rights it limited. It was a right of property remaining in the former owner after the exhaustion of the remedy by sale, and the statute which (passed after the sale) seeks to impair this right, by adding new burdens to its exercise, is violative of constitutional guaranties. We recommend that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BRITT, C.; BELCHER, C.

RUSSELL v. PACIFIC CAN CO. (S. F. 615.)

MASTER AND SERVANT — NEGLIGENCE — DUTY TO INSPECT.

Defendant furnished at its factory a water-closet, into the vault of which hot steam was discharged for sanitary purposes. The steam exhaust pipe, as constructed, turned downward, and entered cold water in the vault. Plaintiff, —an employé,—while using the closet, was scalded by the steam. After the accident the end of the steam exhaust pipe was found to point directly upward. Defendant had not inspected the closet since its construction, four years before. Held, that the failure to inspect was negligence.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Nora Russell, a minor, by her guardian ad litem, against the Pacific Can Company. From a judgment on a verdict in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Van Ness & Redman, for appellant. Reinstein & Eisner, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The appellant is a corporation engaged in conducting a factory for the manufacture of tin cans and other articles. Nora Russell, a minor and employé, brings this action, in the name of her guardian ad litem, for damages for personal injuries received. The jury found in her favor, and assessed the damages at the sum of $2,500. The corporation appeals from the judgment and the order denying a new trial. The general facts to be considered may be briefly stated as follows: The plaintiff, a girl of 14 years, was an employé of the defendant, and upon the day of the accident, being the first day of her employment, was working for the defendant at its place of business in the city of San Francisco. Upon the premises there was a certain outhouse or water-closet provided for the use of employés. In connection with its business the defendant used and employed steam power, and had constructed and maintained an exhaust steam pipe which ran into said closet, and discharged steam immediately beneath the place where persons using said outhouse or water-closet were in the habit of sitting. While the plaintiff was in the act of using said closet, steam and hot water came through said exhaust steam pipe into said outhouse, immediately beneath the person of said plaintiff, whereby she was seriously scalded and burned. The steam was conducted to this place for sanitary purposes, and such arrangement had been in use for more than four years. Cold water was also emptied into the vault of this closet by means of a pipe, and when the end of the exhaust steam pipe penetrated the cold water there was no danger from the hot steam. The end of the exhaust pipe consisted of an elbow 18 inches in length, claimed by defendant to have been so placed as to extend directly downward to within 15 or 18 inches of the bottom of the vault. Immediately after the accident the place was examined, and it was found that the aforesaid elbow of the exhaust steam pipe pointed directly upward. The foregoing facts either appeared from the evidence of plaintiff's witnesses, or were admitted by defendant's pleading, save the position of the elbow of the exhaust pipe at the time of the accident; and its position, as pointing upward rather than downward at that time, was shown by the evidence of the defendant.

Defendant insists that its motion for a nonsuit was improperly denied, and also insists that the evidence, as a whole, is insufficient in law to make a case for plaintiff. Of course, if plaintiff's case is strengthened by defendant's evidence to the extent that, when finally submitted, it is strong enough to support a verdict, even though inherently too weak to accomplish that result when a nonsuit was denied, then a denial of the nonsuit is harmless error. And here, if it appears from all the evidence in the record that a case for plaintiff is made out, then the action of the court in refusing the nonsuit is not reversible error. With these principles in view, we pass the consideration of the question of nonsuit, and come directly to the examination of the bill of exceptions, with a view to testing the sufficiency of the evidence, taken as a whole, in supporting the verdict of the jury. In addition to the facts we have quoted, it further appeared that this steam pipe had been connected with the closet for some four years immediately prior to the accident, and that no examination of the closet had been made by defendant during that time. No question of contributory negligence is involved, and the case, upon its face, addresses itself to the single interrogatory, does the evidence indicate negligence upon the part of the defendant?

Plaintiff was an employé of defendant. It was defendant's duty to furnish her a closet reasonably safe. This it failed to do, but, on the contrary, furnished her a closet the use of which was accompanied with the greatest danger. There is no question but that the closet furnished plaintiff was not suitable for the purposes intended, and it was not suitable by reason of the fact that it was not safe. It may be stating the proposition too strongly to say defendant was bound to furnish a closet which could be used with safety; but, to be strictly within the law, we say defendant was bound to use reasonable and ordinary care in the selection of the closet furnished this plaintiff, and we think it plain the jury were justified in finding that such care was not used. Steam is a dangerous element to be used, under any circumstances; and we here find a closet, furnished by defendant for the use of plaintiff, into which steam had been emptied for a period of four years, and no inspection of its condition had been made during that entire time. A failure to examine the closet, in view of the fact that hot steam was being constantly, more or less, discharged into it, was sufficient to justify the jury in holding defendant guilty of negligence. Certainly the defendant was bound to furnish a closet that was not inherently and ordinarily dangerous, and this was not such a one. Defendant furnished a closet that, in effect, it had not seen for four years. Even if it should be conceded that an employer is not bound to know the condition of a defective appliance furnished his employé, still, as matter of fact, a jury will be justified in holding him guilty of negligence in furnishing an appliance he has not seen in four years' time. It is no answer to a charge of negligence to say that "four years ago I constructed that appliance, and it was then in perfect condition." The wear and tear of use, or of time alone, should be guarded against by the exercise of some degree of care upon the part of the employer. A stage company furnishing its driver with a stage which it had not seen for four years would be guilty of negligence justifying damages to him, if the stage gave way by reason of its defects, however perfect its condition four years before; and such recovery would be based upon the fundamental principle of a lack of ordinary care upon the part of the employer in selecting and furnishing the appliance to be used by the employé. And the principle in the case here under consideration is no different than if injury to this plaintiff had been produced by the giving way of the boards of the closet, or the caving in of the vault. It would be no answer to say that "four years ago I built the closet, and it was then in perfect condition." This appliance was furnished plaintiff upon the day of the accident, not at the date of its construction. It was furnished plaintiff at a time when defendant absolutely knew nothing of its condition. When the elbow of the pipe was changed from a downward to an upward direction is unknown. The evidence is not at all conclusive that it ever pointed downward. The builder of it did not testify, and no man ever saw it pointing in that direction. It undoubtedly was the intention of the defendant that it should be so constructed, but the evidence is not at all convincing that such was the fact. But whatever may be the true theory as to the fact we think immaterial, for the jury were justified in holding the defendant guilty of negligence in furnishing an appliance the condition of which it did not know,—an appliance which it had not seen for the period of four years. The principles of law here discussed are elementary, and for that reason no extended citation of authority has been made. The application of the facts to those principles, however, is plain and conclusive. As defining the duty of the master to his servant, the court of appeals of New York in Ryan v. Fowler, 24 N. Y. 414, said: "The location of the privy in a dangerous place made it more imperatively his duty to see to it that its foundations were made and kept sound and safe beyond contingency. He had no right to expose the female operatives of his factory to risks and danger in such a place. It was his duty to know that the privy was safe, and that the operatives for whom it was designed and provided might resort to it without personal risk, or peril to life or limb. * * * It was provided for her use. It was the master's duty to see that it was safe and secure, and not hers to watch and guard, by any particular vigilance, against accidents of the kind which caused her injury." In its facts this case is surprisingly similar to the case at bar. The damages recovered are not excessive. Neither is the alleged misconduct upon the part of plaintiff's counsel during the progress of the trial such as to demand a retrial of the case. For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are affirmed.

USURY—COMPOUND INTEREST.

1. Civ. Code, § 1919, authorizing parties to contract that, on default of prompt payment of interest, it shall become part of the principal, and bear the same rate of interest, inhibits a contract for compound interest at a higher rate than the principal bears, though such interest is to run independently of the principal.

2. Where a contract for compound interest is illegal, because fixing a higher rate than the principal bears, no compound interest can be allowed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. B. Cope, Judge.

Action by U. Yndart against N. C. Den and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Modified.

Boyce, Taggart & Kellogg, for appellants. Richards & Carrier, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. This is an appeal from the final judgment given in favor of the plaintiff upon foreclosure of certain four mortgages of real estate. The appeal is taken on the ground, as claimed in appellants' brief, that the clause in each of the notes secured by the mortgages, respectively, relating to interest, was illegal and void, in attempting to give a penalty for nonpayment of interest, and that the decree is excessive, and for an amount beyond what the plaintiff was rightly entitled to recover. One of the notes bears interest at 10 per cent. per annum, and three bear interest at 11 per cent. per annum, payable in each case semiannually. In each of said notes the following provision is found: "If any installment of interest be not paid when due, the amount of such installment shall bear interest at 20 per cent. per annum from the time the same was due until paid; or, at the option of the holder of this note, in default of payment of interest at the times herein provided the whole sum—principal and interest—shall be due and payable." Demurrer to the complaint was interposed and overruled, but defendants failed to answer, and their default was entered. No point is urged on the demurrer. The notes were all past due when the action was commenced. Appellant contends: First. The deferred installments of interest cannot bear a greater rate of interest than the principal debt. Second. If interest is allowed on deferred installments, by implication it must be limited to the legal rate. Third. If the penalty clause in the notes is void, no interest on deferred payments of interest can be recovered.

1. Appellant relies in support of his first contention upon the provision of section 1919, Civ. Code, as construed in the case of Society v. Horton, 63 Cal. 105, and Dean v. Applegarth, 65 Cal. 391, 4 Pac. 375. It is claimed that these cases decide that it is not competent for the parties to contract that interest upon interest can be legally enforced or fixed beyond the rate to be borne by the principal. Section 1919 reads as follows: "The parties may, in any contract in writing whereby any debt is secured to be paid, agree that if the interest on such debt is not punctually paid, it shall become a part of the principal, and thereafter bear the same rate of interest as the principal debt." It is replied by respondent to the point that the cases upon which appellant relies "do not seem to have been elaborately argued, or the question carefully considered, * * * and we may consistently say that, if not directly overruled, they are rejected as barren." The question is an important one, and should be definitely settled, if it has not been. The case of Society v. Horton, supra, is not fully reported. The provisions of the note are not given, nor is the scope of the complaint stated. No synopsis of the briefs is given, nor are the facts stated in the opinion. The opinion is rendered per curiam, and two of the justices dissented, but upon what grounds does not appear. It was a default decree, and was reversed because in excess of the claim made in the complaint. The opinion concludes as follows: "The attention of the court below is directed to section 1919 of the Civil Code, in computing interest upon the interest which is not punctually paid. That section declares that the parties may agree that it shall become a part of the principal, and thereafter bear the same rate of interest as the principal debt. [Italics are in the report.] This appears to us to be the limit." There was a petition for rehearing denied. It would seem fair to conclude that the note there in question at least provided for payment of interest upon interest at a rate greater than that fixed for the principal; but whether it provided also, as in the notes here in question, that the interest upon the interest was not to become a part of the principal, but to run independently of the interest on the principal, cannot be assumed. The case of Dean v. Applegarth, supra, was more fully reported. The terms of the note are stated to be "that the principal was to bear interest at one per cent. per month, and it was agreed that, in case default should be made in the payment of any of the interest as stated above, that such installment or payment thus in default should bear interest from the day of maturity until payment at the rate of two per cent. per month, compounding monthly." It was also provided that at any time during such default the entire unpaid balance of the principal sum should, at the option of the holder of the note, and not otherwise, become due and payable, and the principal sum so due and payable should bear interest thereafter at the rate of 2 per cent. per month, compounding monthly until paid. When the action was commenced the note, by its terms, had become due, and it did not appear from the complaint that any option was made in any way by plaintiff (mortgagee) prior to the commencement of the action, at which time the note by its terms was due. As to the interest on the principal sum compounding at the increased rate of 2 per cent., the court said the provisions of the note did not apply, because the option had not been exercised, except by bringing the suit after the maturity of the note. The court said: "As to the interest on interest in default, when default was made in the payment of any monthly installment it had become due and payable. No election was required to make that so. The plaintiff, under the contract, had a right to have such installment unpaid bear interest. But it cannot be made to bear interest at a rate greater than that borne by the principal debt (Civ. Code, § 1919), which in this case is one per cent. per month. This is the construction placed upon section 1919 of the Civil Code in Society v. Horton, 63 Cal. 105. The section 1918 of the Civil Code is limited by section 1919. The latter section applies specifically to agreements to pay interest on interest, and its particular words cannot be controlled by the general language of the preceding section, which refers to a different subject, and can have full application without affecting the provisions of the section which follows it." The decision of the court below was reversed because more interest was allowed than should have been. In the case in 63 Cal., supra, Mr. Justice Thornton and Mr. Justice Myrick dissented; but in the case in 65 Cal. and 4 Pac., supra, Mr. Justice Thornton delivered the opinion, in which Mr. Justice Myrick concurred. We must therefore assume that the dissent in the earlier case was on other grounds, and that the point under discussion was presented in both cases, and duly considered.

The provisions of the notes in the particular now being examined are apparently the same. In both cases the interest on the defaulted interest was to bear interest until paid at the increased rate, and was not, by the terms of the notes, to become part of the principal sum. The rule laid down in Dean v. Applegarth has stood unquestioned in this court since 1884, so far as I have been able to discover, until the case of Thompson v. Gorner, first decided in department (1894; 36 Pac. 434), and finally in bank (104 Cal. 168, 37 Pac. 900), in which respondent claims a different rule was laid down. In the case just referred to the note provided as follows: "* * * with interest thereon [the principal sum] * * * from the date hereof until paid at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, payable monthly in advance; and, if said principal or interest is not paid as it becomes due, it shall thereafter bear interest at the rate of one per cent. per month." So far as the question here presented is concerned, the provisions of this note differ from the notes in the case at bar. The provision of the notes in this case is: "If any installment of interest be not paid when due, the amount of said installment shall bear interest at twenty per cent. per annum from the time the same was due until paid"; the interest on the principal sum being ten per cent. in one, and eleven per cent. in the others. In the case of Thompson v. Gorner, supra, the provisions are that, "if said principal or interest is not paid as it becomes due, it shall thereafter bear interest at the rate of one per cent. per month." It is not entirely clear as to whether the additional interest is to be computed on defaulted interest or defaulted principal. The opinion in the department was written by Mr. Commissioner Searls, and in bank by Mr. Justice McFarland. A careful reading of both opinions will fail to disclose that interest upon interest was claimed or allowed. The court in bank allowed "judgment for the amount of the principal and interest thereon from and after February 20, 1892, at one per cent. per month." Interest had been paid at 8 per cent. up to that date, and accepted by the plaintiff (the holder of the note); and the court held that acceptance of the interest was a waiver of any claim for additional interest prior to that time, but not as to the future. It is to be observed, however, that neither the learned justice nor the learned commissioner referred to section 1919, Civ. Code, nor to the case in 63 Cal. supra, nor the case in 65 Cal. and 4 Pac., supra, nor does it appear that the attention of either was called to that section in the briefs of counsel. "Plaintiff's points and authorities were very meager, covering only one page and referring only to the question of penalty." Mr. Justice McFarland, 104 Cal. 170, 37 Pac. 901. I think, if this case had been intended to overrule Society v. Horton and Dean v. Applegarth, some mention of that fact would have been made, and, if a new interpretation of section 1919 had been intended, that fact would have been disclosed. Attention is also drawn by respondent to a recent opinion by Mr. Commissioner Britt in the case of Finger v. McCaughey, 45 Pac. 1004, 114 Cal. 64. In that case the note read: "With interest from date at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, provided this note is paid at maturity; but, if not paid at maturity, then it shall bear interest at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum from its date until paid; and, if the interest is not paid at the end of one year from date, it shall become a part of the principal, and bear twelve per cent. interest per annum." In this case counsel for appellant called attention to section 1919, Civ. Code, and to the cases in 63 and 65 Cal. and 4 Pac., supra, and claimed that, by the terms of the note, it precludes anything but simple interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum. Respondent cited Thompson v. Gorner, 104 Cal. 168, 37 Pac. 900, as deciding adversely to appellants' contention. The learned commissioner said: "It is competent for the parties to agree upon an increased rate contingent upon nonpayment of either principal or interest when due,"—citing Thompson v. Gorner, supra. We see no substantial ground for distinguishing this case from that; and the court gave compound interest for one year only at the increased rate of 12 per cent. In both cases last above referred to the notes provided: (1) In the case of Thompson v. Gorner, the provision was that, if the principal or interest is not paid as it becomes due, it shall thereafter bear interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month. The decree may well be assumed to have covered interest on the principal only. (2) In the case of Finger v. McCaughey, the provision was interest from date at 10 per cent. per annum, provided the note is paid at maturity, but, if not paid at maturity, then it shall bear interest at 12 per cent. from its date until paid; and, if the interest is not paid at the end of one year from date, it shall become part of the principal, and bear 12 per cent. interest per annum. I do not think that the precise question decided in Society v. Horton and Dean v. Applegarth is necessarily involved in either one of the two later cases just examined; nor do I think that the provisions of the notes in these two later cases are the equivalent of the provisions of the notes now before us. In the two later cases it may well be said that, upon the contingency named (nonpayment of principal when due), it (the principal) shall bear the increased rate of interest. It is a part of the contract as to payment of the principal, and is as much to be regarded as the part relating to the lower rate. Both rates are given; one to be in one event, and the other in another. But in the case before us it is the defaulted interest that must bear the increased rate, while the rate on the principal remains unaffected and unchanged. Now, it was exactly this provision in Dean v. Applegarth that the court said was prohibited by section 1919. This section, said the court, "applies specifically to agreements to pay interest on interest, and its particular words cannot be controlled by the general language of the preceding section, which refers to a different subject," etc. It will be noticed that, if the construction given to the note in Finger v. McCaughey be correct,—that the principal, by its terms, bore 12 per cent. per annum,—then it is not obnoxious to this section; for the defaulted interest was to bear only 12 per cent., and this the section expressly permitted to be done. The section is not designed to restrict the rate of interest that may be agreed upon as to the principal,—this has no limit (section 1918),—but it is aimed at rates of interest greater than those fixed for the principal to bear, and declares that the parties may agree that, if the interest is not punctually paid, it may become a part of the principal, and thereafter (not before) may bear the same rate of interest (no more) as the principal debt.

The respondent calls attention to the fact that section 1919 is taken bodily from the statute of 1850 (1 Hitt. Gen. Laws, § 3858), and was adopted for the simple purpose of legalizing compound interest; citing the note of the code commissioners. This need not be questioned. To say that, when interest is not paid when due, it shall become a part of the principal, and thereafter bear like interest with the principal,—which is the usual form,—is strictly within the section, and is compound interest. But to say that the principal shall bear 10 per cent. interest per annum, and, if not so paid, it—the interest—shall thereafter bear 20 per cent., is what is here attempted, but is what this court has said cannot be done, as the law now stands. It is not a question as to penalties. It is a question as to the right to contract to this effect. Section 1918, Civ. Code, provides that "parties may agree in writing for the payment of any rate of interest, and it shall be allowed, according to the terms of the agreement." But the legislature has placed this limit upon the power to agree as to interest, to wit, that the rate of interest upon interest, or compound interest, shall not be greater than that fixed upon the principal. Section 1918 presupposes an indebtedness which is the principal. As to that, any rate of interest, however extortionate or unconscionable, may be agreed upon by the parties. Boyce v. Fisk, 110 Cal. 107, 42 Pac. 473. But, as to the interest yet to be earned, no rate of interest on that shall be still higher, or any higher. Counsel for respondent, with much seeming force, say: "If section 1919 really forbids the placing of a higher rate on the interest than originally stipulated for the principal, unless at the same time the rate on the principal is increased, the two last referred to decisions [meaning Society v. Horton and Dean v. Applegarth] have consigned its prospective power to technical operation upon one, and probably the least unconscionable, of a thousand and one devices to secure prompt payment of the compensation for the use of the money, or as damages for its detention, or for the creditor's forbearance, all of which devices, with this one solitary exception, are indorsed by the courts as legal and binding." The obvious reply to this is that we have no concern with the law, except to rightly interpret it as we find it. If we have not yet reached the point in legislation to adopt laws against usury, and if we still permit agreements to be made for the payment of 10 per cent. per month, or any other unconscionable per cent. per month interest on the money loaned, it would seem that a provision to limit the rate of interest that may be charged on the interest to a point not in excess of that placed upon the principal is at least humane, if it is "a curtailment of the freedom to contract in reference to the use, forbearance, and detention of money granted by the preceding section," as suggested by respondent. Respondent further suggests that "the provision for interest upon interest represents more than compensation for the use or detention of the interest money; it is one of two obligations stipulated for to insure prompt payment and obviate loss by delay, and thus imports a consideration outside what supports compound interest, and which brings it within the category of recognized subjects of unlimited contract between lender and borrower." But the Code law embraces the whole subject of interest, and must control it. There can be no such thing as unlimited contract between lender and borrower, as to payment of interest, outside these Code provisions. The Code says to the lender, "You may exact unlimited interest on your loan, but on the interest to be earned you must keep within this limit." Our law is quite liberal to the creditor. We are reluctant to extend its liberality. We can well see how a borrower, in his anxiety, may agree to almost any terms as to the interest on the interest, believing he will be able to avoid the default that may bring disaster upon him; but the legislature seems to have anticipated this prevalent weakness of the borrower, and has endeavored, in a measure, to shield him from his impetuosity. The legislature may also have considered that the lender who would part with his money for 1 per cent. per month interest should be content to receive 1 per cent. upon the accumulating interest. It may have considered that interest money is of no more worth than the principal. However this may be, with the policy of the law we can, as a court, have nothing to do.

2. Appellant claims further that, if interest is allowed on deferred installments of interest by implication, it must be limited to the legal rate. He claims in his third point that, the compound interest claimed being illegal, there is no contract to pay any compound interest. To this respondent replies that the most that can be claimed for the cases of Society v. Horton and Dean v. Applegarth is that they limit the rate of compound interest to the rate the principal bears; that only the excess can be treated as void and be rejected. In Dean v. Applegarth the court directed a modification of the judgment so that the compound interest should conform to the rate provided to be paid on the principal. Appellant assails this conclusion. He says: "The point was not dwelt upon, nor was the court's attention called to the fact that, if the provision in the note could not be upheld according to its terms, there was no provision for recovering interest at the same rate as that borne by the principal debt." In order that the point now under discussion may be clearly understood, I will restate the provisions of one of the notes,—and they are all alike in this particular: "* * * with interest thereon in like gold coin from date until paid, at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable semiannually at the end of each and every six months from date. If any installment of interest be not paid when due, the amount of said installment shall bear interest at twenty per cent. per annum from the time the same was due until paid." In the case of Doe v. Vallejo, 29 Cal., at page 392, Mr. Justice Sawyer, speaking for the court, said: "The only remaining question is as to the interest. The note was for fifteen thousand dollars, and interest at one and a half per cent. per month; 'said interest to be due and payable at the end of every six months.' The interest was not paid as it fell due, and the plaintiff claims that he is entitled to interest on each installment of interest from the time it fell due, by the terms of the contract, till paid, at the rate of ten per cent. per annum." The statute then in force is found in Wood's Digest, p. 551 (Act March 13, 1850, to regulate interest on money). Section 1 of that act is substantially the same as section 1917 of the Civil Code. Section 2 of that act is similar to section 1918 of the Civil Code, only the Code limits the agreed interest to entry of judgment, while the old act gave the same interest on the judgment that was given in the contract. Section 3 of the act of 1850 is verbatim the same as section 1919, Civ. Code. In Doe v. Vallejo, supra, the trial court did not allow interest at the statutory rate of 10 per cent. upon the accrued interest installments. Mr. Justice Sawyer said: "If section 1 contained the only provision upon the subject, there would be great force in the position taken by the appellant, and—although there is some conflict on the point—the authorities greatly preponderate in his favor. [Citing numerous cases.] But the third section of the statute, authorizing parties to contract in writing for interest upon interest in default of punctual payment, also bears upon the question. And this section has already been construed by our predecessors to exclude interest after it falls due, unless expressly so agreed in writing. Montgomery v. Tutt, 11 Cal. 316. The question in that case was precisely similar in principle to the one now under consideration." And the judgment was affirmed in Doe v. Vallejo. A comparison of the notes here and the notes in Doe v. Vallejo will show no substantial difference, as to payment of interest, in the first part of the notes; and, as the law then and now is substantially the same, I see no escape from holding that there is no agreement to pay interest on the interest, without overruling Doe v. Vallejo, unless the subsequent clause in the notes can be held to import an agreement to pay interest on interest. The notes do provide for payment of interest upon interest, but it is at a rate, as we have held, unauthorized by law. The question remains can this court find that any contract exists, by implication or otherwise, to pay interest upon interest at any rate? It seems to me the imperative logic of the contract is that, the agreement to pay compound interest being illegal, there is no agreement at all to pay interest upon interest, and this court cannot make one for the parties. It must not be forgotten that there is a wide difference between interest upon money loaned and interest upon interest accrued. In the former case the law says that when money is loaned it is presumed to be loaned upon interest. Civ. Code, § 1914. And, as we have seen, the rate of interest may be fixed by the parties without limit. Id. § 1918. But interest upon interest must be contracted for in writing, and in no case must bear a greater rate than that placed upon the principal debt. Id. § 1919. Except in certain cases, where courts of equity may order interest to be computed with rests, no interest is computed on the accrued interest; it being a rule of law that interest shall not be compounded, unless by stipulation of the contract. In re Den's Estate, 35 Cal. 692. And see cases cited supra: Society v. Horton; Dean v. Applegarth; Montgomery v. Tutt; Doe v. Montgomery. Recurring to Finger v. McCaughey, supra, Mr. Commissioner Britt, in the opinion, said: "But in such a contract the right to compound interest must find support in the terms employed by the parties; and the stipulation in this note [the note there in suit] that, if the interest is not paid at the end of one year from date, it should become part of the principal, and bear interest, looks to the compounding of the interest accruing June 6, 1890, but not afterwards." The note was dated June 6, 1889, and only one year of compound interest was allowed under the terms of the note. This view makes any further discussion of appellants' third point unnecessary. My conclusion is that the decisions of this court in society v. Horton and Dean v. Applegarth are neither "overruled" nor "rejected as barren" by any subsequent decisions, and that the decree in this case allows excessive interest, and that interest should be computed at the annual rate of 10 and 11 per cent. upon the respective notes, and that no interest can be compounded. The respondent, by the terms of the notes, had the option, upon default of payment of interest as provided, to declare the whole sum—principal and interest—to be due. The first note and mortgage was dated April 16, 1892, and six months thereafter he could have exercised his option. The other notes, and the several mortgages given for their security, came along later, and he had a like option as to each. He chose to wait until April 20, 1895, without manifesting any intention to avail himself of the option, and then only by suit; during all which time the notes were running, and no payments either of principal or interest were made. Having failed to bring the defaulting makers of the notes to face their obligations may be unfortunate for the holder, but the consequences are the clear result of the contracts made, and he cannot reasonably complain. If he had adopted the almost universal formula of providing that the interest, when due, should become a part of the principal, and thereafter bear like interest as the principal, he would have brought himself exactly within the law, and this case would never have come here. I am, perhaps, not justified in having taken so much space to reach a conclusion; but the fact that the decision of this court of long standing was seriously assailed, and was claimed to have been recently overruled, seemed to demand that the question be placed beyond dispute. As the only objection made to the decree is that excessive interest was allowed, I see no necessity for doing more than to direct a modification of the judgment; and we recommend that the cause be remanded, with directions to modify the decree in accordance with the views laid down in this opinion, as of the date the judgment appealed from was entered, and, when thus modified and entered, that the decree stand affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion it is ordered that the cause be remanded, with directions to modify the decree in accordance with the views laid down in this opinion, as of the date the judgment appealed from was entered; and, when thus modified and entered, the decree will stand affirmed.

BENNALACK v. RICHARDS et al. (Sac. 162.)

SALE OF REAL ESTATE BY EXECUTORS UNDER POWER—NECESSITY OF CONFIRMATION—TRUSTS IN REAL ESTATE.

1. A sale of real estate of a testator by the executors under a power contained in the will passes no title unless confirmed by the court (Code Civ. Proc. § 1561), except where the will devises the property in trust, and vests the legal title in the executors as trustees.

2. Authority given executors by a will to sell the testator's real estate at public or private sale without an order of court, and to execute all necessary conveyances, does not create a trust, under Civ. Code, § 857, subd. 1, providing that express trusts may be created "to sell real property and apply or dispose of the proceeds in accordance with the instrument creating the trust," where the will does not direct the disposition of the proceeds.

3. No valid trust can be created to sell real property for the benefit of legatees, under Civ. Code, § 847, providing that "trusts in relation to real property are those only which are specified in this title," and section 857, subd. 2, which, as it originally stood, authorized the creation of a trust "to sell, mortgage, or lease real property for the benefit of annuitants or other legatees," but which, in 1874, was amended to its present form, and the word "sell" was omitted.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; John Caldwell, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Bennalack against Richards and others. Judgment for plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Chas. W. Kitts, for appellants. A. Burrows and P. F. Simonds, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Philip Richards died in 1887, leaving a last will and testament, by which he made certain specific legacies, and left the residue of his estate to his brothers, William S. Richards and Francis Richards. He appointed William G. Richards, Francis Richards, and John Bennalack as executors of his will, and gave them power, after the expiration of two years from his death, to sell any portion of his estate at public or private sale, "without any order of court, or being required to account to any court." Under this power the executors sold certain land at public auction May 11, 1891, and on the same day executed to the purchaser a conveyance, in which, as executors, they purported to convey to him, by virtue of the power given them in the will, "all the right, title, and estate of the said Philip Richards, deceased, at the time of his death, and also all the right, title, and interest that the said estate, by operation of law or otherwise, may have acquired, other than or in addition to that of said deceased at the time of his death," in and to the said land. The land was sold for its full value, and for more than an appraisement thereof made within a month prior thereto. The plaintiff has succeeded to the rights of the purchaser, and brought the present action against the executors of the will and the residuary legatees to quiet her title thereto. Judgment was rendered in her favor, and a new trial was denied. From this judgment, and order denying a new trial, this appeal has been taken.

Section 1561, Code Civ. Proc., provides that when a will gives to an executor authority to sell property, he may make such sale without the order of the court, but that he must make return of such sale, as in other cases; and that, if special directions are given in the will, he must observe those directions in the sale; and that "in either case no title passes unless the sale be confirmed by the court." The power of the legislature to restrict the testamentary disposition of property, or to place limitations upon the authority that may be conferred upon an executor or upon the exercise by him of the authority given by the will, is too well settled to require discussion. Decisions upon the effect of a conveyance by an executor without a confirmation by the court, rendered in other jurisdictions in which there is no statute similar to the foregoing provision of section 1561, are without authority in this state; nor are decisions given under rules prevailing in states where the executor is held to be a trustee under a continuing trust for the benefit of all the parties interested in the estate, until its final disposition in accordance with the terms of the will, applicable under the system prevailing in this state. Prior to 1861 a testator could confer upon his executor power to dispose of his estate, independent of any control by the probate court. Larco v. Casaneuava, 30 Cal. 560. But in that year the legislature passed an act requiring the confirmation of all sales made by executors under authority given by the will; and in 1872 the foregoing provision of the Code was adopted. The language used therein is too explicit to admit of construction, and we must hold that no title passed by the sale and conveyance of the executor to the plaintiff's grantor.

In Estate of Delaney, 49 Cal. 76, and Estate of Williams, 92 Cal. 183, 28 Pac. 227, 679, the testator devised his property to his executors in trust for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of his will, and it was held that their conveyance, without confirmation by the court, passed the title as fully as would the conveyance of any devisee in trust. The distinction between those cases and those in which the executors are given only a power of sale was pointed out in Estate of Durham, 49 Cal. 490, where it was said: "In the one case the freehold remains in the heirs until a sale. In the other it vests in the executors on the demise of the decedent. To the former class of cases the provision of section 1561, Code Civ. Proc., that no sale shall be valid unless confirmed by the probate court, is applicable. The account of sale spoken of in this section is the same as the 'return' mentioned in section 1552 of the Code, and the statute evidently contemplates that the same proceedings shall be had with respect to the return when a sale is made under a power in a will as when it is made under an order of court. The sale must be reported under oath, and confirmed by the probate court, before the title to the property sold can pass." In the present case the testator did not devise the land to his executors in trust for the purposes of the will, nor do the provisions of the will, including the power of sale conferred upon the executors, have the effect to create a valid trust in relation to the land, or any other trust than such as pertains to the office of executor. Section 847, Civ. Code, declares that "trusts in relation to real property are those only which are specified in this title," and section 857, Id., declares that: "Express trusts may be created for any of the following purposes: (1) To sell real property, and apply or dispose of the proceeds in accordance with the instrument creating the trust. (2) To mortgage or lease real property for the benefit of annuitants or other legatees, or for the purpose of satisfying any other charge thereon." The will of Philip Richards does not direct the executors to make any application or disposition of the proceeds of the sale, but merely provides that "upon a sale of the property of my estate I desire that all legacies then unpaid be paid at once in full." This provision only fixes the time for the payment of the legacies then unpaid, but does not direct or empower the executor to apply or dispose of the proceeds of the sale in their payment, nor could they be required to pay these legacies without an order of the court therefor. Code Civ. Proc. § 1646. Whether there would be any legacies then unpaid, or the amount that might then remain unpaid, could not be known prior to the sale; and, if all the legacies had then been paid, the proceeds of the sale in the hands of the executors, or any surplus after paying such as were unpaid, would be subject to distribution by the court. No trust existed by virtue of the second subdivision of the section, since, under that subdivision, a trust can be created only "to mortgage or lease" real property. Upon the original adoption of the Codes this subdivision of the section authorized the creation of a valid trust "to sell, mortgage, or lease real property" for the purposes therein named; but in 1874 this section was amended according to its present form. As originally enacted, it was taken from the Revised Statutes of New York, and under its original provisions the cases cited [1] from that state would be applicable; but by the amendment in 1874 the legislature has declared that an express trust cannot be created to sell real property for the benefit of legatees. The provision in the will authorizing the executors to execute all conveyances necessary to dispose of said estate is merely incidental to the power conferred upon them, and cannot be regarded as creating in them any different estate in the land. The judgment and order are reversed.

CRIMINAL LAW—REVIEW—CREDIBILITY OF TESTIMONY.

The determination of a jury as to the credibility of testimony is not subject to review.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Belardes was convicted of crime, and appeals. Affirmed.

A. A. Montana, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and H. E. Carter, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The only question presented by the defendant in support of his appeal herein from the judgment of conviction is that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict of guilty. Without analyzing the evidence in its details, it is sufficient to say that the bill of exceptions shows that there was sufficient evidence presented to the jury to justify it in finding that the defendant had committed the crime with which he was charged. Whatever inferences might be drawn by the jury from the testimony of the witnesses or from any discrepancy therein, or from any apparent conflict or inconsistency in their statement, was exclusively for the determination of that body. Their conclusion in these particulars is not subject to review in this court. The judgment and order are affirmed.

WILLS v. PAULY. (L. A. 157.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—SALES OF REAL PROPERTY—VALIDITY—JUDGMENT—RES JUDICATA.

1. An administrator's sale of land of a decedent, by order of the probate court, is void where there is no attempt to follow the proceedings prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. tit. 11, c. 7, art. 4, § 1536 et seq., which provide fully and minutely for the sale of real property of a deceased person when such sale is for any purpose necessary.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 1469, provides that when the estate of a decedent who left a widow and children does not exceed $1,500, the court shall set apart the whole estate to the widow and children, subject only to certain expenses. Held, that such statute does not validate an administrator's sale of land by order of the court to pay such expenses, without following the proceedings prescribed by title 11, c. 7, art. 4, § 1536 et seq., though the whole estate of which the land is a part has been set aside to the widow and children, as provided by section 1469.

3. A judgment of the United States court dismissing a bill because brought by a married woman in her own name, and for want of jurisdiction, is not a bar to an action in the state court between the same parties for the same cause of action.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; A. R. Conklin, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Wills against A. Pauly. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cole & Cole and C. C. Cowgill, for appellant. Millay & Bennett and Alvin Fay, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This action is brought by the plaintiff for the purpose of having it declared that defendant holds the undivided one-half of a certain tract of land described in the complaint as the trustee of the plaintiff, and to obtain a conveyance thereof by defendant to plaintiff, and an accounting for rents and profits. The court below rendered judgment for plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant appeals. Respondent contends that upon this appeal nothing can be considered other than the judgment roll, for the reason that the appeal from the judgment was not taken within 60 days, and that the notice of motion for a new trial was given prematurely; but, as it is doubtful whether or not the respondent did not waive the irregularity of the notice of motion for a new trial by filing amendments to the statement without objection, we will not consider that question, as it does not appear to be very important in the case.

G. O. Glenn, father of the plaintiff, died on November 11, 1878, seised and possessed of the land in question, leaving, surviving him, his widow, Harriet F. Glenn, and his daughter, Mary E. Glenn (now Mary E. Wills), plaintiff herein, who was his only child. One John D. Glenn was appointed administrator of his estate, but he was afterwards removed, and the widow, Harriet F. Glenn, was appointed as administratrix. On the 17th day of November, 1879, said Harriet, as such administratrix, presented to the judge of the probate court her petition praying for a decree authorizing her to sell the land here in question, "without regard to the regular proceedings for the sale of real estate of deceased persons, for the payment of the debts of the estate, and dispensing with all the requirements of title 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the State of California then in force; and that said sale might be made without notice to any one of the filing of said petition or of said sale; and that the said sale so prayed for might be made at private or public sale, as the said administratrix might see fit." This petition was signed by the attorney of the administratrix, and was not verified; and on the same day said court made an order for the sale of said land by the administratrix, "without regard to the regular proceedings provided for in title 11, Code Civ. Proc., respecting the sales of property, which proceedings are hereby dispensed with for the purposes aforesaid, and that there need be no publication of this petition upon which this decree is based, nor any order to show cause why said land should not be sold, and that there need be no bids in writing received from intending purchasers thereof, but the same may be sold in any manner which seems to administratrix most beneficial for the interests of the heirs of said estate forthwith." Afterwards, on July 26, 1880, the said administratrix made a deed of the lands here in contest to the appellant, Pauly, in words and figures as follows: "Know all men by these presents that I, Harriet F. Glenn, wife of G. O. Glenn, late deceased, of Kern county, by virtue of an order issued November 19, 1879, to me as administratrix, and for and in consideration of the sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars, do hereby grant to A. Pauly all my right, title, and interest in and to the real property hereinafter described, and pray that a patent be granted to said A. Pauly to all that real property situated in Kern county, state of California, bounded and described as follows: The west half of section 16, in township 32 south, of range 33 east, M. D. B. & M., together with all and singular the tenements thereon. Witness my hand, this 26th day of July, 1880. [Signed] H. F. Glenn. [Seal.]"

It is quite clear from the record that, in the ordering and making of this sale, the provisions of title 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure were not substantially followed, and that in fact there was no attempt to follow said proceedings. The petition for the sale set forth that the whole of the estate of said Glenn, deceased, was not of any greater value than $1,500; and the court proceeded upon the theory that in such a case there could be a valid order of sale without any compliance whatever with the provisions of the Code with respect to the sale of real estate of a deceased party. The whole proceeding seems to have been based upon section 1469 of the Code of Civil Procedure as it existed at that time. Said section, so far as it is necessary to be considered here, read as follows: "If upon the return of the inventory of the estate of an intestate it appear that the value of the whole estate does not exceed the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, the probate court must appoint a day for the hearing, and cause notice to be given and proceedings had in the same manner as provided in sections 1633, 1635, and 1638 of article 2, chapter 10 of title 11, of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the settlement of accounts. If upon the hearing the court find that the value of the estate does not exceed the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, the probate court by decree for that purpose must assign for the use and support of the widow and minor children, if there should be a widow and minor child, and, if no widow, then for the children if there be any, the whole estate after the payment of the expense of his last illness, funeral charges, and the expenses of administration. And there must be no further proceedings in the administration unless further estate be discovered." At the time of the order for the sale, as above stated, there had been no decree of the probate court under said section 1469. Afterwards, however, upon the 18th day of September, 1880, the said administratrix did present a petition for a decree setting apart the property to the widow and minor child, as provided for in said section 1469; and on the 27th day of September, 1880, such a decree was made. But, if the latter decree had been made before the said order of sale, the results would have been the same. Section 1469 does not provide for any sale of the property of the deceased. It merely provides that the whole estate shall be set apart to the widow and children, subject only to the expenses of last sickness, administration, etc. If there is to be any sale of the real property of the estate to pay such expenses, such sale must be conducted under the provisions of title 11 of the Code, where alone the power to make and the method of such sale are to be found. Article 4 of chapter 7 of title 11 of the Code, commencing with section 1536, provides fully and minutely for the sale of the property of a deceased person when such sale is for any purpose necessary; and it has been frequently held that no sale is valid where there has not been at least a substantial compliance with that article of the Code. The court gets jurisdiction to order such sale only by compliance with those provisions of the Code, the very first of which is a verified petition. Beckett v. Selover, 7 Cal. 215; Pryor v. Downey, 50 Cal. 398; In re Boland's Estate, 55 Cal. 310; Richardson v. Butler, 82 Cal. 174, 23 Pac. 9. There are also various provisions in the Code respecting the necessary averments to be made in the petition, service of notice of application upon heirs, return of the report of the sale, confirmation of the sale by the court, etc., which need not be here inquired into, because, as before said, there is no pretense that there was any substantial compliance with the provisions of the Code upon the subject; the theory, as it appears upon the petition and the order itself, being that none of such provisions need be followed. It is clear, therefore, that the sale in the present instance was void; and therefore we need not inquire into the point, made by respondent, that the deed from the administratrix to the appellant, upon its face, conveyed only her undivided interest in the premises.

We see nothing in the point made by appellant that this action is barred by the statute of limitations. At the time of the sale, respondent was a minor; and the testimony was amply sufficient to warrant the court in finding that she had not discovered the facts upon which this action is based until within the statutory period before the commencement of this action.

The appellant contends that a judgment of the United States circuit court dismissing a bill brought by this respondent against the appellant for the same cause of action set up in the complaint in the present case is a bar to this action; but we do not think so. It does not appear that the merits of the case were determined in that action. It was held there that the plaintiff, being a married woman, could not sue in the federal court in her own name; and it also appeared that the only thing relied on by the plaintiff in that case to confer jurisdiction upon the federal court was that she was a citizen of the territory of Arizona, the defendant therein being a citizen of California; but it has been uniformly held by the federal courts that citizenship of a territory did not give jurisdiction to those courts, where the defendant was a citizen of a state. The case was decided upon a demurrer to the complaint.

It appears that the deceased had acquired title to the lands in controversy from the state of California, had fully paid for the lands, and received a certificate of purchase; and that, after the appellant here had bought the property from the administratrix he procured a patent from the state; and it is contended by appellant that the respondent should have offered to pay the appellant one-half of the purchase money. This, however, is not a case where the respondent had sold the property during minority, and retained the proceeds; and the case is not within the rule contended for by appellant. Townsend v. Tallant, 33 Cal. 45; Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 446, and cases there cited in note 1. No judgment was rendered for rents or profits. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HILL. (Cr. 214.)

HOMICIDE—INSANITY—ORDER OF PROOF—HYPOTHETICAL QUESTIONS—EVIDENCE—EXPERT TESTIMONY—INSTRUCTIONS—FAILURE TO SUBMIT FORM OF VERDICT.

1. The opinion of an expert, produced by the people in rebuttal, that, from the facts adduced by defendant to prove insanity, he was not insane, is not new matter entitling defendant to introduce the contrary opinion of other experts.

2. A hypothetical question need not embrace all the evidence on the subject involved, but may be based on any facts within the range of the evidence.

3. Evidence of unchaste conduct of defendant's wife, with whose murder he is charged, not communicated to him before the homicide, is inadmissible.

4. The relative positions of defendant and deceased at the time of the shooting, as indicated by the location of the wound, is not a subject for expert testimony.

5. Error in admitting expert testimony for the people on such subject is harmless, where defendant admits the killing, and there is no issue on which the testimony could operate against him.

6. The competency of a nonexpert witness under the statute, as an "intimate acquaintance," to express an opinion of defendant's sanity, is in the discretion of the trial judge.

7. It is not error to refuse to instruct that the jury may disagree if by an agreement any juror would be required to surrender his honest convictions, where the jury were fully instructed as to the questions involved, and their duty in weighing the evidence; the right to disagree being a matter of common knowledge.

8. It is not prejudicial error to give the jury forms of verdict for acquittal, manslaughter, and murder in the first degree, but not for murder in the second degree; that degree being properly submitted to the jury in the charge.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Carroll Cook and Tom M. Brady, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and Henry E. Carter, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

VAN FLEET, J. Defendant was convicted of murder of the first degree, in the killing of his wife, Agnes Hill, and adjudged to suffer death. He appeals from the judgment and an order denying him a new trial, the exceptions urged all being based upon rulings at the trial.

1. To support the defense of insanity relied on by defendant, he introduced evidence tending to show certain peculiarities of temperament, disposition, and conduct in his father and in himself, from which an inference might have been drawn of a want of perfect mental balance in defendant at times. The prosecution did not attempt to controvert the facts thus shown, but, to rebut the inference of insanity therefrom, called Dr. Robertson as an expert on mental diseases, who, in response to a hypothetical statement of the facts, gave as his opinion that defendant was sane at the time of the commission of the act. Thereupon defendant desired to introduce the opinion of a physician on his behalf in rebuttal of the opinion expressed by Dr. Robertson. The court refused to permit such evidence as rebuttal, on the ground that it was properly a part of defendant's case in chief, but offered to permit defendant to reopen his case for the purpose of putting in such evidence if he so desired. This offer was declined, and the refusal to admit the evidence as rebuttal is now assigned as error. The defendant was entitled to rebut any new matter offered on the subject by the people, but the evidence of the expert involved nothing new. It was purely evidence in contradiction of defendant's evidence, and nothing more. Its purpose and effect were, instead of denying the facts shown by defendant, to rebut by a perfectly proper method the inference sought to be drawn therefrom. It was only the method of meeting defendant's evidence, and not the matter, which was new or different. No new fact was shown, and there was nothing, therefore, which was the proper subject of rebuttal. If defendant desired the evidence of experts to support the facts as to his state of mind, such evidence was a part of his original case.

2. Defendant objected to the hypothetical question put to Dr. Robertson, on the ground that it did not embrace a statement of all the evidence, and that it misstated that which it did embrace. It is not necessary, in framing a hypothetical question, to include a statement of all the evidence in the case upon the subject of inquiry. While the question should have for its basis some probable, or at least possible, theory to be deduced from the evidence in the case, counsel have a right to frame the question to accord with their theory of what the material facts are as shown by that evidence, and in so doing may omit facts which, from their point of view, have no material bearing upon the subject. As stated by Mr. Thompson: "The hypothetical questions must be based either upon the hypothesis of the truth of all the evidence, or upon an hypothesis specially framed of certain facts assumed to be proved for the purpose of the inquiry. Such questions leave it for the jury to decide in the first case whether the evidence is true or not, and in the second case whether the peculiar facts assumed are or are not proved." Thomp. Trials, § 604. "It is no objection to a hypothetical question," says that author, "that the state of facts which it assumes is erroneous, if within the possible or probable range of the evidence, since the judge cannot decide, as a preliminary question on an objection to evidence, whether it is erroneous or not, the question being for the jury. * * * It is the privilege of counsel in such cases to assume, within the limits of the evidence, any statement of facts which he claims the evidence justifies, and have the opinion of experts upon the facts thus assumed. The facts are assumed for the purposes of the question, and for no other purposes." Id. §§ 606–610. The rule thus stated is amply sustained by the great weight of authority found in the adjudged cases. See People v. Durrant (Cal.) 48 Pac. 75. The question objected to did not depart from this rule. It contained a fair statement of the case, as embraced within the prosecution's theory of what the evidence established, and made no material misstatement of the facts. If the theory on which the question proceeded did not accord with that of the defendant as to the effect of the evidence, it was the privilege of the latter, on cross-examination, to put to the witness questions formulated upon his theory of the case, and take the opinion of the witness thereon; leaving to the jury the question as to which theory, if either, was warranted by the evidence.

3. There was no error in excluding the evidence of Dr. Webster, offered by defendant, tending to show that deceased had been guilty of unchaste conduct with other men during defendant's absence from home. There was no offer or attempt to show that knowledge of such facts was communicated by the witness to defendant before the homicide. The evidence was wholly immaterial for any purpose, and irrelevant to the issues before the jury. The same is true of the evidence of the same general character sought to be elicited from the witness Susie Bolden and others. The trial court very correctly ruled that it would not deny the privilege of showing any statement of the kind made to the defendant, but that it was "not a question in this action as to the morality or immorality, good or bad character, of Mrs. Hill. It is simply a question of what was said to the defendant with reference to that, and the effect those statements and that information might have had upon his mind." Nor was there error in excluding the evidence of the witness Lamont as to a conversation with the defendant in regard to certain anonymous letters received by the latter relating to the conduct of his wife. The evidence was wholly without materiality, even if competent.

4. The question asked Dr. Hamlin as to the probable position of the person of deceased towards defendant at the time the fatal shot was fired, judged from the location of the wound, was clearly improper, and the objection thereto should have been sustained. The subject of inquiry involved no question of skill or science, and was not, as has been repeatedly decided by this court, a proper subject-matter of expert testimony. People v. Westlake, 62 Cal. 303, 309; People v. Smith, 93 Cal. 447, 29 Pac. 64; People v. Lemperle, 94 Cal. 46, 29 Pac. 709. But, while the evidence was erroneously admitted, it was manifestly harmless to defendant's case, since no question was made but that defendant killed the deceased by shooting her with a pistol, and there was no issue upon which the admitted evidence could have exerted any prejudicial influence with the jury. See People v. Lemperle, supra. The error therefore affords no ground for reversal.

5. We cannot say that the court erred in holding that the witness Peterson did not show himself an "intimate acquaintance" within the rule of the statute which requires a witness, not an expert, to sustain that relationship towards a party to qualify him to give his opinion on the subject of the latter's sanity. The question is largely one of discretion in the trial judge, and his ruling will not be disturbed except for manifest abuse, which the record does not disclose. Estate of Carpenter, 94 Cal. 413, 29 Pac. 1101; People v. McCarthy (Cal.) 46 Pac. 1073. There are two or three further assignments as to rulings on evidence, but they require no special notice. We have examined them, and are satisfied they involve no material error.

6. The defendant asked for an instruction to the effect that if, after a careful, honest, and impartial consideration of the law and the evidence, the jurors should honestly and conscientiously differ as to the weight and effect to be given the evidence, and the verdict to be rendered, or whether any verdict should be rendered, then they might disagree, if by an agreement any juror would be required to surrender his honest convictions as to any fact in the case. The instruction was refused, and it is complained that this was error. The jury were fully and fairly instructed upon the affirmative propositions of law involved in the case, and their duty thereunder in weighing the evidence before reaching a verdict, from which the right and duty of any juror to dissent from a conclusion reached by his fellows with which he was not satisfied was necessarily implied; and, as the jury is presumed to be composed of men of ordinary intelligence and sufficient understanding to appreciate the full meaning and import of the charge of the court, the necessity for such an instruction as that requested, if proper to be given in any case, does not appear. Indeed, the right of a juror to refuse to concur in a verdict unsatisfactory to him is a matter of such common—it might even be said universal—knowledge with men possessing the ordinary qualifications of jurors, that it would be hard to imagine a case calling for the suggestion of such right. The other instructions requested and refused, so far as proper and pertinent to the case, are all fully and fairly covered in the charge of the court.

7. The jury were properly instructed as to the crime of murder, both of the first and second degrees, and also manslaughter, and that those three grades of the offense were included within the information, but in concluding its charge the court made this suggestion: "In accordance with the instructions which have already been given to you, gentlemen, there will be handed to you blank verdicts, one finding the defendant not guilty, one finding the defendant guilty of manslaughter, one finding the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, and one finding the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree and fixing the punishment at imprisonment for life." It is complained that the court committed an error to defendant's prejudice in omitting to submit a form of verdict for murder of the second degree, and that by reason of such omission the jury were not given the opportunity to find a verdict of murder in that degree. Whether the omission was inadvertent or intentional does not appear, although from the fact that that degree of the offense was covered by the charge, and that a form of verdict for manslaughter was furnished to the jury, it is highly probable that the omission was unintentional. However that may be, we do not ascribe any such effect to the omission as that suggested by defendant. The law makes it no part of the duty of the judge to furnish forms of verdict to the jury, but the latter are presumed to be able to formulate their own conclusions, and in practice most usually do so. Where, therefore, the jury has been properly instructed as to the different degrees of the offense, it must be presumed that, if their conclusion called for a form of verdict with which they were not furnished, they would either ask for it, or write one for themselves. It certainly could have no necessary tendency to preclude them from finding such verdict. We discover no reversible error in the record, and the judgment and order must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

THIELE v. NEWMAN. (Sac. 143.)

FIRES—NEGLIGENCE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—STATEMENTS OUT OF COURT.

1. In a suit for treble damages for injury to property by fire, a recovery was not warranted where it appeared that one R., who owned land between plaintiff's and defendant's respective tracts, and who was employed by defendant to look after his cattle, set fire to a part of defendant's land by the latter's direction, and at the same time, for his own benefit, started on his own land another fire, which spread to plaintiff's premises, and caused the damage.

2. Declarations of a witness out of court, contradicting his testimony, are admissible only for the purpose of impeachment, and not to prove the truth of the facts stated in said declarations.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; William O. Minor, Judge.

Action by Frank K. Thiele against Simon Newman. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

P. J. Hazen, for appellant. P. H. Griffin and G. A. Whitby, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought by plaintiff against defendant to recover treble damages for injury done to plaintiff's land by a fire, alleged to have been kindled by defendant on his land adjoining the land of plaintiff, and to have been so negligently watched and tended that the fire came upon plaintiff's land, and burned and destroyed pasture, fences, etc. The jury found a verdict for three times the amount of the actual damage, for which judgment was rendered; and defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Passing other points made by appellant, we are satisfied that the record presents no evidence to support the verdict. The defendant resided in San Francisco, and owned land in the hilly part of Stanislaus county, which he used for pasturing stock. Plaintiff's land, upon which the damage is alleged to have occurred, was also in the same neighborhood, but did not join the land of plaintiff. Between the land of plaintiff and that of defendant there was land owned by a man named Richards. One Henry Mills was the general foreman and superintendent of the defendant, and attended to his stock business in Stanislaus county. Mills employed the said Richards to herd and look after the cattle on a part of defendant's land. As to the nature of Richards' employment, Mills testified as follows: "The scope of his employment was to ride the range, and look after the fences. His duties in riding the range were to see that nobody disturbed the cattle, if they were doing well, and put out salt for them, and see that the fences did not get down, and that they did not get out; simply caring for the cattle generally. He had no general oversight or control of the business other than simply to look after the cattle and fences." The only witnesses who testified as to any disputed issues were the said Richards and the said Mills. Richards was called as a witness by plaintiff. Richards testified in chief that he had charge of the stock; that "he [Mills] hired me to herd the stock on the place he had charge of. My occupation was riding after the stock." He further testified that on a certain day in July, 1894, he set fire on two or three places on his (Richards') land, the nearest place to plaintiff's land being three or four hundred yards from plaintiff's line, and that he also started another fire, on section 25, which was land belonging to the defendant. On cross-examination he testified that Mills told him to set a fire on section 25, near a certain sulphur spring, but did not tell him to set any fire on his (Richards') own land, and that he took a notion to set other fires, on his own account, on his own land; that he set the fires on his own land because he thought it would make better grass the next year; and that he did it for his own benefit, and not for that of Newman. He was then asked by plaintiff if at a certain time he had not stated in the presence of certain persons that he had set the fire on his own land for the benefit of Newman. This question was objected to by defendant, but was allowed, and two or three witnesses swore that, at the time named, they had heard Richards state that he had set the fire on his own land for the benefit of Newman. It is doubtful whether this testimony was a surprise to plaintiff, and therefore doubtful whether he had a right to impeach Richards by showing contrary declarations. See People v. Crespi (Cal.) 46 Pac. 863, and cases there cited. But, assuming that it was properly admitted, it was not admissible for the purpose of proving the truth of Richards' declaration, and the court so instructed the jury, saying upon that point as follows: "Some testimony has been produced before you of declarations made by Frank Richards out of court. You are instructed that you should not consider such declarations as tending to establish the truth of such declarations. Such declarations can only be considered by you in so far as they contradict or tend to contradict the testimony of said Richards, and not as proof of the statements made in such declarations made out of court." This was all the evidence introduced by plaintiff upon this subject. Upon the part of the defendant, said Mills testified as a witness; and, in addition to that part of his testimony above quoted, he said that, under Richards' employment, he had no right to set fire to any part of the land unless he was authorized so to do by him (Mills), and that he (Mills) never gave him directions to set fire on any of his (Richards') land; that the only instruction that he gave Richards about setting fire was to go upon section 25, in the forks of the gulch, and burn the brush out; that he wanted that done partly to get some cattle, which could not be found, out of the cañon, and also for the purpose of making the feed better the next year; that the defendant had bought the feed growing on Richards' land for that year, but had nothing to do with it for the next year. He also testified (and this testimony was entirely uncontradicted) that he was at the scene of the fire about two weeks after it occurred; that it was very plain to see where the fire had traveled, and that the fire on section 25 was never communicated to the land of plaintiff; that there was quite a wide unburned section lying between the land that was burned over on section 25 and the land that was burned on Richards' land; and that the fire set on defendant's land, on section 25, was clearly not the cause of the fire which extended from Richards' land to the land of the plaintiff. Under this state of the evidence, we see no ground upon which the verdict can be sustained. It clearly appears that the fire started on defendant's land, on section 25, did no damage whatever to plaintiff's land, and that Richards had no authority whatever from the defendant or his agent (Mills) to set the fire on his (Richards') land, which was the cause of the damage. It clearly appears that the scope of Richards' employment did not give him the power, as agent of the defendant, to set fire upon any land, and that his special authority to set fire upon section 25 did not in any way include authority to set fire upon his (Richards') own land. The alleged declarations of Richards to certain witnesses, which Richards strenuously denied, were of course no evidence whatever as against the defendant of the facts stated in said declarations. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

SCRIBNER v. HANKE. (Sac. 155.)

BILLS AND NOTES—CONSIDERATION—INDORSEMENT—ACTIONS—FINDINGS.

1. The surrender of a note by the holder thereof to the maker is sufficient consideration for the making of a note for the same debt by third persons.

2. An indorsement of a note by the payee is prima facie evidence that it was duly assigned for sufficient consideration.

3. An indorsement of a note by the payee entitles the indorsee to sue thereon in his own name as legal owner, irrespective of consideration for the indorsement.

4. There is no conflict between a finding that as part of the consideration for the execution of the note in suit by defendant, and of a bill of sale by one D. to defendant, the payee of such note surrendered a note made by D., and a finding that the note sued on was made for and as an accommodation to D., who was defendant's personal friend.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; E. W. Risley, Judge.

Action by O. Scribner against W. F. Hanke and another. There was judgment for plaintiff; a new trial was denied; and defendant Hanke appeals. Affirmed.

Frank H. Short, for appellant. J. P. Meux and Meux & Johnson, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This action was brought to recover upon a promissory note made March 16, 1894, by appellant and Edwin Morris, for $457.50, and payable one day after date to Joseph Huber or order, and indorsed to the respondent herein. Morris made default. Appellant, Hanke, answered the complaint. The answer is in some respects sui generis. It admits making the note, denies that there is anything due thereon, etc., and then, for a separate answer, defendant Hanke avers that on or about the 16th of March, 1894, he took and received from W. D. Demming a bill of sale of certain saloon property in the town of Sanger, etc.; that he paid nothing therefor, and never became the owner thereof; that he took said bill of sale at the request of Huber, and at the same time and place with the giving of the note, and that the note was made at the instance and request of Huber; that the note in suit was given apparently to evidence an amount then and prior thereto due and owing from Demming to Huber upon a promissory note; and that it was expressly understood and agreed between all the parties that Hanke would receive the bill of sale, and sign the note with Morris, for the benefit of Huber. The answer further avers that he never received any consideration for signing the note, and avers that it was agreed between defendant Hanke and said Huber that said Hanke "should never be required to pay anything on account of said promissory note," or of said principal, or the interest or costs, etc. Defendant further avers that plaintiff took the note after maturity for collection only, and paid no consideration therefor, and had knowledge of all the facts. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and, upon the written findings filed, judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff. Defendant Hanke appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The first point made by defendant for reversal is that there was no consideration for the note in suit. There was evidence on the part of plaintiff tending to show that one W. D. Demming, at and prior to the date of the note, owned and conducted a saloon at Sanger, and had given his promissory note to Joseph Huber for beer before that time furnished him by Huber. This note was for, say, $457. Demming sold a half interest in his saloon to one E. Morris. Huber complained to Demming that he had sold while owing him, and received, as collateral security for the payment of his note, another note taken by Demming from Morris. Subsequently, Huber, being urgent for his money, was told by Demming that defendant Hanke, who was a friend of Demming, would purchase and run the saloon if Huber would take his note for the amount due him. Thereupon Hanke and Morris made the note to Huber involved in this action. Huber surrendered up his note against Demming and the Morris note held as collateral, and Hanke received a bill of sale of Demming's interest in the saloon. The firm name in the saloon, which had been Demming & Morris, was changed to Morris & Co. The promissory note was indorsed and transferred to plaintiff, and has not been paid. The theory of defendant's testimony may be briefly stated thus: Demming was owing Huber, who was anxious about his pay. At his request, and for his benefit, Demming transferred his interest in the saloon to Hanke, and the latter and Morris gave the note in question. Huber assured them that they would never be called upon to pay the note or any part of it. Hanke never took possession of or exercised any acts of ownership over the saloon. There being a substantial conflict in the evidence, the action of the court below will not be disturbed upon the ground that the findings are unsupported by the evidence.

1. The surrender by Huber of his note against Demming was a sufficient consideration to uphold the new note by Hanke and Morris.

2. The note in suit having been duly indorsed by Huber to plaintiff, Scribner, such indorsement was sufficient, in the absence of all evidence to the contrary, to warrant the court in finding that the note was, for a valuable consideration, duly assigned and transferred to plaintiff.

3. The note, having been regularly indorsed, entitled plaintiff to maintain an action thereon in his own name as the legal holder and owner, irrespective of consideration. It is not expressly so stated in the record, but seems conceded, nevertheless, that the indorsement of the note was after maturity, and hence that defendant could interpose any defense against the holder which he could have done against the original payee. This right was accorded defendant, and he failed by reason of not sustaining his attempted defense.

4. Whether defendant Hanke did or did not take the bill of sale from Demming was of no importance, but the court was justified in finding that he did, for the reason that in his answer he so affirmed. The allegation of the answer is as follows: "For a further and separate answer and defense herein, the defendant W. F. Hanke alleges that heretofore, to wit, on or about the 16th day of March, 1894, at the county of Fresno, state of California, this defendant, W. F. Hanke, took and received from W. D. Demming a bill of sale of certain saloon property, furniture, and fixtures in the town of Sanger, county of Fresno, state of California."

5. The court found that as a part of the consideration of the bill of sale from Demming, and the making of the note in suit, Huber surrendered to Demming a prior note held against him, etc. The court again finds that the making of the note in suit was for and on behalf of and as an accommodation to said Demming, who was Hanke's personal friend. We see no foundation whatever for the statement of counsel for appellant that these two findings are conflicting. The first shows the consideration yielded up by Huber on the making of the note. The second shows the friendly relations existing between Demming and Hanke as an inducement for his making a note in security for the debt of the former.

The other objections are not more formidable than those mentioned, and do not call for especial mention. We recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

REA v. HAFFENDEN et al. (L. A. 139.)

TRIAL—CONCLUSIONS OF LAW—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—MORTGAGE—DESCRIPTION.

1. In foreclosure, the direction, "Let judgment and decree be entered accordingly," following a finding of facts that the interests and liens claimed by defendants were acquired with notice of plaintiff's mortgage, and were subject thereto, was a conclusion of law, within Code Civ. Proc. § 633, requiring the facts found and the conclusions of law to be separately stated.

2. Where the court found as a fact on foreclosure that plaintiff's mortgage was superior to the liens claimed by defendant, a direction, "Let judgment be entered accordingly," if insufficient as a conclusion of law, would not require a reversal of the decree of foreclosure, the substantial rights of the parties being unaffected by the defect. Code Civ. Proc. § 475.

3. Where the owner of a Mexican grant has adopted the government method of surveying and subdividing his land, and has caused a map to be made, showing such subdivision, a mortgage describing the land in accordance with the survey, though not referring to the map, is notice to subsequent purchasers who knew that such map existed, and bought in view thereof.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by John B. Rea against Albert Haffenden and others to foreclose a mortgage. From a decree for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants the Barona Company and others appeal. Affirmed.

Works & Works, for appellants. McNealy & Whitehead, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage upon certain real property, executed by the defendant Albert Haffenden to secure payment of his promissory note for $7,000. The complaint alleges that the other defendants have or claim some interests in or liens upon the mortgaged premises, which interests, claims, and liens are all subsequent and subordinate to the lien of plaintiff's mortgage. Defendant Haffenden suffered his default to be entered. The other defendants, by their answers, admit the execution of the note and mortgage set out in the complaint, and that they respectively have and claim interests in and liens upon the lands described, but deny that their said interests, claims, or liens, or any of them, are subsequent or subordinate to the lien of plaintiff's mortgage, and allege that the said mortgage is inoperative and void as against them, and each of them, for the reason that prior to the commencement of this action they never had any notice thereof, actual or constructive. They also further allege that plaintiff's cause of action is barred by section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Upon the issues thus raised the case was tried, and the court found as follows: "(1) That the defendants other than the defendant Albert Haffenden, and A. R. Schulenburg, as administrator of the estate of Frederick Schulenburg, deceased, claim an interest in the lands described in the plaintiff's complaint, and the said Frederick Schulenburg acquired a lien on said lands, but that any and all interest, lien, or claim which the defendants, or either of them, have, or which Frederick Schulenburg acquired in his lifetime, in, to, or upon the lands described in plaintiff's complaint were acquired subsequent to the mortgage set out in plaintiff's complaint, and with notice thereof, and that the same is subordinate to said mortgage, and subject thereto. (2) That the plaintiff's cause of action is not barred by section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California, or otherwise. Let judgment and decree be entered accordingly." The findings were filed July 2, 1895, and on the same day the decree of foreclosure, signed by the judge, and containing the usual recitals, was also filed. From that decree and an order denying a new trial this appeal is prosecuted. Only two points are made for a reversal.

1. It is claimed that no conclusions of law whatever were found or stated, and that this constituted a fatal defect in the proceedings of the court below, and hence there was no basis to support the judgment. The Code of Civil Procedure contains the following provisions: "Upon the trial of a question of fact by the court its decision must be given in writing and filed with the clerk," etc. Section 632. "In giving the decision the facts found and the conclusions of law must be separately stated." Section 633. In Murphy v. Snyder, 67 Cal. 451, 8 Pac. 2, which was an action for forcible detainer, and involving the same point, the court said: "It is urged that the court below, in giving its decision, stated no conclusion of law. The record shows that after finding the facts the court adds this direction: 'Let judgment be entered in accordance with the foregoing findings in favor of the plaintiff for restitution of said premises, and for his costs and disbursements in this action.' This, in our judgment, is, in substance, a conclusion of law that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the possession of the premises sued for. It would be yielding too far to mere form to hold that the above is not a conclusion of law." So in Miller v. Hicken, 92 Cal. 229, 28 Pac. 339, which was an action to foreclose a mortgage, the court said: "It is objected that the court did not find in terms that the defendants and intervener had not 'constructive' notice of plaintiff's mortgage; but that followed from the facts found, and it is immaterial that the court did not make an express 'conclusion of law' to that effect." Following in line with these decisions, we think the words added to the findings of fact in this case, "Let judgment and decree be entered accordingly," must be held to be a sufficient statement of the conclusions of law. But, if it were otherwise, still it is apparent that, if more specific conclusions of law had been stated, they must have been in favor of the plaintiff, and hence that the error or defect did not affect the substantial rights of the defendants, or furnish any ground for reversal. Section 475 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares: "The court must in every stage of an action disregard any error or defect in the pleadings or proceedings which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties, and no judgment shall be reversed or affected by reason of such error or defect."

2. It is claimed that plaintiff's mortgage was invalid for want of a description therein of any real estate; that, in effect, it contained no description whatever; that the attempted description was so insufficient that it afforded no basis for a decree of foreclosure, and gave no notice to the defendants, who were subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers. This claim is based upon the theory that the land attempted to be described was a part of a Mexican grant, and was described as if it had been a part of the public domain which had been legally surveyed and subdivided under the authority of the United States; that the government authorities never sectionize the lands within a Mexican grant, and, if the same are surveyed and subdivided at all, it is never by government subdivisions, but by numbered lots; and hence that the attempted description was wholly void. The description found in the mortgage is as follows: "All that certain piece or parcel of land situate in the county of San Diego, state of California, bounded and described as follows, to wit: The northeast quarter of section twenty-three (23), the fractional south half of section twenty-three (23), the northwest quarter of section twenty-three (23), the fractional north half of section twenty-four (24), and the fractional northwest quarter of section twenty-six (26), all in township fourteen south, of range one east, San Bernardino meridian, being all that portion of said sections included within the limits of the Rancho Cañada de San Vicente y Mesa del Padre Barona." At the commencement of the trial, counsel for appellants stipulated that the mortgage described in the complaint was filed for record in the recorder's office of San Diego county on a day named, and was thereafter duly recorded, and that any interests which appellants, or either of them, had acquired in the lands described in said mortgage were acquired subsequent to the recording thereof. It appears that after the making of the plaintiff's mortgage, the mortgagor, Haffenden, executed to the defendant Thomas J. Daley a deed of the same land, and by the same description, containing a recital that the conveyance was "subject to a mortgage of seven thousand dollars, given to J. B. Rea"; and that all of the other defendants subsequently acquired from Daley or his grantees, by deeds or mortgage containing the same description, whatever estate or interest they had in the said premises. To the description in some of these subsequent deeds were added the words, "as surveyed by Vitus Wackenreuder," and to the description in the mortgage to Schulenburg were added the words, "according to the map of said rancho made by Vitus Wackenreuder, A. D. 1869." Following the introduction in evidence of the said conveyances, and the objections of defendants that they were inadmissible, counsel for plaintiff stated that he was "willing to admit that Vitus Wackenreuder made a survey in 1869, by which he subdivided the interior of that ranch according to government sections." Counsel for defendants then stated: "We do not admit that he did it according to government sections. We will admit that his map indicated sections, but we do not admit that the sections connected with the government sections, or that you could locate the same land by reference to sections connecting with the government sections outside, for our information is that they do not connect." It must be assumed, then, we think, that the rancho referred to was a Mexican grant, which was surveyed and sectionized, and a map thereof made, by Wackenreuder, and that the descriptions found in the plaintiff's mortgage and in the defendants' deeds and mortgage were based upon that survey and map, and were of subdivisions as shown and established thereby. The question, then, is, were these descriptions void for uncertainty? We do not think they were. It is true that the government authorities do not survey and subdivide lands within a Mexican grant, and that there is and can be no government section of land until it has been located by an actual survey and establishment of the lines under the authority of the United States. Robinson v. Forrest, 29 Cal. 325; Middleton v. Low, 30 Cal. 605; Bullock v. Rouse, 81 Cal. 594, 22 Pac. 919. But, while this is so, still there is no reason why the owners of a Mexican grant may not have the same surveyed and subdivided in the same way that it would be if it were a part of the public domain. And where the owners have adopted the government method of surveying and subdividing their land, and have caused a map to be made showing such subdivisions, a description in accordance with the survey so made must be held sufficient. It is only necessary that the description of premises in a deed or mortgage be sufficiently definite and certain to enable the land to be identified. "A deed is not void for uncertainty because there may be errors or an inconsistency in some of the particulars. If a surveyor, by applying the rules of surveying, can locate the land, the description is sufficient. And, generally, the rule may be stated to be that the deed will be sustained if it is possible from the whole description to ascertain and identify the land intended to be conveyed. * * * If the description is general, the particular subject-matter to which the description applies may be ascertained by parol evidence, and the deed will not be held void for uncertainty if, with the aid of such evidence, the land intended to be conveyed can be located." 2 Devl. Deeds (2d Ed.) § 1012. And see McCullough v. Olds, 108 Cal. 529, 41 Pac. 420. It is objected that the map was not referred to in the description contained in plaintiff's mortgage, and that such a reference was necessary. This objection cannot, in our opinion, be sustained. The map might have been referred to as it was in the Schulenburg mortgage, but the failure to refer to it was not a fatal defect. That there was a map must have been known by all the parties, and all the transactions must have been had in view of it. Our conclusion is that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PEOPLE v. McELROY. (Cr. 239.)

LARCENY "FROM THE PERSON"—CONVICTION OF LESSER OFFENSE.

1. Stealing money from trousers folded and placed under the owner's head as a pillow, while he slept, was not a taking "from the person," within the definition of grand larceny.

2. A conviction of petit larceny may be had under an information for grand larceny.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; Wheaton A. Gray, Judge.

Harry McElroy was convicted of grand larceny, and from the judgment and an order denying a new trial he appeals. Reversed.

H. B. McClure and D. E. Perkins, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and Chas. H. Jackson, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

VAN FLEET, J. Defendant was charged with grand larceny, in stealing $17 from the person of one James Shaw, and convicted. He complains that the evidence did not warrant the verdict. Shaw and the defendant had their beds near together, in the open air. Shaw, in going to bed, removed his trousers, in the pocket of which was the money, and placed them under his head, as a pillow. While he slept they were abstracted by the defendant, and the money taken. The question is whether these facts show a taking "from the person," under our statute, which makes the offense grand larceny, without regard to the amount stolen, "when the property is taken from the person of another." If it was not such taking, the amount was insufficient to constitute any greater offense than that of petit larceny. Pen. Code, §§ 487, 488. The stealing of property from the person has been from an early period, under the English statutes, treated as a much graver and more heinous offense than ordinary or common theft,—partly by reason of the ease with which it could be perpetrated, and the difficulty of guarding against it, and partly because of the greater liability of endangering the person or life of the victim. The same general reason and purpose animate the modern statutes, including our own, and, as in England, the offense is made punishable as a felony. The difficulty has been in defining with precision in all cases what constitutes a taking from the person, and this has given rise to some confusion in the authorities on the question as to whether the property must be actually on, or attached to, the person, or merely under the eye, or within the immediate reach, and so constructively within the control, of the owner. According to Mr. Bishop, "The thing taken must be under the protection of the person, but need not be attached thereto." 2 Bish. Cr. Law, 898. But the only case he cites in support of the text is Reg. v. Selway, 8 Cox, Cr. Cas. 235, where the indictment was for robbery, and the facts clearly show that offense, and not larceny; the prosecutor being attacked while in his room, and struck violently on the head by one of the prisoners, while the other went to a cupboard in the room and stole a cash box. Mr. Bishop suggests, tentatively, that "probably in this particular the rule in robbery applies." But he cites no case in support of the suggestion, and we think the authorities against it. Thus, in Rex v. Hamilton, 8 Car. & P. 49, where a man went to bed with a prostitute, putting his watch in his hat on a table, and the watch was stolen by the woman while he slept, it was held that the offense was larceny from the house, and not from the person. So, in Rex v. Taylor, Russ. & R. 418, where the defendant invited an acquaintance to share his room and bed for the night, and then stole his guest's watch from the bed head, it was deemed by the judges not a larceny from the person. See, also, Owen's Case, 2 East, P. C. 645; Castledine's Case, Id. 645, 646; and Watson's Case, Id. 680, 681. In Com. v. Smith, 111 Mass. 429, it was held that where the prosecutor went to bed, leaving his clothes on a chair, and the defendant, lodging with him, took a key from a pocket of the clothes and opened the prosecutor's trunk, and took money therefrom, it was larceny from the house, and not from the person. And where a man, with his money in a satchel, went into a bank, and placed the satchel temporarily on the counter, within two feet of him, while he transacted his business, and his attention was distracted for a moment by one of the defendants while the other abstracted the money, the supreme court of Georgia considered that the larceny was from the house, and not from the person. Simmons v. State, 73 Ga. 609.

In view of these authorities, and the origin of the statute, we think its obvious purpose was to protect persons and property against the approach of the pickpocket, the purse snatcher, the jewel abstracter, and other thieves of like character who obtain property by similar means, and that it was in contemplation that the property shall at the time be in some way actually upon or attached to the person, or carried or held in actual physical possession,—such as clothing, apparel, or ornaments, or property or things contained therein or attached thereto, or property held or carried in the hands, or by other means, upon the person; that it was not intended to include property removed from the person and laid aside, however immediately it may be retained in the presence or constructive control or possession of the owner while so laid away from his person and out of his hands. Such has been the practical application and construction of this and like statutes by public prosecutors generally, as indicated by the facts of the cases which have been called to our attention. Had the legislature intended that the offense should include instances of property merely in the immediate presence, but not in the manual possession about the person, it would doubtless have so provided, as it has in defining robbery. Robbery is defined as "the felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another from his person or immediate presence," etc. (Pen. Code, § 211), while the requirement of this offense is that it shall be "taken from the person." Within this rule, we are of opinion that the facts did not constitute grand larceny, within the statute. The garment from which the money was taken was not at the time on the person of Shaw. It was folded up and used as a part of his bed. Had the garment alone been taken, under like circumstances, the theft could not be held to have been from the person. A man does not wear his bed as he does his clothes. The money was therefore no more on his person, in any proper sense, than if it had been concealed under his bed, or elsewhere about it, or left in his clothes upon a chair, or hanging on the wall. It is the frequent habit of cautious people upon retiring to place money or valuables under their pillow or between the mattresses; but property so concealed can no more be said to be upon the person of the owner than if it were placed in any other part of the room, and its taking while so placed would not constitute a larceny from the person.

The objection to the sufficiency of the information is not well taken. It informs the defendant, in ordinary and concise language, of the offense with which he is charged. Nor are we at liberty to order the defendant discharged from further prosecution. We cannot assume that the evidence upon another trial will be the same; and, even if we could, the facts show a case of petit larceny,—an offense of which defendant can be competently convicted under the information. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; HARRISON, J.

McGRATH v. WALLACE. (Sac. 111.)

TAX SALE—SHERIFF'S RETURN—AMENDMENT.

1. A sheriff's return of a tax sale, not stating that the sum received was the amount of the judgment and costs, and that a sale of the entire parcel was necessary to raise such sum, shows a void sale.

2. The sheriff cannot be permitted to amend such a return, 13 years after it was made, by adding thereto facts validating the sale.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; Matt F. Johnson, Judge.

Action by Catherine McGrath against Mary A. Wallace to quiet title. There was judgment for defendant. A new trial was denied, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Clinton L. White, for appellant. R. B. Wallace, Frank D. Ryan, and J. B. Devine, for respondent.

BRITT, C. Action to quiet title to a parcel of land in the city of Sacramento. On a former appeal it was held that plaintiff's claim of title by adverse possession was not supported by the facts, and a judgment in her favor was reversed. 85 Cal. 622, 24 Pac. 793. Upon a new trial the plaintiff relied on certain tax titles. It appeared that on December 26, 1864, there was a sale of the land in controversy, under decree of the former district court, for street taxes levied by the city in the year 1863; and again, on September 25, 1865, the land was sold under similar decree for city taxes levied for the fiscal year 1863–64. Said decrees, respectively, were entered in actions prosecuted in the name of the people against the owner—now the defendant here—and the land itself, to subject the land to sale for the taxes delinquent thereon. No question is made as to the relative values of the tax liens declared by the two decrees, or as to the effect of the second sale upon the former. At the tax sale of December 26, 1864, three persons—Turton, Knox, and Ryan—were joint purchasers, and whatever interest they acquired passed afterwards to plaintiff. At the sale of September 25, 1865, one Mayo became the purchaser; in 1875 he made a deed of grant of the premises to one Reeves, which was duly recorded; and subsequently, on March 28, 1878, Mayo quitclaimed the same property to plaintiff. The sheriff's return of the sale of December 26, 1864, was indorsed upon a certified copy of the decree, and was filed January 20, 1865. It set forth that the sheriff levied on the property described, and, after notice according to law, sold the same, at a time and place specified, to Turton, Knox, and Ryan for the sum of $210.08. By an order made April 15, 1878, the court granted leave to the ex sheriff, who while in office had made such sale, to amend the return by showing that the whole of the land was the least quantity which any person would take and pay the judgment and costs, amounting to $210.08, which was the sum bid, etc. Thus amended, the return would exhibit compliance with the statutes in force at the time of the sale governing the procedure in that behalf. St. 1861, p. 435; St. 1862, p. 523. It may be assumed that the return was amended accordingly; and on April 18, 1878, the ex sheriff executed a deed of the land to Turton, Knox, and Ryan, reciting as facts the matters which by the said order of April 15th he had been authorized to insert in his return.

Since plaintiff can prevail in this action only on the strength of her own title (Henry v. Pesoli, 109 Cal. 53, 41 Pac. 819), and since she deraigns by a deed from Mayo subsequent to his conveyance of grant to Reeves, and not through the latter at all, it is obvious that her claims derive no support from the title of Mayo founded on the tax sale of 1865, whether that sale was valid or invalid. As the return made by the sheriff of the sale of 1864 contained nothing to show that the amount bid was the sum of the judgment and costs, and that the sale of the whole parcel was necessary to raise such amount, it reported a void sale. It was certainly no better than a return that he had sold the entire tract to the highest bidder, and this has been several times held to show that the sale was void. Hewell v. Lane, 53 Cal. 216; Reynolds v. Lincoln, 71 Cal. 183, 185, 9 Pac. 176, and 12 Pac. 449; French v. Edwards, 13 Wall. 506. The question then is upon the effect of the order allowing the sheriff to amend his return. This question arose and was elaborately examined in French v. Edwards, above cited, in the later stages of that case before the federal circuit court for this district, to which it was remanded by the decision in 13 Wall. 506. The learned circuit judge enlarged upon the considerations that under the statute of California the owner of real estate sold pursuant to a judgment for taxes had a right of redemption, exercisable within six months from the time of sale; that the certified copy of the decree, which was the sheriff's warrant for the sale, with his return indorsed, became part of the authentic public record of the proceedings, for the information and security of all persons interested therein; that if the owner relied, as he had the right to do, upon the information thus conveyed, he might justly conclude that the sale was void and redemption unnecessary; and that if, years afterwards, the ex sheriff can amend his return, and so validate an otherwise invalid sale, the owner is deprived of his right to redeem, and subjected to legal fraud. The difference between such a case and those in which a defective return of process, such as a summons, is allowed to be amended, was pointed out; and the conclusion was that the amendment of the return, "under the conditions of the case, so as to cut off the right of redemption, was not made in furtherance of justice, and was not authorized by law." French v. Edwards, 5 Sawy. 266, Fed. Cas. No. 5,098. These views, as applied to the facts before the court,—which were almost identical with those in the case here,—are consonant with the general rules for the construction of statutes which look to the divesting of titles by means of a tax sale. They seem also to accord with the tendency of the decisions in this court touching the general subject. Compare, besides the cases above cited, Carpenter v. Gann, 51 Cal. 193; Newhall v. Provost, 6 Cal. 86. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

GIRVIN et al. v. SIMON. (Sac. 197.)

STREET IMPROVEMENTS—LEGALITY OF CONTRACT—ASSESSMENTS—ESTOPPEL—PLEADING.

1. Under Laws 1891, p. 199, § 5, providing that a city council, in acting on bids for street work, may reject them, should it deem this for the public good, and also the bid of any party who has been delinquent in any former contract, "and may award the contract for said work or improvement to the lowest responsible bidder," a council can determine that a bidder has been delinquent in a former contract, and on such determination may reject his bid and award the contract to the lowest remaining bidder whom it decides to be responsible.

2. Under Laws 1885, p. 156, § 11, relating to street improvements, which gives all persons directly interested in the work or assessments therefor, who, for any reason enumerated, feel aggrieved by any act of the superintendent of streets, the right to appeal therefrom to the city council, and makes the decision of the council conclusive, and further provides that no assessment shall be held invalid, except on such appeal, on account of matters which the council had power to remedy, a property owner who makes no objection to the action of a superintendent in accepting work done, and does not appeal therefrom, is estopped to set up as a defense to an assessment that the work was not performed according to the contract.

3. A complaint in an action by a contractor to recover an assessment for street work, which alleges that the contract required the plaintiff to do the work in accordance with specifications which are not set out, is insufficient to show that the contract complied with the statute, and is demurrable; but the error is cured where the defendant fails to demur, but himself sets out the specifications in his answer.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

Action by R. D. Girvin, Barry Baldwin, and E. L. Eyre, partners as Girvin, Baldwin & Eyre, against J. Simon, to foreclose the lien of a street assessment. Judgment for defendant, from which, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Jas. A. Louttit, for appellants. J. H. & J. E. Budd, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to foreclose the lien of a street assessment levied by virtue of a contract for grading and paving in part with basalt and in part with bitumen, and for curbing, Channel street, in the city of Stockton, from the east line of Hunter street to the west line of California street, etc. The contract was let by the street superintendent of the city of Stockton on the 12th day of September, 1892, to one F. J. Owens, who thereafter, and on the 22d day of September, 1892, assigned it to the plaintiffs and appellants herein, by whom the work was performed. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and, upon the written findings, judgment was entered in favor of defendant for his costs. The appeal is from the final judgment, and from an order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial.

There are two prominent questions involved in the appeal: The first relates to the validity of the action of the city council in awarding the contract to F. J. Owens; and, second, whether, conceding the work was not performed in accordance with the specifications of the contract, defendant is in a condition to take advantage thereof.

The facts upon which the first question turns are as follows: After taking the usual steps for the improvement, and advertising for bids to do the work in regular form, one McCarty bid for the work at $12,038.59, and accompanied his bid by a good and sufficient bond, as by statute required. One F. J. Owens made a like bid to do the work for $12,049.55, accompanying his bid with a bond, etc. The city council met on the 22d day of August, 1892, opened and examined the proposals for doing the work, and thereupon passed a resolution reciting that a former contract for street work had on July 29, 1892, been awarded to McCarty, and that he had failed and refused to enter into a contract to perform the work so awarded to him, wherefore it was resolved that the bond filed by him as security for the former work be declared forfeited, "and said McCarty is hereby declared delinquent and unfaithful, within the meaning of the law, inasmuch as he has failed and refused to make and enter into the contract hereinabove mentioned." Thereupon the council rejected the bid of McCarty, for the reasons assigned in the resolution, and awarded the contract for the work to said F. J. Owens. These proceedings are under the act of 1885, usually termed the "Vrooman Act," with the amendments thereto of 1889 and 1891. Section 5 of the act as amended in 1891 (St. 1891, p. 199), among other things, provides as follows: "The city council may reject any and all proposals or bids should it deem this for the public good, and also the bid of any party who has been delinquent and unfaithful in any former contract with the municipality, and shall reject all proposals or bids other than the lowest regular proposal or bid of any responsible bidder, and may award the contract for said work or improvement to the lowest responsible bidder," etc. It will be observed from the foregoing quotation that power is given to the city council to reject all bids, if it shall deem it for the public good; (2) to reject the bid of any party who has been delinquent and unfaithful in any former contract; and (3) to reject all bids other than the lowest responsible bidder. Manifestly, under these provisions, power is conferred upon the council to determine what is for the best interests of the public; who have shown themselves delinquent and unfaithful; and who are responsible bidders. These are facts to be passed upon by the council, and its determination, once reached, is as conclusive as the verdict of a jury or finding of a court upon facts within its jurisdiction; that is to say, the propriety of the action can only be inquired into by such method as the law provides. The council, by its formal resolution, declared McCarty delinquent and unfaithful, within the meaning of the statute, and hence rejected his bid, as it had a right to do, notwithstanding it was some $10 or $11 lower than that of F. J. Owens, to whom the contract was awarded. As the council had jurisdiction to hear and determine the matter, there was no error in its determination.

tendent. All the several steps provided by statute were regularly taken, and in due time an assessment to pay for the work was duly levied, a warrant duly issued, a demand for payment duly made, etc. In short, no irregularity is found or complained of, except in the manner of the performance of the contract. Defendant did not make any objection to any act or determination of the street superintendent or of the city council, and did not appeal to the city council within 30 days after the date thereof, or at any time, in writing or otherwise, and has never filed any protest. Section 11 of the street law of 1885 (St. 1885, p. 156) is in part as follows: "The owner, whether named in the assessment or not, the contractor, or his assigns, and all other persons directly interested in any work provided for in this act, or in the assessment, feeling aggrieved by any act or determination of the superintendent of streets in relation thereto, or who claim that the work has not been performed according to the contract in a good and substantial manner, or having or making any objection to the correctness or legality of the assessment or other act, determination or proceeding of the superintendent of streets, shall, within thirty days after the date of the warrant, appeal to the city council." The section then provides for a hearing before the council, and gives that body full authority to correct all irregularities and errors, enumerating many of them; and, among other things, the council may "require the work to be completed according to the directions of the city council," etc. The section makes the decision of the council final and conclusive upon all persons entitled to appeal, as to all errors and irregularities which the council might have remedied and avoided. It further provides that no assessment shall be held invalid, except upon appeal to the city council as provided in the section, for errors or informalities or other defects in any of the proceedings prior to the assessment, or in the assessment itself, in cases where notice of intention to order the work done has been duly published as by law required before the passage of the resolution ordering the work to be done. In Manning v. Den, 90 Cal. 610, 27 Pac. 435, it was held that the property owner did not, by failing to appeal to the council, lose his right to resist the payment of an assessment when there had been a failure to perform any one of the jurisdictional prerequisites in the manner provided for by the statute. Harrison, J., speaking for the court, said: "The provision in the latter part of section 11, that 'no assessment shall be held invalid except upon appeal to the city council,' etc., has no application to a case in which an appeal is not authorized, or in which, even if taken, the city council could not have remedied the defect." A void contract does not become valid by failure to appeal to the board of supervisors. Burke v. Turney, 54 Cal. 486; Capron v. Hitchcock, 98 Cal. 430, 33 Pac. 431; Brock v. Luning, 89 Cal. 316, 26 Pac. 972. But as to all matters which may lawfully be corrected on appeal to the city council or other governing body of the municipality, and for which an appeal is provided by the statute, the property owner deeming himself aggrieved must prosecute his appeal, failing in which he is estopped. McVerry v. Boyd, 89 Cal. 304, 26 Pac. 885; Dyer v. Parrott, 60 Cal. 551; Bucknall v. Story, 46 Cal. 589; Dorland v. McGlynn, 47 Cal. 47; Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 404, 14 Pac. 71; Frick v. Morford, 87 Cal. 576, 25 Pac. 764. The question as to whether a contract for grading or paving or curbing has been properly performed is not one going to the jurisdiction of the council, or affecting the validity of its acts, and, as an appeal is expressly provided by the eleventh section of the act of 1885, it is under that section the only remedy; and defendant, having failed to take such appeal, was estopped from litigating the question in this action. Fanning v. Leviston, 93 Cal. 186, 28 Pac. 943; Perine v. Forbush, 97 Cal. 312, 32 Pac. 226; Jennings v. Le Breton, 80 Cal. 8, 21 Pac. 1127, and cases there cited. It follows that the court below erred in admitting testimony to show that the work was not performed as by the contract required.

Respondent urges that the contract for the work was invalid because of the omissions therein of matters essential to a valid contract under the statute. The contract is not set out in the record, and we have no means of determining its validity. The court below found that the contract was entered into, and, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, we must presume it was a valid one. It is further urged that there is no allegation in the complaint that such contract contained such essential matters. The complaint avers the execution of the contract in pursuance of the award, whereby J. F. Owens agreed to perform the work in a workmanlike manner, under the direction and to the satisfaction of the street superintendent, and to furnish all the necessary material required for the execution of the work, and in compliance with and as required by the plans and specifications thereof, and therein prepared by the city surveyor, and adopted and approved by the city council, and on file in the city clerk's office, which plans and specifications are referred to in said contract, and made a part thereof, etc.; that work was to commence within 15 days from the date of the contract, and to be completed within 90 days, etc. No demurrer was interposed to the complaint, and no objection based upon its insufficiency seems to have been interposed in the court below. It must follow that no objection can be heard here, except that it fails to state a cause of action. Libbey v. Elsworth, 97 Cal. 316, 32 Pac. 228, is relied upon by respondent in support of his contention. In that case a demurrer was sustained to the complaint, and this court, in affirming the judgment, held, among other things, that a general allegation that the contract was one by which the contractor agreed to do the work therein in accordance with specifications which are not set out, and under the direction and to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets, was not sufficient, and that it must affirmatively appear from the statement of the contract that it contained all the essentials to make it a valid contract under the statute. In the case at bar the pleader failed to set out the specifications, which formed an important part of the contract, and a demurrer for that reason would have been good. Defendant, however, not only did not demur, but he set out these very specifications in his answer, and averred they were the specifications referred to in the complaint. This cured the error. We recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed, and that the parties, and each of them, have leave to amend their respective pleadings if they shall be so advised.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PEOPLE ex rel. LIND v. CITY OF SAN LUIS OBISPO. (L. A. 103.)

JUDGMENT—ENJOINING PUBLIC NUISANCE—LIMITATION OF INJUNCTION.

Under findings that the discharge of sewage from the sewer system of a city into a creek created a public nuisance, a judgment enjoining such discharge is not erroneous because the injunction is not limited to a specified part of the stream.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Action, on relation of Joseph Lind, against the city of San Luis Obispo, to abate a public nuisance. Judgment for the people, from which defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Spencer, for appellant. Wilcoxon & Bouldin and J. M. Wilcoxon, for the People.

BELCHER, C. This action was instituted by the people of the state of California, on the relation of Joseph Lind, to abate an alleged public nuisance caused by the discharge of the sewage in the city of San Luis Obispo, from the sewer system constructed therein and the vault located at the lower end thereof, into the San Luis Obispo creek. The cause was tried by the court, and very full findings of the facts were made and filed. As conclusions of law, the court found "that the discharge of the sewage into the vault and receptacle [as complained of and found], and from thence into San Luis Obispo creek, is now and has been a public nuisance ever since a time prior to the commencement of this action; that the discharge of said sewage into said vault and creek will be a public nuisance between June 1st and December 1st of every year, and at all times when there is not water sufficient flowing in San Luis Obispo creek to carry away said sewage"; and that plaintiff was entitled to a judgment and decree "enjoining defendant, its officers, agents, and servants, from discharging sewage from said sewer system or from said vault" into the creek between the dates named, "and at all other times when there is insufficient water flowing in said creek to carry said sewage away beyond the boundaries of said city." Judgment was accordingly entered granting the relief which plaintiff was found to be entitled to, and from that judgment the defendant has appealed on the judgment roll.

Only one point is made for a reversal. It is said: "San Luis Obispo creek is a living stream of water passing through the corporate limits of the city of San Luis Obispo, and extending ten miles beyond same to a point where it empties into the Pacific Ocean. Under the judgment, defendant is enjoined 'from discharging sewage * * * into San Luis Obispo creek.' This includes all of the creek, and goes beyond the complaint, evidence, and findings." And hence it is claimed that the judgment was unauthorized. We see no merit in the point made. Defendant was enjoined from discharging sewage from its sewer system, or from the vault described in the complaint, into San Luis Obispo creek. If the discharge of the sewage into the stream constituted a public nuisance, as found by the court, the continuance of that nuisance could certainly be enjoined. And that the discharge did constitute a nuisance is not questioned. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. SAN JOAQUIN COUNTY v. SPERRY et al. (Sac. 206.)

STREETS—DEDICATION—EVIDENCE.

A finding that there was no dedication of land for a street is sustained where the evidence shows that there had been no offer or intention to dedicate; that the owners maintained visible obstructions across one end of it, while the public were using the remainder; and that purchasers of abutting lots were told that the street was a private way, though lots had been sold according to an unrecorded plat on which the strip involved was designated as a street.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

Action by the people on the relation of the county of San Joaquin against George B. Sperry and another. Judgment for defendants, and relator appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. Nutter, Dist. Atty. (J. B. Hall, of counsel), for appellant. Nicol & Orr, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. By this action plaintiff seeks to have a strip of land extending northerly and southerly across what is called "Sperry's Addition to the City of Stockton" declared to be a public highway, and to remove obstructions therefrom. Judgment passed for the defendants, and from this judgment, and from the order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

The determinative question in the case is whether the evidence supports the findings of the court against the alleged dedication. Sperry's addition was suburban land adjacent to, but not within, the corporate limits of the city of Stockton. In 1891 or in 1892 a plat was made of these lands, upon which they were subdivided into lots and blocks. Streets were thereon indicated and named. The street in question was designated "El Dorado Street." It extended from North street, the northerly boundary of the city of Stockton, to the further limits of the tract. Thereafter some few lots were sold under descriptions referring to this plat. The map, however, was never placed on record, and during all of this time the land was inclosed with a substantial fence. Later, however, for the convenience of the purchasers of lots, the fence at the intersection of El Dorado street and North street was removed. At the northerly end of El Dorado street was maintained not only a fence, but during part of the time a corral. The street was graveled, not throughout its entire length, but up to the line of the corral. Purchasers of lots were informed that the streets were not dedicated to public use, but were to be maintained as private ways, subject to the rights of persons to whom lots in the tract might be sold, to use them in connection with their land. In April, 1893, the defendants caused to be filed with the recorder of San Joaquin county a map of the Sperry addition, containing upon the face thereof this reservation as to the streets. The northerly end of El Dorado street abutted upon the land of one Brown. The lower end of El Dorado street being open, the public could and did drive in upon the line of said street, but were obliged to retrace their course when they came to the fence and corral at the upper end thereof. One Zinck, however, purchased a lot at the northerly end of El Dorado street, and contiguous to the land of Brown. Zinck opened a passageway through his lot, and thereafter persons could drive along El Dorado street to the land of Zinck, and thence, turning off of El Dorado street, and passing through the land of Zinck, could reach the Brown tract beyond. The defendant Sperry and his agent for the sale of the lots both testified that it was never the intention to dedicate El Dorado street to public use; that they continually maintained the obstruction at the northerly end of it, and informed purchasers and intending purchasers of land that the streets were not public streets. There is no question but that a dedication after acceptance cannot be revoked so as to defeat the rights of the public which have vested under it. The question of fact here, and the one which the court found under conflicting evidence adversely to appellant's contention, is that there was no dedication or offer of dedication and acceptance by use by the public. The animus dedicandi must be clearly evidenced by unequivocal acts. City of Eureka v. Croghan, 81 Cal. 524, 22 Pac. 693. When this is shown, and with it an acceptance by use upon the part of the public, the dedication is complete and irrevocable, and the actual consent and acquiescence of the owner in the public use being established, the length of time of the public use ceases to be of importance. Schwerdtle v. County of Placer, 108 Cal. 589, 41 Pac. 448. But in this case, while the use by the public is sufficiently established, that use was not referable to any offer of dedication upon the part of the owner. The mere marking of streets upon the unrecorded map, and the sales of lots thereupon with the declaration to the purchasers that the streets were not public streets, did not constitute a dedication thereof. People v. Reed, 81 Cal. 70, 22 Pac. 474; Phillips v. Day, 82 Cal. 24, 22 Pac. 976; Cook v. Sudden, 94 Cal. 444, 29 Pac. 949. During all of the time the street was never opened throughout its length to public use as a street, and the defendants constantly maintained visible obstructions across it. These facts, together with the testimony of Sperry and his agent, are certainly sufficient to support the finding of the court that there was no dedication of the street. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BALDWIN et al. v. DURFEE. (L. A. 150.)

ADVERSE POSSESSION—SUFFICIENCY OF INCLOSURE.

Where the title to land by adverse possession is based on a claim that the claimant has had it protected by a substantial inclosure for more than the statutory period, the title is not defeated by a mere temporary destruction of portions of the inclosure by flood.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; William A. Cheney, Judge.

Action by E. J. Baldwin and R. Garvey against James Durfee. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

Smith & Winder, George H. Smith, and A. W. Hutton, for appellants. Stephen M. White, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to recover possession of two small tracts of land. Plaintiffs failed to recover, and now appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Defendant relied upon the statute of limitations, and the trial court found in his favor upon that plea. This finding of the court is assailed as not supported by the evidence, and the evidence upon that issue is before us. Defendant makes no claim of title founded upon a written instrument, judgment, or decree. Hence he was bound to show possession and occupancy by proof of a substantial inclosure, or that these two tracts of land had been usually cultivated or improved for a continuous period of five years. Appellants quote quite largely from the evidence of the defendant as to his acts of possession, and then insist that such evidence fails to satisfy the statute. It is but fair to the defendant that his evidence should be weighed and considered as a whole, and that he should not be bound—in this court, at least—by those portions of it which are against him, as against other portions that stand in his favor. Again, there is evidence in the record more favorable to him even than his own testimony. This evidence we are bound to consider, and are not at liberty to say that his case can be no stronger than his own evidence. Defendant's title by adverse possession, as to the 24-acre tract, is based upon his claim that he has had it protected by a substantial inclosure for a time longer than the statutory period. This claim is abundantly established by the evidence, unless the fact that during flood times, in the winter season, certain portions of the inclosure were washed away and destroyed, changes the legal aspect of the case. These disasters to the inclosure occurred but seldom, and were repaired within a reasonable time in each instance. It is claimed by appellants that the continuity of possession was broken by the destruction of the fence. It is asserted that the possession contemplated by the law must be continuous and uninterrupted, and that in a case like the present, where the inclosure is relied upon to establish the possession, that inclosure must stand continuously and uninterruptedly for the term of five years. In a general sense, this is true, but a mere temporary destruction of portions of the inclosure by fire or flood does not defeat the statute of limitations. Such a construction would sacrifice substance to shadow, and does not come within the spirit and intent of the statute. As to the remaining tract involved in this litigation, there was a great amount of evidence introduced tending to show that the particular parcel was substantially protected by an inclosure, and also usually cultivated. It would serve no good purpose to set out a detailed recital of this evidence. It was fragmentary, and came from the mouths of many witnesses; but, taking it all together, after careful consideration we are not prepared to say that the court was unjustified in finding facts sufficient to support the plea of the statute of limitations. It is further insisted that defendant failed to show a compliance with the statute as to the payment of taxes. There is no evidence in the record that either of the two tracts in dispute was assessed to anybody save the defendant. If the assessment and levy of these taxes were a valid assessment and levy,—and the various defective descriptions set forth in the assessment indicate grave doubt as to such validity,—then the taxes were paid by defendant. Where rests the burden of proof upon this question becomes immaterial, for it fairly appears from defendant's testimony that he paid all taxes assessed and levied upon the property in dispute. There is nothing further in the record demanding consideration. For the foregoing reasons the order appealed from is affirmed.

SMITH et al. v. CORBIT. (L. A. 132.)

WATER AND WATER COURSES—EASEMENT BY IMPLICATION AND USER—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—USE OF WATER FOR IRRIGATION.

1. Where the owner of land on which is a natural stream, whose waters are used by him for domestic and irrigating purposes, conveys a part of the land, the grantees, who use one-half of the water continuously for 19 years, without objection by the grantor or the subsequent grantees of the remaining part of the tract, acquire a right to such use.

2. While one entitled to use one-half the water in a natural stream may change the place of diversion, such change will not entitle him to divert more than his former share of the water.

3. A riparian owner may only use a reasonable amount of the water in a natural stream for irrigating purposes, after the other owners have been supplied with what is necessary for domestic purposes.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Suit by J. W. Smith and others against John Corbit to determine a water right. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Venable & Goodchild, for appellants. Wilcoxon & Bouldin and J. M. Wilcoxon, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is a suit to determine a water right. The court below adjudged that the defendant's right to take and use water out of the stream in controversy "for all his uses on the land occupied by him" was "paramount to the right of plaintiffs to use said water," and from that judgment the plaintiffs appeal on the judgment roll. The findings are, in substance, as follows: On November 3, 1875, and for a long time prior thereto, one Mrs. Munoz was the owner and in possession of a tract of land on which a small stream of water arose, and flowed thence through the same in a well-defined channel; and during the whole period of her ownership she used the said water for her household purposes, for watering her live stock, and for irrigating the parcels of her land respectively now owned by plaintiffs and defendant. On November 3, 1875, Mrs. Munoz conveyed to one Deleissiguez the tract of land described in the complaint as "Lot 5," the northerly line of which was run along the general course of said stream, crossing and recrossing the same. At that time a dam was constructed at a point on the stream near the northeast corner of lot 5 for conducting water upon said lot; and from the time of his purchase up to January 31, 1887, Deleissiguez continuously used on said lot one-half of the waters of the stream for domestic, irrigating, etc., purposes. On January 31, 1887, Deleissiguez conveyed to plaintiffs the said lot 5, and they immediately entered into, and have ever since remained in, possession thereof. And from the time of their purchase up to April 15, 1894 (the time of the diversion complained of), they continuously used one-half of the water of said stream for their household purposes, for watering their stock, and for irrigating their yard and garden and an orchard of lemon and other fruit trees, all upon said lot. In 1886, Mrs. Munoz conveyed to defendant two tracts of her land, one lying on the north side of plaintiffs' lot 5, and contiguous thereto, called the "Corbit Tract," and the other lying further up the stream, and including the place where the stream arose, called the "Goldtree Tract." In 1888 defendant changed the place of diversion of the water used by him from the said dam to a point higher up the stream on the Goldtree tract, and laid pipes therefrom to his house on the Corbit tract, through which he conducted the other half of the water. Thereafter he continued to use the water so diverted for his household purposes, for watering his live stock and for irrigating his land. In ordinary seasons, the stream carried about four inches of water measured under a four-inch pressure, but during the winter of 1893–94 there was very little rain, and after April 15, 1894, there was not sufficient water flowing in the stream to supply defendant's diversion. From the date last named to the time of the trial in September following, defendant's pipes diverted nearly all the water of the stream, and by reason of such diversion plaintiffs were almost entirely deprived of water. The defendant did not, however, waste any of the waters of the stream, but in good faith used the same upon his land for domestic, stock, and irrigation purposes. Upon these facts we fail to see how the conclusion of the court below that the rights of defendant were paramount to the rights of plaintiffs can be sustained.

1. The Civil Code, § 3522, declares that "one who grants a thing is presumed to grant also whatever is essential to its use." And in Cave v. Crafts, 53 Cal. 135, it is said: "When the owner of lands divides his property into two parts, granting away one of them, he is taken by implication to include in his grant all such easements in the remaining part as are necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the part which he grants, in the form which it assumes at the time he transfers it." And again: "The general rule of law is that when a party grants a thing, he by implication grants whatever is incident to it and necessary to its beneficial enjoyment." When, therefore, Mrs. Munoz conveyed to Deleissiguez a part of her land, on which she had been using the water of the said stream for many years, she must be presumed to have granted also a right to the water which was necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the part granted. And that such was the intention and understanding of all the parties concerned is clearly shown by the fact that for more than 19 years the plaintiffs and their grantor appropriated and used upon their land one-half of the water of the stream, without any objection or interference on the part of defendant or his grantor, Mrs. Munoz. It must be held, therefore, we think, that plaintiffs, under their conveyances and long user, acquired a right to take and use one-half of the water of the stream. It is true, defendant, in 1888, changed the place of his diversion of the water to a point higher up the stream; but this he had a right to do, provided the rights of others were not injuriously affected thereby. Kidd v. Laird, 15 Cal. 162; Ramelli v. Irish, 96 Cal. 214, 31 Pac. 41. The change, however, did not increase or diminish the share of the water which he was entitled to divert. He still had a right to only one-half of the water flowing in the stream; and this continued to be his right in 1894, when the quantity of water flowing was diminished by reason of the dry season.

2. The plaintiffs and defendant are riparian owners, and, if their respective rights are to be considered and determined in view of the law applicable to such cases, the judgment must still be held erroneous. It appears that the stream enters the Corbit tract a short distance above the point where it crosses the line between the two tracts, and then flows down, crossing and recrossing that line several times. The fact that defendant diverted the water on the Goldtree tract did not give him any superior right to use it on the Corbit tract. As riparian owners, both parties were entitled to have their natural wants supplied—that is, to use so much of the water as was necessary for strictly domestic purposes, and to furnish drink for man and beast—before any could be used for purposes of irrigation. Gould v. Stafford, 77 Cal. 66, 18 Pac. 879; Water Co. v. Hancock, 85 Cal. 219, 24 Pac. 645. After their natural wants were supplied, each party was entitled to a reasonable use of the remaining water for irrigation; and, if the circumstances were such that the interests of the parties would be conserved thereby, the court was authorized to apportion the flow of the water of the stream to the respective owners by periods of time, so that each would have the full flow during such designated period. Harris v. Harrison, 93 Cal. 676, 29 Pac. 325; Wiggins v. Water Co., 113 Cal. 182, 45 Pac. 160. The judgment, so far as it is appealed from, should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment, so far as it is appealed from, is reversed, and the cause remanded.

MERRIAM v. BARNUM, County Auditor.
(Sac. 190.)

COUNTIES—BOARD OF SUPERVISORS—AUTHORITY TO EMPLOY SPECIAL COUNSEL.

Under County Government Act (St. 1893, pp. 351, 356, 359) § 25, subds. 17, 35, which empower the board of supervisors to direct all suits to which the county is a party, and to employ counsel to assist the district attorney, and to do all other things necessary to the duties of the legislative authority of the county government, do not authorize the board to employ special counsel to attend it on all matters pertaining to the reconstruction of the courthouse, insurance matters, etc., at a monthly salary, until the further order of the board.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. R. Webb, Judge.

Application by C. C. Merriam for a writ of mandamus to compel H. E. Barnum, county auditor, to issue and deliver a warrant. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. C. Merriam, in pro. per. Alva E. Snow, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The application is for a writ of mandate. A demurrer was interposed to the petition, which was sustained by the court, with leave to plaintiff to amend. Plaintiff declined to amend, and prosecutes this appeal from the judgment of the court entered against him. His petition discloses the following facts: That he was an attorney at law, and that the defendant, Barnum, was and is the auditor of the county of Fresno, state of California. On the 29th day of July, 1895, the courthouse of the county of Fresno was partially destroyed by fire. On July 31, 1895, the supervisors of the county of Fresno, at a special session called for that purpose, unanimously adopted a resolution or order of which the following is a copy: "In the Matter of the Appointment of C. C. Merriam Special Counsel for the Board, etc. Upon motion of Supervisor Letcher, seconded by Supervisor Garrett, it is ordered that C. C. Merriam be, and is hereby, employed as special counsel to attend this board on all matters pertaining to the reconstruction of the court house, insurance matters, etc. It is further ordered that the compensation of said Merriam be, and the same is hereby, fixed in the sum of one hundred and twenty-five dollars per month until the further order of the board." Plaintiff served during the month of August as such special counsel in settling with insurance companies for losses sustained by fire, and in matters pertaining to the reconstruction of the courthouse. He performed all the conditions of his contract, and thereafter presented in due form for allowance his bill for services, which was allowed by the board of supervisors, and ordered paid. Plaintiff demanded of the auditor a warrant on the treasury for the amount of the bill as allowed, but the auditor refused to issue or deliver this warrant to plaintiff.

The sole question in the case may be thus stated: Had the board of supervisors the power to employ plaintiff in the manner and for the purposes indicated by the above-quoted resolution? The district attorney is the legal adviser of the board of supervisors, and it is made his duty by law to attend its meetings, and give all necessary advice. County Government Act, § 137; St. 1893, p. 381; Pol. Code, § 4257. Boards of supervisors are empowered (County Government Act; St. 1893, pp. 351, 356, 359), under such limitations and restrictions as are prescribed by law (section 25, subd. 17), "to direct and control the prosecution and defense of all suits to which the county is a party, and to employ counsel to assist the district attorney in conducting the same. * * * (35) To do and perform all other acts and things required by law, not in this act enumerated, or which may be necessary to the full discharge of the duties of the legislative authority of the county government."

Boards of supervisors are a creation of the statute, and, their powers being statutory, their acts must find warrant in the law, either expressly or by fair implication. Linden v. Case, 46 Cal. 172; County of Modoc v. Spencer, 103 Cal. 501, 37 Pac. 483. It is claimed that the authority of the supervisors in the matter under consideration is conferred by subdivision 35 of section 25 of the county government act last above quoted. St. 1893, p. 359. From the statutes above referred to, it is clearly the intention of the law that the district attorney, and no one else, shall be and act as the legal adviser of the board, with power to the board, however, to employ additional and special counsel to assist the district attorney in the prosecution or defense of suits to which the county may be a party. In the cases cited and relied upon by appellant the employment of counsel other than the city or district attorney had special reference to suits either commenced or which in the nature of things would probably be commenced. In Smith v. Mayor, etc., 13 Cal. 531, the suit was over the employment of Alpheus Felch for contesting before the supreme court of the United States, under employment by the city, the title of John Sutter to lands within the limits of the city. In Hornblower v. Duden, 35 Cal. 664, the board of supervisors of El Dorado county had employed James McM. Shafter to defend the interests of the county in a certain railroad matter which involved the prosecution of an action of quo warranto, and for his services in this action the fee was claimed. In Scollay v. Butte Co., 67 Cal. 249, 7 Pac. 661, it is declared that the cases of Hornblower v. Duden and Smith v. Mayor, etc., supra, authorize the employment of other counsel than the district attorney "to commence and prosecute suits for the county." In Lassen Co. v. Shinn, 88 Cal. 510, 26 Pac. 365, the firm of Shinn & Masten, attorneys at law, had been employed to collect all moneys due to Lassen county from the state of California on account of the keeping of indigent persons. The language used in the opinion in this case is somewhat broader than the authorities cited in support of it will justify, for the cases relied upon are Smith v. Mayor, etc., and Hornblower v. Duden, in both of which the employment was for the actual conduct of a suit. In Modoc Co. v. Spencer, 103 Cal. 498, 37 Pac. 483, the board of supervisors had undertaken to employ counsel on behalf of the county to assist the district attorney in the prosecution of criminal cases, and the contract was held to be in excess of the powers of the board, and void. In Kelley v. Sersanous (Cal.) 46 Pac. 299, the board of supervisors employed the petitioner as an attorney at law to collect certain claims of the county of Glenn "by action at law or otherwise." Here, again, the employment contemplated the prosecution of a suit, and the contract may be said to come within the spirit, if not the precise letter, of the law authorizing the employment of special counsel to assist the district attorney in conducting a suit. In general, therefore, the action of the supervisors in employing special counsel has been upheld in those cases in which counsel were employed to defend or prosecute a suit, or, as in the extreme cases of Scollay v. Butte Co. and Lassen Co. v. Shinn, where the contract contemplated the employment of an attorney at law to collect moneys, in the performance of which duty a suit might be necessary, and his knowledge and skill as an attorney at law be required.

The contract under consideration, however, is not of this kind. The nature of the employment is to be measured by the terms of the writing expressed in the resolution of the board of supervisors. By that contract it appears that appellant was "employed as special counsel to attend this board on all matters pertaining to the reconstruction of the courthouse, insurance matters," etc. Thus Merriam's duty was fully performed when he attended the sessions of the board, and advised it on all matters pertaining to the reconstruction of the courthouse, and (presumably) the collection of insurance money. There is in this contract no contemplated suit by or against the county, and, if there were, it was no part of appellant's duty to prosecute or defend such suit. His duty was completed when he advised the board, and he could be compelled by the board to do nothing more. The contract, then, was merely an attempt upon the part of the board of supervisors to pay special counsel by the month for performing a duty which the law imposed upon the district attorney. The time and term of employment were indefinite, and we have the situation presented of the supervisors creating the office of special adviser at a salary of $125 per month. If this could be done in the face of the law which limits the powers of boards of supervisors to the employment of counsel to prosecute or defend suits, then it might be done for any purpose that would meet the views of a complaisant board, and at the same time that the law commands the district attorney to be present and to act as general legal adviser of his board, we would have special counsel for such boards under salaries of $125 a month, advising upon road matters, others advising upon the collection of insurance, others again as special advisers upon matters relative to the levy and assessment of taxes, others employed upon matters touching the validity and legality of claims against the county, and still others upon any of the numberless legal propositions which at one time or another are presented for the consideration of such executive bodies. However valuable the services of the appellant may have been to the county in this instance, to permit compensation for them would be to override the law, and to destroy one of the strongest safeguards cast about the expenditure of county funds. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

HENRY v. CITY OF SACRAMENTO.

(Sac. 222.)

CONTRACTS—CONDITIONS—PLEADING.

1. A contract between a city and F. provided that F. was to supply the city with water of a specified quality and quantity, which he was to procure by means of wells near said city, if possible; that within 60 days he should begin prospecting, to determine whether a supply of water existed at the proposed location, and prosecute such investigations so as to fully determine within six months after the signing of the contract whether such supply could be obtained; that, if it could not, both parties should be released from the contract; and that, if it could, certain other covenants were to be complied with. Held, in an action against the city on the latter covenants, that a complaint which did not aver a discovery and development of the supply was insufficient.

2. Such requirement was not met by an averment that plaintiff had in all respects fully complied with all the requirements and conditions of said contract by him to be done or performed, since he did not undertake absolutely to find water.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; Matt. F. Johnson, Judge.

Grove L. Johnson and Albert M. Johnson, for appellant. McKune & George, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, with leave to amend, and, plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was rendered for defendant. From this judgment plaintiff appeals.

It is alleged in the complaint that on September 11, 1893, one A. L. Fish entered into a certain contract, set forth in the complaint, with the defendant, the city of Sacramento; that thereafter on March 1, 1894, the said Fish duly assigned said contract to J. H. Henry and A. Abbott; that thereafter the said Abbott duly assigned all his interest in the contract to the said J. H. Henry; and that on November 27, 1894, the said J. H. Henry duly assigned the said contract to W. E. Henry, who is the plaintiff herein, and brought this suit on June 27, 1895. The demurrer states the general ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and also presents the point that the alleged contract was personal in its nature, and not assignable. This second point need not be here considered; for, in our opinion, the complaint in other respects does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The contract is quite lengthy, and need not be here set forth in detail. It is sufficient to say generally that, in the event of a certain contingency happening, the said Fish was to supply the defendant for city purposes water, in quality "clear, sweet, and wholesome," and "suitable for drinking water and domestic uses," and in quantity not less than "one thousand million gallons per annum"; and the defendant was to pay for said water at a certain rate for a certain period mentioned, the said Fish to furnish a water main, and connect it with the water-pipe system of the city then existing. The water was to be procured by said Fish by means of wells to be dug by him near said city, provided he should be able by that means to discover and develop water of the quality and in the quantity specified in the contract. At the time of the execution of the contract no such water had been developed, and whether or not it could be so developed was problematical. It is provided that: "Within sixty days of the signing of this contract, the party of the second part [Fish] must begin in good faith such prospecting and investigations as may be necessary to determine whether an adequate and proper supply of water exists at the proposed location of his plant and well, and he shall prosecute such investigations in good faith, and with reasonable dispatch, so as to fully determine within six months after the signing of the contract whether such supply can be obtained." It was further provided that, if such water could not be developed as aforesaid, then both parties should be released from all liability upon the contract. It was further provided that said Fish should deposit with the defendant a certified check in the sum of $10,000, as security that he would faithfully endeavor during said six months to determine whether water in quantity and quality as aforesaid could be developed; and that, if it should appear that such supply of water could not be developed, then the check should be returned to said Fish. If, however, such supply should be developed within six months, then certain other covenants of the parties were to be complied with. It is quite clear that the contract and the covenants of the defendant were based on the possibility of Fish discovering and developing by means of said wells water for the supply of the city, of the quality and quantity before mentioned, within six months after the date of the contract. But it is nowhere averred in the complaint that Fish or his assigns ever discovered or developed water of said quality and quantity, or any water at all; and defendant was certainly not liable upon its covenants to do certain things after the development of such water, if such water was never discovered or developed. The complaint, to be sufficient to state a cause of action for damages against the defendant for not complying with said covenants, should have averred the conditions upon which said covenants rested. But the only averment upon this subject in the complaint is: "That the said plaintiff, and each and all of his said assignors, have in all respects fully complied with all the requirements and conditions of said contract by them, or either of them, to be done or performed." Fish, however, did not undertake to find water in the quality or quantity specified in the contract. He merely promised to diligently search and prospect for water during the six months succeeding the date of the contract; and his failure to find such water during said period would be perfectly consistent with the averments of the complaint, and yet leave the defendant entirely free from the obligations of any covenants on its part stated in the contract. The complaint is perfectly consistent with the fact that Fish and his assigns utterly failed to find and produce the supply of water upon which all the covenants of the defendant rested; and the failure of plaintiff to allege the conditions upon which alone the promises of the defendant were to be effective renders the complaint radically insufficient to maintain the action for damages herein sought to be alleged. It seems quite likely that the defect in the complaint arose, not from a want of knowledge how to plead, but from a want of facts to be pleaded. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

SMITH v. SMITH. (L. A. 110.)[1]

APPEAL—NEW TRIAL—SPECIFICATION OF ERRORS—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIONS OF LAW—DIVORCE—CRUELTY—CONDONATION—RECRIMINATION—EVIDENCE—CORROBORATION—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

1. On appeal from an order denying a new trial, where the statement as settled shows a large number of rulings on the admission of evidence, which were excepted to by appellant, only those can be considered that were specified as errors in the specifications upon which the motion for a new trial was heard.

2. The fact that counsel for the respective parties discuss the other rulings in their briefs does not authorize the court to consider them, since the presumption is, under Code Civ. Proc. § 659, subd. 3, that they were disregarded by the court in passing on the motion.

3. Where a divorce is granted on the ground of extreme cruelty, a finding that defendant, by his conduct, impaired plaintiff's health, is not essential, and hence need not be supported by the evidence.

4. A finding that defendant was chargeable with extreme cruelty to his wife (plaintiff) is sustained by evidence that without sufficient provocation, and without reasonable grounds, he called her a whore, a hog, and a hypocrite; charged her with infidelity; and accused her, when she was ill, of having contracted her disease by illicit intercourse, though such illness was not of a character indicating such origin.

5. Under Civ. Code, § 118, providing that where the cause of divorce arises in case of cruelty from successive acts of ill treatment, which may aggregately constitute the offense, cohabitation or passive endurance or conjugal kindness shall not be evidence of condonation, "unless accompanied by an express agreement to condone," it is a question of fact whether acts of cruelty have been condoned.

6. In an action for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, where defendant has pleaded extreme cruelty by plaintiff, and condonation of defendant's offense, and there are findings of fact for plaintiff, a conclusion of law that plaintiff is entitled to a decree dissolving the bonds of matrimony, etc., is sufficient to support a judgment of divorce.

7. Though defendant relies on a recriminatory answer, a failure to find on his charges is not reversible error, where, had the court found the several acts and things complained of in the language in which they were alleged by defendant, the findings would not have justified a decree of divorce; Civ. Code, § 122, providing that "recrimination is a showing by defendant of any cause of divorce against plaintiff in bar of plaintiff's cause of divorce."

8. In an action for divorce, the testimony of plaintiff may be corroborated by that of defendant.

9. A motion for new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, consisting of a letter written to defendant by plaintiff, is properly denied, where plaintiff had testified that she kept copies of all the letters she had written defendant, and had them then; since defendant should have requested the production of the copy relied on, and, if it was not produced, asked a postponement, to enable him to find the original.

10. A letter thanking a husband for a present, expressing best wishes for his future, and concluding, "With love, I am yours, M.," is insufficient to show a condonation of his prior acts of cruelty, since it lacks the "express agreement to condone," required by Civ. Code, § 118.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Action by Mary M. Smith against Nelson Smith for divorce. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Isidore B. Dockweiler and J. Brousseau, for appellant. J. G. Rossitor, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This appeal is from a judgment of divorce granted the plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, based upon the insufficiency of the evidence to justify certain findings and also upon an affidavit of alleged newly-discovered evidence.

The notice of intention to move for a new trial also specified as one of the grounds of said motion: "Errors in law occurring at the trial, and excepted to by the defendant." The statement as settled shows a large number of rulings upon the admission of evidence, which were excepted to by the defendant; but none of these rulings are specified as errors in the specifications upon which the motion for a new trial was heard, and therefore cannot be considered. Code Civ. Proc. § 659; People v. Central Pac. R. Co., 43 Cal. 398; Bagnall v. Roach, 76 Cal. 106, 18 Pac. 137; Bohnert v. Bohnert, 95 Cal. 445, 30 Pac. 590. The fact that counsel for the respective parties discuss these various rulings in their briefs does not authorize this court to consider them. The presumption is that they were disregarded by the court below in passing upon the motion. Code Civ. Proc. § 659, subd. 3; Pico v. Cohn, 67 Cal. 258, 7 Pac. 680.

The ground of divorce alleged by the plaintiff is extreme cruelty. Defendant, in addition to denials, pleaded condonation, and by way of recrimination, but without seeking for a divorce against the plaintiff, charged that the plaintiff was guilty of extreme cruelty towards him.

The principal question made is that the third finding is not justified by the evidence.

This finding, after reciting the principal probative facts charged in the complaint, and finding that they were committed by defendant, concluded as follows: "And the court finds that defendant, by his conduct towards the plaintiff as aforesaid, did willfully inflict upon plaintiff grievous mental pain and suffering, thereby greatly impairing her health." It is specified that the finding that plaintiff's health was greatly impaired is not justified by the evidence, and a like specification is made to the several findings of probative facts upon which is based the finding that grievous mental pain and suffering were inflicted by the defendant. Whether plaintiff's health was impaired or not it was not necessary to find. If it was in fact greatly impaired, and such impairment was shown to be the result of defendant's treatment, it would tend to characterize such treatment as extreme cruelty; but, in order to justify a finding of extreme cruelty, it is not necessary that such impairment of health is shown to have resulted, nor is it necessary to be alleged in the complaint. Barnes v. Barnes, 95 Cal. 171, 30 Pac. 298. The sufficiency of the finding would not be affected if the words "thereby greatly impairing her health" had been omitted, and therefore we need not inquire whether the evidence justified that part of the finding. As to the essential part of this finding, it is only necessary to say that there was evidence given by and on behalf of the plaintiff to the effect that without sufficient provocation on the part of the plaintiff, and without any reasonable grounds therefor, the defendant called plaintiff a whore, a hog, and a hypocrite; claimed that she was untrue to him; that he accused her, when she was ill, of having contracted her disease by illicit intercourse with other men while she was absent, visiting her parents in Illinois, it not appearing that such illness was of a character indicating such origin; and that it was repeated after he had visited a physician with her, and was told by the doctor that it was not of that character. Defendant, in his answer, admitted that he did at one time charge her with having so contracted said illness, but that that was more than seven years ago. The plaintiff testified, however, that it was repeated on September 12, 1893, about six weeks before this suit was commenced; that defendant then said: "I didn't believe those insinuations at the time, but, because you get so excited now, I believe them." It will be observed that while the defendant, in his answer, admitted that seven years before he did charge the plaintiff with having contracted her illness by illicit intercourse, he did not disavow a present belief in the truth of the charge. Much of the testimony was seriously conflicting; but there was evidence, apparently credible, sufficient to support the finding of extreme cruelty, and which the trial court, charged with the duty of determining the credibility of the witnesses and the weight of the evidence, found to be true. It may here be added that the life of these parties had been unhappy for many years, and there are in the complaint several minor allegations of particular acts of alleged cruelty committed by the husband, and many of these are included in the third finding, and found to be true, and these several findings are attacked and argued by appellant. These need not be specially noticed, since, if not justified by the evidence, it would not affect the sufficiency of the finding in the particulars we have noticed, though we find evidence tending to sustain each of them.

It is also contended that there is no finding upon the plea of condonation tendered by the defendant. The court found that said acts of cruelty have never been condoned by the plaintiff; but this, counsel say, is only a conclusion of law. Counsel are mistaken. Whether an offense has been condoned is a question of fact. Being an operation of the mind, it is evidenced by acts or declarations, but evidence of the existence of a fact has no proper place in a finding. Section 118 of the Civil Code provides: "Where the cause of divorce consists of a course of offensive conduct, or arises in case of cruelty from successive acts of ill treatment which may, aggregately, constitute the offense, cohabitation, or passive endurance, or conjugal kindness, shall not be evidence of condonation of any of the acts constituting such cause, unless accompanied by an express agreement to condone." It might be sufficient to say upon this point that, if the finding in question is a conclusion of law, the allegation which is supposed to have raised the issue is also a conclusion of law, and therefore raised no issue; for though the answer, in connection with the allegation that plaintiff "condoned said alleged charges of extreme cruelty," also alleged that she "freely cohabited with him and restored him to his marital rights," it did not allege that these acts were "accompanied by an express agreement to condone," which the Code makes essential.

Appellant, in his brief, specifies three particulars in which he claims that the findings are insufficient to support the judgment, viz.: That "the conclusions of law in said findings fail to specify (1) that defendant has been guilty of extreme cruelty towards plaintiff; (2) that plaintiff has not been guilty of extreme cruelty towards defendant; and (3) that plaintiff has never condoned the acts of extreme cruelty on the part of the defendant."

The first conclusion of law drawn by the court from the findings is: "That plaintiff is entitled to a decree of this court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore existing between the plaintiff and defendant, and decreeing plaintiff and defendant each to be forever absolutely released from the bonds of matrimony and all the obligations arising therefrom." The remaining conclusions of law relate to the custody of the children, the division of the community property, etc. Such conclusion of law as that above quoted was held sufficient in Murphy v. Snyder, 67 Cal. 451, 8 Pac. 2, and, it may be added, is the more common form in which conclusions of law are stated.

Again, appellant contends that the judgment should be reversed upon the ground that there are no findings upon the charges of extreme cruelty alleged against the plaintiff in defendant's recriminatory answer. Section 122, Civ. Code, is as follows: "Recrimination is a showing by defendant of any cause of divorce against the plaintiff, in bar of the plaintiff's cause of divorce." In order to defeat the plaintiff's cause of action, the recriminatory answer must allege facts which, if proved, would authorize or justify a decree of divorce in his favor if he had sued therefor, and the evidence must be sufficient to sustain such of the allegations of fact as would justify the conclusion that they constituted extreme cruelty, as defined by the Civil Code. If this answer had been presented as a complaint for divorce, and the court had found the several acts and things complained of in the language in which they are alleged, we do not think it would have justified a decree of divorce. In White v. White, 82 Cal. 427, 452, 23 Pac. 276, the failure of the trial court to find upon the issue of extreme cruelty pleaded by the defendant in recrimination was considered. The court said: "The court is of opinion that the evidence on this issue was insufficient to have sustained or justified a finding by the court below of extreme cruelty by plaintiff to defendant. * * * As the evidence would not have justified a finding of extreme cruelty on the part of the plaintiff, and as this court would have reversed for such a finding, as not justified by the evidence, if it had been made, it will not reverse for want of such finding, and send the cause back for a finding upon such issue."

On one occasion the plaintiff, under provocation, said, "I don't love you!" while always before protesting that she loved him. Concerning the allegation that she had instructed their children that her authority was paramount, the controversy was, in substance, that she wished to educate them in her religious belief, which was different from his. He testified that "one day she came and sat down by my side, and threw her arms round my neck, and said, 'Nelson, do let me teach the children the Christian religion, and let us get along together.' I couldn't refuse under those circumstances, and I said, 'All right, if we can get along together, I will give up that point;' " and that, while it was still a subject of discussion between them, it was almost entirely dropped during the last two years. Nowhere in his evidence did he make the broad assertion charged in his answer. Concerning the allegation that she had refused to cohabit with him "ever since the 26th day of October, 1893," it is sufficient to say that the complaint in this action was filed the next day after the date mentioned; nor are any instances of the display of temper or passion given, either in said answer or in the evidence, which would be sufficient to support a finding of extreme cruelty. The allegations that plaintiff is extravagant and lazy, and neglected her necessary housework, are negatived in the findings.

A point made by appellant, that should have been noticed in another connection, is that plaintiff's testimony relative to the acts of the defendant which are alleged to constitute cruelty is not corroborated. As to what constitutes corroborating evidence in suits for divorce, see Evans v. Evans, 41 Cal. 103, 108. It is sufficient to say that defendant's testimony, while conflicting with that of the plaintiff in many of the details, yet in the more important matters was corroborative of the plaintiff's testimony. Other testimony might also be referred to. The principal object of the rule is to prevent collusion, and in this case it is clear there is no collusion.

In support of his motion for a new trial, defendant read his affidavit, in which was set out a copy of a letter written to him by the plaintiff, which reads as follows: "At Home, Oct. 2d, '93. Dear Husband: Henry handed me your note this morning. On opening it, I discovered a check for $5 as a present for my birthday. Please accept thanks for same, also for your kind wishes. Please accept my best wishes for your future as well. With love, I am yours, Mollie." It is contended that this letter proves that the husband's acts of cruelty were condoned, and that a new trial should have been granted because of this newly-discovered evidence. The affidavit is "that before and at the trial of the action he searched for and endeavored to find the letters and correspondence between plaintiff and defendant, for the purpose of using them at said trial as evidence therein; that since the said trial I have unexpectedly found a letter," etc., —setting out the above-quoted letter. Upon cross-examination plaintiff testified that she kept copies of all the letters she wrote to the defendant, and had them then. If the defendant had been unable to find letters he desired to use in evidence upon being informed that plaintiff had copies of them he should have requested the production of this letter; and, if it was not produced, he could properly apply to the court for a postponement of the trial for a reasonable time to enable him to find it. But, if it had been produced, it was insufficient to prove condonation, since it does not show "an express agreement to condone," as required by section 118 of the Civil Code. At most, it was only evidence of "conjugal kindness." The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

EARL FRUIT CO. v. CURTIS et al. (Sac. 173.)

CONTRACTS—ACTION FOR BREACH—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Where defendant set up a counterclaim for plaintiff's breach of a contract to ship and market grapes, and, on the latter's claim that the fruit was unfit for shipment, and that it was agreed that it should not be shipped, contended that such unfitness resulted from plaintiff's refusal to accept the fruit in proper time, the evidence being conflicting, an instruction to find for defendant if plaintiff failed to ship the fruit was erroneous.

2. An instruction that the unfitness of the fruit for shipment was no defense if plaintiff inspected it before making the contract, was erroous; since defendant suffered no damage if, without plaintiff's fault, the fruit was in such condition that it would have realized nothing; and, if such condition resulted from plaintiff's failure to make timely shipments, defendant's damage would depend on the quality of the fruit at the time it should have been shipped.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. R. Webb, Judge.

Action by the Earl Fruit Company against Marie A. Curtis and another for breach of contract. From an affirmative judgment for defendants on their counterclaim, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Frank H. Short, for appellant. Geo. E. Church, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. This appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. Plaintiff sued to recover damages for the alleged breach of a written contract, by the terms of which the defendant Marie A. Curtis agreed to deliver to plaintiff, at its packing house in Fresno, all of her Malaga grapes, not less than 80 tons, then growing on her premises, as soon as they should be in a suitable condition for shipment, or on demand of plaintiff, to be shipped by plaintiff and marketed for said defendant. Plaintiff agreed to furnish boxes, and to pack, ship, and market the fruit promptly on delivery, and to account therefor within 30 days from the delivery of the fruit. It is averred that the plaintiff advanced to defendant on account of the grapes which were to be delivered under the contract $400, and that defendant delivered only 9,218 pounds of grapes, and wholly failed and refused to deliver the residue, to wit, 150,728 pounds. Judgment is demanded for the damages suffered by such failure, for the money advanced, and for some expenses incurred by plaintiff in attempted performance of the contract. For answer the defendant Marie A. Curtis denies the material allegations of the complaint, and as a separate defense avers that the plaintiff refused to receive and ship the grapes according to contract. Said defendant also filed a cross complaint, in which she claimed damages for the failure of plaintiff to receive and ship the grapes. The case was tried by a jury, which found for the said defendant, and assessed her damages at $600.

At the trial the plaintiff attempted to prove that the defendant Marie A. Curtis refused to deliver the grapes, because they were unfit for shipment, and that the grapes were unfit and unsuitable for the Eastern market; and in consequence thereof it was agreed between plaintiff and defendant's agent that they should not be shipped, but that defendant should repay to plaintiff the moneys advanced by it. The defendant denied that she refused to deliver the grapes, or consented that they should not be shipped, and contends that they were suitable for shipment, and that plaintiff wrongfully refused to receive them, and that, if, when plaintiff finally refused to take them, they were unfit, it was solely because plaintiff had refused to accept them until they became overripe. To those questions the evidence was addressed, and, as we have seen, the jury found for the defendant. The evidence is conflicting, but I think it sustains the verdict. A great deal of evidence on both sides was directed to the controversy as to whether the defendant, through her agent, had excused performance upon the part of plaintiff. The contention on the part of plaintiff was that the grapes were unfit for shipment, and that nothing could be realized upon them by shipping, and that defendant's agent agreed to this, and refused to deliver them for shipment. This, if true, was a complete defense to defendant's claim for damages, unless she established her further contention that the unfitness of the grapes for shipment resulted from the fact that they were overripe, and that plaintiff had refused to receive and ship them at the proper time. All this was for the jury. But the court, by its instructions, took the matter from the jury, telling them: "If the plaintiffs failed to pack the grapes and ship them as they had agreed to ship them, then it is your duty to find for the defendants in this case, and to find for the defendants in any sum that you may find from the evidence they have been damaged by reason of the failure of the plaintiffs to comply with their contract." The respondent replies to the charge that this was prejudicial error by saying that Wicks was not the agent of Marie A. Curtis, and there was, therefore, no consent on the part of defendant that plaintiff need not ship the grapes. But, while the evidence upon this subject was conflicting, two witnesses at least testified that Mrs. Curtis herself referred plaintiff's agent to Wicks as the person authorized to act for her. The court was therefore not authorized to assume that Wicks was without authority. This instruction ignored this special defense to defendant's counterclaim, and was therefore erroneous.

The court also gave the following instruction: "If you find further from the evidence, gentlemen, that the agents of the plaintiff in this case, before entering into the contract with the defendant, inspected the grapes themselves, then it is no defense for the plaintiffs to say that the grapes were not fit to ship. If they inspected the grapes before they entered into the contract, they cannot be heard to say anything about the quality of the grapes." I am at a loss to understand upon what theory defendant asked and obtained this instruction. There was no purchase by plaintiff, and the doctrine of caveat emptor had no application. Admitting that plaintiff was guilty of a breach of the contract, in that it wrongfully refused to accept and ship the grapes, the question still remained as to the extent of the defendant's damage because of such breach. If, without fault of the plaintiff, the grapes were in such condition that they would have realized nothing if shipped, the defendant has suffered no damage. Defendant was not entitled to the price which could have been realized by the shipment of Malaga grapes of a fair quality, without proof that these grapes were of that quality; and it was open to the plaintiff to show, if it could, that defendant's grapes were of an inferior quality. If the plaintiff neglected to make timely shipments, and is without excuse in so doing, this could be taken into consideration, and the quality of the grapes determined by their condition when they should have been shipped. Upon all these questions there was much evidence. The errors pointed out were not cured by any other instructions. Judgment and order reversed, and new trial ordered.

In re REDFIELD'S ESTATE. (S. F. 59.)

WILLS—CONTEST—INSANE DELUSIONS—COMPETENCY OF PHYSICIAN AS WITNESS—PLEADING—AMENDMENT—REVIEW.

1. Sufficiency of a petition contesting a will cannot be considered on appeal from denial of new trial.

2. It is discretionary to refuse amendment of answer during trial to raise an estoppel against contestant by reason of acceptance of benefits under the will.

3. Statement of witness that he received no information about testatrix except as a physician to enable him to take care of her, standing alone, justifies the inference that this knowledge was necessary to enable him "to prescribe or act" for her, so as to render him incompetent under Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, to testify in regard to it.

4. A will is not invalidated by delusions of testatrix which do not relate to the persons or objects affected by it.

5. An opinion which is merely simulated and but a fleeting vagary is not an insane delusion.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Contest of will of Mary A. Redfield, deceased, by Mary Bowden. Verdict for contestant, and new trial denied; and Winslow G. Hall, executor, and others, appeal. Reversed.

Chickering, Thomas & Gregory, R. E. Houghton, and Van Ness & Redman, for appellants. Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. When this cause was pending in department an opinion was prepared by Commissioner BRITT, and concurred in by Commissioners VANCLIEF and HAYNES. The case was subsequently ordered into bank. After a full hearing by the court, and a careful examination of the entire case, we are satisfied that we cannot give better expression of our views than by adopting Commissioner BRITT'S opinion, which we accordingly do; and, for the reasons therein stated, the order appealed from is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

The following is Commissioner BRITT'S opinion:

"Mary A. Redfield, late of the city and county of San Francisco, died of pulmonary consumption October 4, 1891, being then aged about 50 years. She left a will, executed September 14th next previous, which was admitted to probate on October 21, 1891. By its terms she disposed of the whole of her estate, which was of the value of $73,000, or thereabouts. Her maiden name was Bowden. She was married in 1870 to one Francis S. Redfield, who died in 1881, and from him she derived the property which, with its accretions, was the estate disposed of by said will. The legacies given by the terms of the will were as follows: To the brothers of the testatrix, William, Joseph, and Andrew Bowden, $100 each; to her sister, Ellen Simmons, $3,000; to certain children of said sister, sums amounting to $4,250; to her mother, Mary Bowden, $80 per month during her life, the executor being required to retain in his hands upon distribution of the estate sufficient property to produce an income of that monthly sum, and to pay the same 'to my sister Ellen Simmons, who is enjoined to expend the whole of said amount in the support and maintenance of our mother'; to 10 named relatives of her deceased husband, sums aggregating $4,500; and the residue was given to her nephew, one Walter E. Johnson, upon condition that he assume, 'by proper legal process, the name of Francis E. Redfield,' which condition he complied with. One Winslow G. Hall was named executor in the will, and he received letters accordingly. On October 6, 1892, a petition was filed on behalf of testatrix's mother and heir at law, said Mary Bowden, praying the revocation of the probate of the will upon various grounds, which are here reduced to these, viz. that the deceased was not of sound and disposing mind when the will was executed, and that its execution was procured through undue influence exerted upon her by the residuary legatee and the executor Hall. An answer was filed by them, and also, separately, by the relatives of the husband of the deceased named as legatees in the will. Special issues were submitted to a jury, and a verdict was returned in contestant's favor upon all of them. The court thereupon adjudged said instrument not to be the last will and testament of said deceased, and revoked the probate thereof. The appeal is from an order denying appellants' motion for a new trial.

"The contesting petition proceeded thus: 'Now comes Mary Bowden, * * * by her guardian, Joseph Bowden, and contests and objects to the supposed and pretended will of Mary A. Redfield, deceased, * * * and for her grounds of contest avers * * * (1) that your petitioner is the mother of said deceased,' etc. It is subscribed, not by guardian, but by 'Attorneys for Contestant.' It is now argued that the contest is subject to the rules governing civil actions (Code Civ. Proc. § 1716; In re Flint's Estate, 100 Cal. 400, 34 Pac. 863); that the petition is that of Joseph Bowden; and that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in his favor as an individual, because he has no interest in the estate (Code Civ. Proc. § 1327; In re Sanborn's Estate, 98 Cal. 103, 32 Pac. 865), nor as guardian, because it is barren of averment to show his capacity as such. But plainly the petition is that of Mary Bowden. It contains no allegation that she is under disability, nor that a guardian has been appointed for her. If the manner in which the petition is prefaced created any uncertainty as to her capacity to institute the contest, the defect is yet not assignable as error on appeal from the order denying a new trial. Evans v. Paige, 102 Cal. 132, 36 Pac. 406, and cases cited. Near the close of the trial the respondents below asked leave to amend their answers by the addition of allegations showing that the contestant had received regularly from the executor the sum of $80 per month bequeathed to her by the terms of the will; this for the purpose of raising an estoppel against contestant, founded on the acceptance of benefits under the will. Hamblett v. Hamblett, 6 N. H. 333; Hyde v. Baldwin, 17 Pick. 308; Morrison v. Bowman, 29 Cal. 337. Admitting that the rule invoked should have any application in this case, where the contestant is the sole heir of the deceased, and therefore entitled to the whole estate if the will is overthrown,—a proposition which her counsel deny,—it was yet discretionary with the court to refuse the amendment, and we cannot say that its discretion was abused. There was no showing why the matter was not pleaded earlier. A physician, Dr. McNutt, attended the deceased in her last illness, being called early in September, 1891. He testified that he treated her for consumption, and not for any mental disorder; that he got no information about her condition, either physical or mental, except as a physician to enable him to take care of her. Proponents then put to him the question whether her mind was affected. Contestant objected on the ground that the information sought was privileged, and the objection was sustained by the court. 'A licensed physician or surgeon cannot, without the consent of his patient, be examined in a civil action as to any information acquired in attending the patient which was necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient.' Code Civ. Proc. § 1881. The question is whether the knowledge of the mental condition of Mrs. Redfield acquired by the physician 'was necessary to enable him to prescribe or act' for her in the treatment of her disease. This was a matter of fact to be determined preliminarily by the judge of the trial court; and upon the information before him we cannot say that his conclusion was erroneous. The sole care of her had by the physician being in the treatment of the disease, his statement that he received no information about her except as a physician to enable him to take such care, standing unqualified as it did, justified the inference that this knowledge was necessary to enable him 'to prescribe or act' for her. See, in this connection, In re Flint's Estate, 100 Cal. 391, 34 Pac. 863; Edington v. Insurance Co., 77 N. Y. 564; Hoyt v. Hoyt, 112 N. Y. 493, 20 N. E. 402; Steele v. Ward, 30 Hun, 555; Staunton v. Parker, 19 Hun, 55. As to the verdict affirming the charge that the will was procured through undue influence exerted by Hall, the executor, and Johnson, the residuary legatee, it is enough to say that the evidence wholly fails to sustain it, being materially weaker in that regard than that adduced to justify the same charge in the recent cases of Herwick v. Langford, 41 Pac. 701, and In re McDevitt, 95 Cal. 17, 30 Pac. 101, in each of which this court held the verdict to be without support, and not materially stronger than that held insufficient in Re Carpenter's Estate, 94 Cal. 406, 29 Pac. 1101.

"The serious question in the case is whether the evidence justifies the verdict that the deceased was of unsound mind when she executed the will. We approach this, mindful that any substantial conflict in the evidence must be determined here in contestant's favor; that the court below has signified its satisfaction with the conclusions of the jury; and that its ruling on the result of the facts in evidence before it ought not to be reversed unless manifestly infected with error. The deceased occupied a house, owned by her, situated on Taylor street, between Union and Filbert streets, in San Francisco.

Her property consisted mainly of real estate and of interests in certain shipping. Her husband had owned shares in several vessels jointly with Capt. Hall, the executor named in this will, who was his close friend. After her husband's death, Hall had the principal oversight of her interests in the vessels, and accounted to her for her share of the receipts therefrom. Her income was $5,000 per year or more. When the will was executed, and for some years previously, her household included, as nearly as we can make out, besides herself, her mother, aged at that date about 83 years, Walter E. Johnson, the residuary legatee, and a servant. A niece, Nellie L. Simmons, had also for the space of 11 years been accustomed to sleep and spend a great (perhaps the greater) part of the time at her house, being her nurse in her last illness. Said Johnson's mother was the sister of the testatrix. She died in November, 1881. Previously, in 1877, Johnson being then a lad about 11 years old, and his father long since deceased, he was taken into the home of Mrs. Redfield and her husband, and lived with them until Redfield died. After that he remained with his aunt, the testatrix, being supported by her, and in return rendering services of rather miscellaneous character. He says: 'I worked around the property [her houses], and took as good care of it as I knew how, and did whatever I could around there.' Another witness testified that Johnson did 'what he could to help her, working around the house, keeping the place in repair, helping, and looking out for things.' Mrs. Simmons, sister of the testatrix, lived close by. She and her daughters were on terms of intimacy with the testatrix.

"We state the more important parts of the evidence for contestant as briefly as may be done consistently with clearness. Said Nellie L. Simmons testified that Mrs. Redfield was sick for a month before her death, sometimes sitting up for a few hours and sometimes in bed; that, in her judgment, testatrix was not of sound mind when the will was executed. 'My reasons were because she acted so. She would sit for hours at a time, and even for a day, and stare into vacancy with her mouth open. At other times, she imagined that the neighbors were peering at her and trying to see into her affairs, when they were going about their own work. She would lock the doors to all the rooms and carry the key in her pocket. She would remove different articles of furniture from different rooms. She would take one article from one room and put it in another. She took the wardrobe from one room and placed it in another because she did not want the sun to strike on it, when the sun didn't strike on it at all. She removed the hatrack from the hall and put it in the girl's room for fear of scratching the paint. She took the books from the bookcase that was always locked. She acted as if she was haunted. She slept in most all the rooms of the house; took opium pills to produce sleep,—took them for about three years, off and on; was afraid to go down Filbert street for fear the groceryman's wife would see her, and she would go up Taylor street, and that was a steep hill. She gave no reason for not wishing the groceryman's wife to see her; it was just her imagination. She would lock the doors for no cause whatever,—parlors, bedroom doors, and the library door. * * * During her last illness, and prior to the execution of this will, I noticed her condition particularly. At times she was not able to conduct and carry on a connected conversation, and at times she was. Sometimes she would commence to converse, and before she finished what she was talking on, she would go off into a doze, and if we aroused her she would not remember what she had been talking about. This was quite frequent during her last sickness. Her face had a far-away look, as if her mind was affected, staring far away. If she was spoken to sharply while she had that look, it would startle her, and that would bring her back to her apparent self, at times. The will was made September 14th. Prior to this time she had been irritable, and sometimes got excited at the least thing. She told me that she had packed her dishes up,—she was afraid of having them broken,—when she had not done so. She said she was going to move. I investigated, and there was nothing packed at all. Said she had to go to Piedmont, and was going to stay there, while she had nothing at all prepared to go. Then said she was going to move to Berkeley, and she spoke of moving to the Mission, and of taking a room a block away on Filbert street. Said there wasn't a room in the house she could get a fire in or any heat. There could have been a fire in the library, in her bedroom, or the girl's room, or the room I slept in. She knew there were appliances for fire. The house has eleven rooms. She very seldom went out; was often silent, and during the latter part of her life quite frequently sat looking into vacancy. It was September 1, 1891, that she was taken sick. She had no company to speak of after January, 1881. When my mother or other members of her family went to see her, she would sometimes act all right, and sometimes she would sit and have hardly anything to say. She seldom visited our house; she never visited her other relatives at all; had two brothers here whom she didn't visit. At times she was very friendly with Ned [Johnson, the residuary legatee], and at times unfriendly. Sometimes she would be cross, and then very fine. She often said she could not afford this and that; she didn't have enough nourishing food in the circumstances she was in; would say she could not afford it. I never spoke to Ned in relation to my aunt's want of nourishing food. My grandmother's mind has been affected eight or nine years. One of my un-cles has shown peculiarities like those of Mrs. Redfield.' Mrs. Bruce, also a daughter of Mrs. Simmons, testified that on one occasion Mrs. Redfield said to her, 'Well, your mother has got just as much money and more than I have; she has a right to take care of grandmother,' meaning the contestant; that she, the witness, replied, 'You know you are not telling the truth; you know you have more money than ma, and can afford to take care of grandmother;' that in fact Mrs. Simmons was poor,—'just had the house we lived in.' That she saw testatrix during her last illness. Thought she looked like an imbecile. She said she was getting ready to go to the country, and had a quantity of clothing bought which she never used. Before her last sickness she would not allow gas to be burned in the house; it cost too much. 'When sleeping there we were obliged to go to our rooms with candles.' The majority of the inside rooms were kept locked, she giving as a reason that she did not want the servant girl going in when she was not there. Was easily enraged; would storm about trifles. Joseph Bowden, brother of the deceased, testified: That in his opinion she had not been of sound mind for the last 30 years. That their mother was twice confined in an insane asylum about the years 1842–43. That his father had told him that his mother's father became insane. That a sister of deceased, Johnson's mother, died while insane and confined in the asylum at Napa. That deceased thought a certain physician who was going around the neighborhood a good deal was trying to get hold of her property, when he was merely courting a girl whom he afterwards married. That his nieces got up a surprise party for Mrs. Redfield, and this made her angry. Said she didn't want anybody to come there; they destroyed her carpets and the paper on the wall; said she was sorry she had discharged a kitchen girl for playing on the piano in her absence; imagined everybody was interested in her affairs for the purpose of taking advantage of her; never had any company; often complained about having to keep Johnson when he was a small boy; complained of the expense and trouble of keeping her mother when the latter had had a fit of aberration of mind; had said she knew everybody was trying to get the best of her. She was married in 1870. On the first New Year's day after her marriage her husband prepared to receive visitors. He went out, and then she went to her father's house and stayed all day, and left the Chinaman to entertain the callers. Mrs. Clark, another daughter of Mrs. Simmons, testified: That she slept with her aunt from 1881 to 1886, because she said she didn't like to sleep alone after her husband's death. Judged her to have been of unsound mind during last two or three years of her life. At times she had hardly proper clothing Was afraid of her neighbors, especially one or two of them. In August before her death she refused to buy a glass of jelly at 50 cents, saying she was not able to pay it. When spoken to about her clothing she would say, 'Probably next month I will have more money to get it.' She suffered from asthma. A Mrs. Russell testified: That she had been much at Mrs. Redfield's house, —with her nieces, it appears. Thought she was the most peculiar person she ever met; thinks she could not have been of sound mind. 'She would make you take off your shoes to go upstairs, for fear of wearing out the carpet. Have known her to sleep in the library very often, on a cot, and in all the rooms in the house. She gave as the reason for going around she could not sleep.' There was other testimony for contestant cumulative of much of that above detailed, but nothing adding materially to its effect. Several physicians testified, upon hypothetical questions put to them, that they considered the subject of the interrogatories to be of unsound mind.

"On the other hand, we observe first the method with which deceased set about making the will. Said Nellie Simmons, testifying for contestant, stated: 'A little after the 1st of September I knew my aunt contemplated making a will. She said to me if she knew she was going to die she wanted to put her affairs in shape. She wanted me to ask the doctor first.' She did ask the doctor, and reported to her on September 12th that her illness was probably fatal. Mrs. Redfield at once sent for Capt. Hall. It further appears, without conflict, that when Hall came she told him she desired to make a will, and dictated to him notes of the same, of which he made memoranda for the information of an attorney. She said that she wanted to make Johnson 'her heir,' and wanted him to take the name of Redfield. She then gave him from memory the names of the other persons she desired to make legatees, and stated the amounts she wished to give them, respectively. Stated she was not on good terms with two of her brothers, and, as reason for not giving more to a third, that she did not know whether he was divorced. The will was prepared from these memoranda by Mr. Warren Olney, an attorney at law. When the first draft was presented to her she caused some alterations to be made, increasing the legacy to Nellie Simmons from $1,000 to $2,000, and changing it in some other particulars. It was finally executed at her house on the afternoon of September 14th, Mr. Olney and one Samuel Foster being the subscribing witnesses. The testimony of both of them on the trial was that she seemed to be perfectly sane, and that they so considered her. The former, a lawyer of many years' standing, testified: 'She did not look to me as if she were going to die very soon, and she talked with perfect intelligence. She took the will and commenced to read, and then spoke to me and said: "It is not necessary for me to read it aloud, is it?" I said, "Certainly not." She read it through carefully. I asked her if that was in accordance with her wishes. She said it was. * * * That is the only time that I ever saw her, * * * I paid particular attention to Mrs. Redfield at that time. I knew she was sick, and I wanted to be satisfied that this will was not to be executed under any improper circumstances.' Miss Simmons and her sister, who were with their aunt on that day, say that sometimes she seemed rational and sometimes not. Two days before, she gave to Mrs. Simmons her diamonds, watch and chain, ring, and pin. Throughout the affair of the preparation and execution of the will we find no evidence of word or act on the part of the testatrix indicative of a deranged mind.

"But it is contended that her mind was affected with 'general' or 'settled' insanity, and hence, presumptively, it was unsound when she made the will. Opinions of witnesses aside, there are several broad facts which do not consist well with that view. She had been administratrix of her husband's estate. The property he left to her increased under her charge from a valuation of some $35,000 to about double that amount. So far as shown, no one asserted her to be insane while she was yet alive. She had the care of her aged and imbecile mother, apparently without protest that she was incompetent for that purpose from any of those who now testify their opinion that she was insane. She kept with her own hand regular accounts of her disbursements and various other transactions for a series of years commencing in 1885 and ending but a few months before her death. These fill several hundred pages of the printed transcript in the case. No doubt she was penurious; yet her brother, who was poor, and who testified his belief that she was of unsound mind, assigning her shortsighted economy among the reasons, had nevertheless occupied one of her houses free of rent for seven years before her death. We note also in her said accounts that she was accustomed to make cash gifts varying from $2.50 to $20 at each Christmas season to several young relatives, and that those to Johnson usually greatly exceeded any of the others; tending to show that her disposition to favor him especially did not arise as a sudden caprice when the will was made. The executor and others who knew her well gave testimony of their belief that she was sane, and the grounds thereof; and most of her eccentricities of conduct, apparent in the summary we have given, take a quite rational coloring from other evidence in the case. But without entering into a consideration of this, and allowing that to support the verdict the whole evidence must be viewed in the phase least favorable to her sanity, it tends to show that she exhibited peculiarities of mind in the following particulars: (1) Parsimony; (2) aversion to society; (3) irritability; (4) unfounded fancies,—delusions. As to the first three traits, we do not understand contestant to maintain that they have greater effect in the case than to accentuate the inference of unsoundness founded on other circumstances. It is commonly held that, aside from those cases of dementia where the patient has not mental power to form any conceptions, whether true or false, of the relations of things, the true test of insanity is mental delusion; that if a person persistently believes supposed facts which have no real existence, and against all evidence and probability conducts himself upon the assumption of their existence, he is as to that belief under a morbid delusion, and delusion in that sense is insanity. Society v. Hopper, 33 N. Y. 624. But before a will can be rejected on that account it must appear that 'its dispository provisions were or might have been caused or affected by the delusion.' Id. 625. Delusions which are not operative in the testamentary act—do not relate to the persons or objects affected by it—are not permitted to invalidate it. Now, in the present instance the illusions of the testatrix had no relation to any person or object affected by the will. That she falsely imagined herself to have made preparations for a journey, or that she could get no fire or heat in any of her rooms, or that her carpets or walls would be marred by slight usage, or that her neighbors were prying into her affairs, or that the doctor paying court to a young woman of the vicinity had designs upon her property, or all of these together, fall short of showing that she was under any delusion respecting her relations with her mother or other kindred, or respecting her property or the distribution of it provided by the will. Thus, for example, where a testator imagined that but one-half of his body was alive, that he breathed with one lung only, and that but one-half of his heart performed its functions, etc., dosed himself in a most extraordinary manner, and finally committed suicide, the provisions of his will being unaffected by the delusion, it was upheld. Hollinger v. Syms, 37 N. J. Eq. 221. Cf. Field v. Shorb, 99 Cal. 661, 34 Pac. 504; In re Spencer, 96 Cal. 448, 31 Pac. 453; Banks v. Goodfellow, L. R. 5 Q. B. 549; Rice v. Rice, 53 Mich. 432, 19 N. W. 132; Society v. Hopper, 33 N. Y. 619; Thompson v. Kyner, 65 Pa. St. 378; In re Vedder, 6 Dem. Sur. 92, and numerous cases there cited. In the Vedder Case some of the reported extravagances in speech and act of the testatrix make those of Mrs. Redfield seem scarcely irregular in comparison; yet the will was admitted to probate.

"Counsel say, however, that 'this will was made under two false impressions which went to the very root of its provisions: that her sister was wealthy, and that she herself was poor.' The chief support for this contention, apart from the penurious habits of the testatrix, seems to be her single remark, related by Mrs. Bruce, daughter of the sister referred to

'Well, your mother has got just as much money and more than I have; she has a right to take care of grandmother.' But the whole case is inconsistent with the existence of any such fixed belief in the mind of the deceased. That such an opinion shall amount to an insane delusion, it must be a real belief,—not simulated,—and must be persistent, not a fleeting vagary. The facts are that the grandmother lived with Mrs. Redfield, and had no support from any other quarter, so far as appears. By the terms of the will testatrix gave her sister $3,000, and her mother $80 per month during her life, directing the retention of sufficient property in the hands of the executor as trustee to produce that amount. This, allowing for a return of 6 per cent., would require $16,000. Other legacies amounted to near $10,000. After these came the provision for Johnson, whom she designed to 'make her heir.' In view of death, she gave to her sister her diamonds, watch and chain, ring, and pin. Within a year preceding she had fixed a price at which she authorized the sale of certain real property at above $26,000. Obviously, we think, she was not insensible of the amount of her property, however close she may have been in its expenditure, nor of the claims of her sister upon her bounty. Besides, the reply made by the witness to the remark of Mrs. Redfield quoted above indicates that her statement was not considered expressive of any rooted conviction: 'You know you are not telling the truth,' etc. Moreover, it is clear, even if the testatrix had the insane delusion that her sister was rich, that this would be ground for rejecting the will. The sister is not an heir, and in contemplation of law would receive no benefit from the intestacy of deceased; and it has been held that a court will not refuse probate to a will 'unless by so doing the person concerning whom the delusion existed will be benefited.' Stackhouse v. Horton, 15 N. J. Eq. 202.

"We do not overlook the circumstance that there was a disposition towards insanity in the family of the deceased. But not all, nor a majority, of its members were of unsound mind. It cannot be assumed that she inherited the insane and not the sane tendencies of her family. Her mother's aberration seems to have recurred only at long intervals. Besides, there is no evidence that any of her insane relations were affected as she was. Much of the expert testimony related to the supposed 'phthisical insanity' of the deceased, but it did not appear that any other of her family had phthisis. It was in evidence for contestant that a brother of deceased had exhibited peculiarities similar to hers; yet it appears that he testified at the trial, and we find no charge that he was insane. Altogether, the evidence of the effect of heredity is so inconclusive as to add very little to the case made by contestant. Busw. Insan. §§ 235, 236, and cases cited.

"As to the testimony of medical experts, the following remarks of the prerogative court of New Jersey seem judicious: 'The abstract opinion of any witness, medical or of any other profession, is not of any importance. No judicial tribunal would be justified in deciding against the capacity of a testator upon the mere opinion of witnesses, however numerous or respectable. A man may be of unsound mind, and his whole neighborhood may declare him so; but whether that unsoundness amounts to incapacity for a discharge of the important duty of making a final disposal of his property is a question which the court must determine upon its own responsibility. It * * * is to be ascertained by the court by the application of certain rules of law, in the exercise of a sound discretion regulated by these rules. The opinion of a witness must be brought to the test of facts, that the court may judge what estimate the opinion is entitled to. It is proper and legal to ask a witness his opinion as to the mental capacity of the individual to discharge the duty in question. The court will judge of * * * the proper weight to be given to his opinion from the facts and circumstances upon which he founds his opinion.' Stackhouse v. Horton, 15 N. J. Eq. 208. It was the province and duty of the jury to draw the inference of fact from the evidence before them, regulated by the rules of law stated to them by the court; being assisted but not superseded in that function by the opinions of experts. It is equally the duty of the court to determine whether there is any satisfactory evidence to justify the conclusion they reached. We find none, and therefore recommend that the order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

PEOPLE v. AH NOON et al. (Cr. 246.)

CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL.

Refusal of a new trial on newly-discovered evidence that would serve the purpose only of impeaching a witness will not be disturbed, except on a very exceptional showing.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Ah Noon and others appeal from a conviction of robbery and denial of new trial. Affirmed.

Graves & Graves and Venable & Goodchild, for appellants. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and Chas. H. Jackson, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendants have been convicted of the crime of robbery, and appeal from a judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial. A new trial is claimed upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence. This purported evidence, as shown by affidavits, consists of statements made by the prosecuting witness to various Chinese after the alleged robbery. These statements are to the effect that he (the prosecuting witness) had not been robbed by defendants. Upon a second trial of the case such evidence would only be admissible as tending to impeach the testimony of the witness as to the facts of the robbery. It is not possible that it could be material and relevant for any other purpose. It would have to be a very exceptional showing that would move this court to order a new trial upon newly-discovered evidence which would only serve the purpose of impeaching a witness, and the showing here made is not such a one. Taking into consideration the counter affidavits introduced upon the hearing of the motion, the showing made is not only very unsatisfactory, but inherently weak, and in no sense such as to demand a new trial of the case. Various exceptions were taken to the rulings of the court as to the admission and rejection of certain evidence, but upon consideration of those exceptions we find nothing demanding a reversal of the judgment or a new trial. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BOYLE. (Cr. 235.)

Sodomy—What is not.

The crime of sodomy is not committed where the act is in a child's mouth.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; Wheaton A. Gray, Judge.

Edward Boyle was convicted of a crime, and appeals. Reversed.

J. H. Boyer, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and Chas. H. Jackson, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted of a felony, technically designated in the information as an assault with intent to commit the infamous crime against nature. He appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. The facts of the case do not make out the offense of which the defendant has been convicted. It has been so held in at least two cases. See Prindle v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 21 S. W. 360; 1 Whart. Cr. Law, § 575. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded.

WESTBAY v. GRAY et al. (Sac. 198.)

Pleading — Sufficiency of Denial —Adjudication—Dismissal of Action—Collateral Attack—Estoppel—Waiver in Pleading.

1. Where a complaint in an action to foreclose a mortgage alleged that no part of the sum secured had been paid, except certain interest and a further sum set out, an answer by which defendants "deny that no part of the principal sum mentioned in said promissory note has been paid, and deny that the whole of said principal and interest has not been paid," is insufficient to require proof of nonpayment by plaintiff.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, providing that an action may be dismissed by plaintiff at any time before trial, on payment of costs, where a case has been tried and submitted to the court but the order of submission has been set aside and leave given to amend the pleadings, the court may, on application of plaintiff, enter a judgment of dismissal without prejudice, and such judgment will not bar a new action.

3. A judgment of dismissal cannot be attacked collaterally.

4. The fact that a plaintiff alleged the presentation of the claim sued on to the administrator of the debtor, but failed to sustain the allegation by proof, and dismissed his action, does not estop him to thereafter properly present the claim for allowance.

5. The waiver, in a complaint against an administrator to foreclose a mortgage, of any recourse against the estate for deficiency, is only effectual in that action, and, on a dismissal, is no longer binding on the plaintiff.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Merced county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

Action by W. W. Westbay against W. W. Gray, administrator of the estate of W. C. Turner, deceased, and others, for the foreclosure of a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

James F. Peck, for appellants. F. H. Gould and T. C. Law, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. Action to foreclose a mortgage executed by W. C. Turner, deceased, to secure his promissory note for $500 and interest, dated March 5, 1890. W. W. Gray is the administrator of the estate of Turner, and the other defendants are his heirs, and no personal judgment was asked or had against them. The note and mortgage were given to E. J. McKain, and by him indorsed and assigned to W. W. Westbay, the plaintiff herein. The cause was tried by the court, and a decree entered foreclosing the mortgage. Defendant W. W. Gray, the administrator of the estate of W. C. Turner, deceased, appeals from the decree, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The first point made by appellant for reversal is that no evidence was introduced at the trial to show that the promissory note, the payment of which the mortgage was given to secure, had not been paid. The sworn complaint averred "that no part of the principal sum or interest mentioned in said promissory note has been paid, save and except the sum of $30 interest paid thereon November 18, 1890, and the sum of $30 interest paid thereon April 27, 1891, and the sum of $97.50 paid on October 6, 1893." The only denials of the allegations of nonpayment in the answer are as follows: "And deny that no part of the principal sum mentioned in said promissory note has been paid, and deny that the whole of said principal and interest has not been paid." Manifestly, this is not a sufficient denial of the allegations of the complaint to call for proof on the part of plaintiff. If some of the principal of the note was paid, defendant could truthfully swear to the denials of his answer. The complaint avers that two certain sums of $30 each, as interest, were paid. It then avers that $97.50 was paid, but does not aver, as in the case of the other payments, that it was on account of interest. The fair inference is—judging from the language used—that the last-named sum was paid on account of principal. The denial might truthfully have been made in its present form if any portion of the principal sum, however small, had been paid. Again, the denial "that the whole of said principal sum and interest has not been paid" is bad. More v. Del Valle, 28 Cal. 170; Doll v. Good, 38 Cal. 287; Hook v. White, 36 Cal. 299; Fish v. Redington, 31 Cal. 185. The denials of nonpayment are evasive, and as was said in Marsters v. Lash, 61 Cal. 622, are no denials at all, within the purview of the Code of Civil Procedure. These remarks apply to both the attempted denials of nonpayment. It follows that the contention of appellants cannot be upheld.

2. To the correct understanding of the other points made by learned counsel for appellants a brief history of the case and of certain antecedent transactions is essential. This action was brought February 6, 1895, and, as hereinbefore stated, is to foreclose a mortgage. The complaint avers the presentation of the note and mortgage on January 5, 1895, to W. W. Gray, the administrator of the mortgagor, for allowance, and his failure for 10 days to allow or reject the same. In other respects the complaint is in the usual form. The answer, in addition to its denials, sets up two defenses to the action: (1) That plaintiff had commenced a prior action for the same cause on, to wit, May 7, 1894, which action on the 2d day of January, 1895, after the trial thereof, on motion of plaintiff, was by the court dismissed; that said judgment of dismissal has not been modified or set aside, and is now in full force and effect. (2) That plaintiff's cause of action herein is barred by the provisions of section 1498 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and by section 1493 of the same Code. The court found against both these defenses, and that all the allegations of the complaint were true. The propriety of the findings against the defenses of defendant is the question for consideration. The evidence in favor of these defenses tended to show that on the 17th day of May, 1894, the plaintiff herein filed a complaint in the superior court in and for the county of Merced against the defendant, administrator herein, to recover judgment upon the same cause of action set out in this action. The plaintiff in his sworn complaint averred that his claim had been duly presented to the administrator on or about May 1, 1894, and a copy of the claim was attached to the complaint as an exhibit, and made a part thereof. It was further averred that more than 10 days had elapsed since the claim was presented, and, as plaintiff was informed and believed, the administrator had neglected to indorse either his allowance or rejection of the claim thereon. The answer of the administrator denied that the claim was ever presented to him. This answer was sworn to by defendant W. W. Gray, administrator. The only other evidence on this subject is that given by said Gray, wherein, after speaking of the presenting of the claim January 5, 1895, and upon being asked if a claim on the same note and mortgage had been previously presented to him, he answered: "No; I think I got the claim, I think some time in May last year." The evidence showed further that such first cause was brought to trial, and, after being submitted to the court, plaintiff moved, upon notice, for leave to amend his complaint so as to conform to the facts as proven. Upon a hearing the court set aside the order of submission, and granted plaintiff leave to file an amended complaint within five days, with leave to defendants to answer thereto in 10 days after notice thereof. Plaintiff filed his amended complaint, in which he omitted all averment of presentation of his claim to the administrator, waived all claim for attorneys' fees, and all recourse against any property of the estate except the mortgaged premises. Thereafter, and on the 2d day of January, 1895, the court, on motion of plaintiff, entered a judgment of dismissal of the action, in the following words: "W. W. Westbay vs. W. W. Gray, Administrator of the Estate of W. C. Turner, Deceased, et al. The plaintiff having dismissed this said action, judgment of dismissal thereof is hereby entered, without prejudice to the commencement of another action. [Signed] J. G. Elliott, Clerk." We may add that thereafter, and in due time, plaintiff presented his claim to the administrator, who failed for 10 days to allow the same, whereupon this action was brought, in which plaintiff seeks to hold the estate for any deficiency that may remain after exhausting the mortgaged property, and to recover an attorney's fee, as provided in the mortgage, etc. Upon the findings and this evidence, appellant claims in favor of reversal: (1) The dismissal of the first action after trial and submission to the court for decision is a bar to the present action. (2) That the commencement of the first action was an election by plaintiff that the administrator had rejected the claim presented, and that, having made such election, plaintiff cannot disregard it and present his claim anew, and institute a second suit. (3) That having amended his complaint in the first action, waiving recourse against the estate except as to the mortgaged property, plaintiff cannot afterwards dismiss his suit, present his claim, and bring another action seeking foreclosure and a deficiency judgment. (4) That the second action was not brought within the time provided by section

(1) Was the dismissal of the first action a bar to the present one? It was not a judgment on the merits, and, if a bar to the case in hand, it must be because it was, in effect, a retraxit. A retraxit occurred at common law when a plaintiff came into court in person, and voluntarily renounced his suit or cause of action; and when this was done, and a judgment was entered in favor of defendant, the plaintiff's cause of action was forever gone. 3 Bl. Comm. 296. Under our laws this authority will be deemed to have been conferred upon the attorney of record in a cause. Board of Com'rs v. Younger, 29 Cal. 147; Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 542. In the case last cited the former cause had been, by agreement of the parties, dismissed, the judgment reading as follows: "By agreement it is ordered by the court that the cause be dismissed, each party paying his own costs." In upholding this judgment as a retraxit and bar to a subsequent action, the court, speaking by Wallace, C. J., said: "We are not to be understood as holding that a mere dismissal of an action by the plaintiff under the statute, and without any agreement upon his part to do so, is to be held to constitute a bar to its renewal, nor that a judgment of nonsuit, even entered by consent, would have that effect, but only that a judgment of dismissal, when based upon, and entered in pursuance of, the agreement of the parties, must be understood, in the absence of anything to the contrary expressed in the agreement and contained in the judgment itself, to amount to such an adjustment of the merits of the controversy by the parties themselves, through the judgment of the court, as will constitute a defense to another action afterwards brought upon the same cause of action." Crossman v. Davis, 79 Cal. 603, 21 Pac. 963, is to like effect. The case at bar is differentiated from Merritt v. Campbell in that here there was no agreement between the parties for an adjustment and dismissal of the action, and the judgment, as entered by the court, contained the express proviso that the judgment of dismissal was "entered without prejudice to the commencement of another action." Subdivision 1 of section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an action may be dismissed, or a judgment of nonsuit entered, "(1) by the plaintiff himself at any time before trial, upon payment of costs," etc. In Ditch Co. v. Bradford, 13 Cal. 637, in construing a like expression in our former practice act, the court said, "By 'trial,' here, is meant the determination or finding in the case." In Brown v. Harter, 18 Cal. 76, it was held that plaintiff had not an absolute right to take a nonsuit after the case had been finally submitted and the jury had retired, but that he might do so at any time before such submission and retirement. In Heinlin v. Castro, 22 Cal. 100, it was held that after a cause had been tried and submitted to the court, and was held under advisement, the plaintiff had no right to dismiss, and the court had no authority to dismiss. In the case at bar the action had been tried and submitted, but the order of submission had been set aside, and leave given to amend the pleadings. It stood, therefore, as though no submission had ever been had. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff had a right to apply for, and the court had a right to grant, the dismissal. Again, if the dismissal was improper, defendants' remedy was by appeal from the judgment, and not by a collateral attack upon the judgment. Higgins v. Mahoney, 50 Cal. 444. The claim of appellant that the judgment of dismissal was entered by the clerk without authority of the court does not find warrant in the record. The clerk testified that a book handed him was a judgment book of the superior court of Merced county, "in which was entered the judgment of said court," etc. The judgment was then offered and admitted in evidence. The doctrine that a dismissal, in the cases provided for by our Code, does not operate to bar another action for the same cause, has ample support in the decisions. Davenport v. Turpin, 43 Cal. 597; Parks v. Dunlap, 86 Cal. 189, 25 Pac. 916; Rosenthal v. McMann, 93 Cal. 505, 29 Pac. 121.

(2) Was the plaintiff concluded by bringing an action in which he averred the presentation of his claim to the administrator for allowance from presenting it thereafter, and bringing a suit thereon? The law does not go to the romantic length of holding a pleader bound beyond the power of remedy for every mistake made in pleading. To do so would annul all statutes enacted and rules adopted to obviate the effect of such mistakes. In the present case the pleader in the former action averred the presentation of plaintiff's claim to the administrator. His complaint was verified. The verified answer of the administrator denied that it was presented to him. At the trial of that case, it is apparent from the record that plaintiff failed to prove the presentation of the claim; and the court in this case, upon testimony quite sufficient to authorize it in so doing, found that such claim was not presented to the administrator prior to the first suit. If a party makes an attempt to present a claim to an administrator for allowance, but from some cause fails to properly do so, it is not perceived upon what principle he is estopped from again presenting it in due form, if within proper time.

(3) The waiver in the amended complaint in the first action of all recourse against the estate, except as to the mortgaged premises, was only effectual in that action, and when the action was dismissed it ceased to have any efficacy or binding force. To illustrate: An appearance and answer operates as a waiver of service of summons, but it would hardly be contended that upon a dismissal of the cause, and institution of another action for the same cause, the waiver in the first action excused service of summons in the second.

The fourth point made for reversal does not call for extended comment. It is based upon section 1496, Code Civ. Proc., which provides that when a claim is rejected by the executor, administrator, or judge of the superior court, the holder must bring suit in the proper court against the administrator, etc., within three months after its rejection, or it shall be barred. The objection is based upon the allegation of presentation contained in the complaint in the first suit, but, as the court found no such presentation was made, the statute did not begin to run until the presentation of the claim made a few days before this action was brought. We recommend that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PEOPLE v. ARNOLD. (Cr. 234.)

ASSAULT—EVIDENCE—IMPEACHING DEFENDANT—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Evidence that defendant was informed that his wife was running with other men for illicit purposes, and merely surmised that she was leaving home for some such purpose when he intercepted her, and, on her refusal to turn back, assaulted her, was inadmissible to show want of malice, there being no claim that he was acting under the influence of passion aroused by any recent information of his wife's infidelity.

2. The purpose of Pen. Code, § 1093, providing that when defendant has confessed a prior conviction, the clerk, in reading the indictment, shall omit all that relates to such prior conviction, is not violated by asking defendant on cross-examination, if he has ever been convicted of a felony; his privilege to have such fact withheld from the jury being waived by offering himself as a witness.

3. On a trial for assault with intent to kill, the court instructed that defendant might be convicted of the lesser offense of assault with a deadly weapon, but omitted to state that simple assault was also included in the offense charged. Held no error, in the absence of a request for such instruction.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; R. F. Crawford, Judge.

Bill Arnold was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and from the judgment and an order denying a new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

Barham & Miller, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and Chas. H. Jackson, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

VAN FLEET, J. Defendant was charged with assault with intent to murder, and was convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying him a new trial.

1. The person upon whom the assault was committed was one Clara, an Indian woman, who was at the time living with defendant as his wife. It appeared by the evidence of the prosecution that the parties were encamped near the town of Cloverdale. Clara and one Lena Pete, another Indian woman, started from camp on their horses to go to the town. Defendant objected to Clara's going, and, upon her insisting, he dragged her from her horse, struck her on the head with a rock, knocking her down, and rendering her insensible, and cut her on the scalp with a knife. Defendant desired to show in his defense that the occasion or provocation of the assault was that he had been informed that his wife was running with other men for immoral and illicit purposes, and that he supposed she was leaving the camp for some such purpose when he stopped her. The court very properly refused to admit such evidence. It was wholly immaterial, since it would not, if true, have justified the assault.

Defendant contends that: "If he had knowledge of acts of infidelity upon the part of his wife, recently communicated to him, and the further information that she was then about to go away in company with the witness Lena for the purpose of assignation, that she intended to meet for the purposes of illicit intercourse other men, and that such knowledge of her intentions formed the grounds of defendant's objections to her going, then such evidence was proper to go to the jury to show the animus with which the assault was made, and would have had a tendency to eliminate from the case the malicious and premeditated intent which the law presumes to flow from the commission of an unlawful act, even though it had not gone to the extent of justifying his interference." In other words, that it was proper for the purpose of showing an absence of malice and premeditated design, if not a defense to the assault. But defendant did not offer to show either that he had knowledge that his wife was in fact leaving the camp at the time for any such purpose, or that he had been so informed; but simply that he had been informed (he did not offer to show when) that she had been guilty of such conduct before, and, in effect, that he did not wish her to have the opportunity to do so again. While "the sight of adultery committed by his wife" may be, as suggested by Mr. Rice (3 Rice, Ev. § 475), provocation to the husband which will justify that "heat of passion" which is sufficient to reduce murder to manslaughter, the knowledge of such fact must be based upon something more tangible than mere surmise, and the knowledge must be so recent as to preclude the idea of cooling time or premeditation. It was not claimed or pretended that defendant could show that he was acting under the influence of passion aroused by any recent information of his wife's infidelity. His own testimony showed that he had been aware for some 18 months that she "was running with every Tom, Dick, and Harry" for such purposes, and yet had continued to live with her. Moreover, the evidence sought was in substantial effect all placed before the jury, and would seem to have produced the only effect for which it is contended such evidence was admissible, since the verdict was for a grade of offense lower than that charged, and of which malice is not an essential ingredient. Pen. Code, § 245; People v. Urias, 12 Cal. 325.

2. The information charged a prior conviction of a felony, and, defendant having at his arraignment confessed the same, no reference thereto was made by the clerk in reading the information and stating the plea to the jury. The defendant, however, took the witness stand in his own behalf, and gave his version of the circumstances of the assault. In cross-examination the prosecution was permitted, against defendant's objection, to ask him if he had not previously been convicted of a felony; and it is urged that the effect of this was to defeat the purpose of section 1093 of the Penal Code, which in prescribing the conduct of the trial provides that, when the defendant has confessed a prior conviction therein, the clerk, in reading the indictment or information, "shall omit therefrom all that relates to such previous conviction." The obvious purpose of this section was to give the defendant the benefit of withholding from the jury a knowledge of such prior conviction in all instances other than where, by the conduct of his own case, the production of such fact is rendered essential to a proper presentation of the case of the people. It was not designed thereby to change or affect the ordinary rules of evidence for the elucidation of truth, to which a defendant, like any other witness, subjects himself upon taking the witness stand. Under the rule established in this state, the defendant's character for truth, honesty, and integrity is in issue when he offers himself as a witness, and he thereupon becomes, as held in People v. Hickman, 113 Cal. 80, 86, 45 Pac. 175, 176, "subject to the same rules for testing his credibility before the jury by impeachment or otherwise as any other witness." One of the authorized methods of impeachment prescribed by the Code is "that it may be shown by the examination of the witness or the record of the judgment that he has been convicted of a felony." Code Civ. Proc. § 2051. Section 1093 did not protect defendant from the operation of this rule. He must be deemed to have waived the privilege given by that section upon becoming a witness. See People v. Chin Mook Sow, 51 Cal. 597; People v. Meyer, 75 Cal. 383, 17 Pac. 431. The cases of People v. Wheatley, 88 Cal. 117, 26 Pac. 95, People v. Sansome, 84 Cal. 449, 24 Pac. 143, and People v. Thomas, 110 Cal. 42, 42 Pac. 456, cited by appellant, all present instances where the defendant's privilege to have the fact of prior conviction withheld from the jury was violated without any act on his part waiving such right.

3. The court instructed the jury that they could convict defendant of the offense charged, or of the lesser offense of assault with a deadly weapon, but omitted telling them that included in the charge was also the offense of simple assault, and no request for such instruction was made. It is urged that such omission was virtually telling the jury that they could not convict of simple assault, and that this was error. It is doubtful if there was any evidence in the case to which such an instruction would have been pertinent. It is true that the defendant denied using a knife or a rock, and testified that the instrument used was a "stick," the dimensions of which were not given; but he admitted that he hit the woman on the head, and that the blow knocked her down, and he did not pretend to deny the fact shown by the prosecution that she was rendered unconscious thereby. It might well be assumed, in the absence of anything showing the contrary, that a stick or club which would administer such a blow was a deadly weapon, and, if it was such, the omitted matter was not pertinent. But, however that may be, if defendant deemed such instruction pertinent or material, he should have requested it. The failure to give it, in the absence of such request, has been repeatedly held not error. People v. Franklin, 70 Cal. 641, 11 Pac. 797; People v. Scott, 93 Cal. 516, 29 Pac. 123; People v. Guidice, 73 Cal. 226, 15 Pac. 44. We discover no error in the giving or refusing of instructions. The judgment and order are affirmed.

BARNES v. GLIDE et al. (Sac. 236.)[1]

MANDAMUS—LIMITATIONS—RUNNING OF STATUTE.

1. Code Civ. Proc. pt. 2, § 343, providing that "an action for relief, not hereinbefore provided for, must be commenced within four years after the cause of action shall have accrued," applies to a mandamus proceeding, even if section 337, 338, or 339 does not apply thereto, under section 363 of the title, "Of the Time of Commencing Actions," providing that the word "action," as used in such title, is to be construed, wherever necessary, as including a special proceeding of a civil nature, and section 1109 of the title relating to writs of mandate, etc., providing that, except as otherwise provided, the provisions of part 2 (section 307 to section 1059) are applicable to proceedings mentioned in said title.

2. Limitations begin to run against a mandamus proceeding to compel the proper officers to levy a tax to pay warrants issued by a swamp-land district at the time a cause of action on the warrants accrues, and not at the time demand is made on the officers to levy the tax.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

Petition by Charles Barnes for a writ of mandate to swamp-land district No. 307, and J. C. Glide and others, trustees of such district, to compel defendants to levy a tax to pay certain warrants issued by said district, and held by plaintiff. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Albert M. Johnson and Wm. Gwynn, for appellant. Alvin J. Bruner, Devlin & Devlin, and McKune & George, for respondents. John T. Harrington, amicus curiæ.

McFARLAND, J. The plaintiff filed a petition or complaint in the superior court, in which he asked for a writ of mandate to be directed to the defendants, swamp-land district No. 307, and J. C. Glide, Francis T. Dwyer, and Joseph L. Monica, the present trustees of said district, commanding them "to proceed to have an assessment levied upon the lands in said district sufficient to pay, and for the purpose of paying," certain warrants described in the complaint. The defendants filed a demurrer to the complaint. The demurrer was both general and special, and it was sustained by the court below, and judgment rendered for defendants. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

The complaint contains quite a number of counts; but they are all alike, except that a different warrant is described in each count. The first count is a sample of them all. In that count it is averred that swamp-land district No. 307 was duly organized in September, 1877, and has ever since been an existing corporation; that the other defendants, Glide, Dwyer, and Monica, are now, and for more than six months last past have been, the duly-elected and acting trustees of said district; that on the 10th day of September, 1877, the said district, through its then board of trustees, issued to H. M. Hawley & Co. its certain warrant, numbered 23, upon the treasurer of Yolo county, in which county the district is situated, directing said treasurer to pay to said Hawley & Co., or order, "from the swamp-land fund in the treasury of said county to the credit of said district No. 307, the sum of $372.96"; that the said warrant was presented to the board of supervisors of said county, and was by them approved, and was thereafter presented to the treasurer of said county, and was by him on the 12th day of November, 1887, marked, "Not paid for want of funds," and registered; that since the issuance of said warrant there never has been in the treasury of said county, to the credit of said swamp-land district, or in the funds of said district, sufficient money with which to pay said warrant, or any interest thereof, and that there never has, during any of said time, been any money whatever in said treasury to the credit of said district, except only the sum of $380, which remained in the treasury for 14 days, and was paid out upon another warrant; that prior to the 1st day of November, 1895, the said Hawley & Co. assigned said warrant to plaintiff, who is now the owner and holder thereof; that on the 5th day of November, 1895, the plaintiff demanded in writing of defendants that they provide for the payment of said warrant; that the defendants failed and neglected to pay said warrant, or to provide for the payment thereof, or to comply with the demand aforesaid, and no part thereof has ever been paid, but the whole thereof "is due, owing, and unpaid from the said swamp-land district No. 307 unto this plaintiff." The prayer is that the defendants be required "to proceed to have an assessment levied upon the land in said district sufficient to pay, and for the purpose of paying, each and every warrant hereinbefore described, and all interest due thereon, and to collect all taxes thereon, and to pay all taxes and moneys so collected into the treasury of the county of Yolo," etc. There is also an averment, "upon information and belief," that the defendants have moneys in their hands belonging to said defendants, and a prayer that they pay the same into the treasury of said Yolo county; but as no point is made in the briefs as to this averment, and as it is evidently considered by the parties as unimportant, it is not necessary to consider it. The defendants, in their demurrer, set up the statute of limitations, and particularly sections 337, 338, 339, and 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure. They also pleaded by the demurrer that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and these two grounds of demurrer are the only ones discussed by counsel.

Counsel for respondents strenuously contend that the thing which plaintiff seeks to have defendants compelled to do is not a duty "which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from the office, trust, or station"; that the law does not specially enjoin the defendants to have an assessment levied upon the land in said district; and particularly that it is not their special duty to have such an assessment levied for the purpose of paying the warrants, or either of them, mentioned in the complaint. This and many other points are pressed by respondents under that part of their demurrer which asserts that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; but we do not consider it necessary to inquire particularly into these points, because, in our opinion, the proceeding is barred by the statute of limitation. A proceeding in mandamus between two private parties to enforce a money obligation, where there is no statutory provision giving it a different character, is generally considered as a mere action at law, in which case all ordinary rules of practice, including the statute of limitations, apply. In Com. v. Dennison, 24 How. 97, the supreme court of the United States say: "It is equally well settled that a mandamus, in modern practice, is nothing more than an action at law between the parties, and is not now regarded as a prerogative writ. It undoubtedly came into use by virtue of the prerogative power of the English crown, and was subject to regulations and rules which have long since been disused. But the right to the writ, and the power to issue it, have ceased to depend upon any prerogative power, and it is now regarded as an ordinary process, in cases to which it has application. It was so held by this court in the cases of Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet. 615; Kendall v. Stokes, 3 How. 100." In New York, before the adoption of the Code, and when there seemed to be no provision of the statute of limitations expressly applicable to proceedings in mandamus, the court held, in People v. Supervisors, 12 Barb. 446, that a proceeding in mandamus should, by analogy, be commenced within "the time given by the statute to obtain a remedy for injuries substantially of a similar character in the ordinary way, if that could be pursued"; and in People v. French, 12 Abb. N. C. 156, the court alluded to the former case of People v. Supervisors as founding the doctrine of limitation upon analogy, but said that "whether the proceeding then under review was to be considered as an action under section 3333 of the New York Code, or a special proceeding under section 3334 of that Code, the result would be the same, because by section 414 of the Code the rules of limitation were made applicable to special proceedings as well as civil actions." Our Code has substantially the same provisions as section 414 of the New York Code. Section 1109 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is a part of the title under which writs of mandate, certiorari, and prohibition are provided for, reads as follows: "Except as otherwise provided in this title, the provisions of part 2 [section 307 to section 1059] of this Code are applicable to and constitute the rules of practice in the proceedings mentioned in this title." And part 2, from said section 307 to said section 1059, includes the provisions of the Code upon the subject of the limitations of actions. Moreover, section 363 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is the closing section of the title "Of the Time of Commencing Actions," reads as follows: "The word 'action,' as used in this title, is to be construed, wherever it is necessary so to do as including a special proceeding of a civil nature." Therefore it is quite clear that not only under the general authorities, but under the provisions of our Code, a proceeding like the one at bar, in mandamus, is subject to the rules which govern the limitation of actions; and if the present proceeding is not subject to section 337, section 338, or section 339, it is certainly subject to the provisions of section 343, which declares that "an action for relief, not hereinbefore provided for, must be commenced within four years after the cause of action shall have accrued." The reason and philosophy upon which the statute of limitations is based apply here with full force. The warrant set up in the first count of the complaint was issued, presented, and payment thereon was refused, in November, 1877; and this present suit was not commenced until November, 1895, which was 18 years thereafter. The date of the latest warrant set up in the complaint is 1881,—more than 14 years before the commencement of the action. The present board of trustees, who are made defendants, do not appear to have occupied that position for a longer period than 6 months prior to the commencement of the suit. The warrants sued on were issued, if at all, by other trustees, who were in office from 15 to 18 years before this proceeding was instituted. They may have been issued illegally; the act of issuing them may have been ultra vires; they may not have been issued for any labor done in the construction of the works of the district; they may have been issued without consideration and fraudulently; they may be forgeries. And it is quite evident that the present defendants, after such a lapse of time, would be in no condition to make any of the defenses above indicated, when witnesses who knew of the facts at the time may be dead, or may have allowed the recollection of them to vanish from their memories. And the evident purpose of the statute of limitations is to prevent such a condition of affairs, and to preclude parties from disturbing that repose which is intended to be final after the lapse of certain periods of time designated in the statute itself. The position cannot be successfully maintained that no action could be commenced until a demand had been made by plaintiff upon the defendants to act. Whether such demand be necessary in a case like the present, it is not necessary to determine, for the demand itself was an act within the power of the plaintiff.

In Prescott v. Gonser, 34 Iowa, 179, the court say: "That the action of mandamus cannot be maintained until there has been a refusal to perform the official duty sought to be enforced, is true; but to hold that a plaintiff who has a right to demand performance at any time may delay such demand indefinitely would enable him to defeat the object and purpose of the statute. It is certainly not the policy of the law to permit a party against whom the statute runs to defeat its operation by neglecting to do an act which devolves upon him, in order to perfect his remedy against another. If this were so, a party would have it in his own power to defeat the purpose of the statute in all cases of this character. He could neglect to claim that to which he is entitled for even fifty years unaffected by the statute of limitations, thereby rendering it a dead letter. In such a construction of the statute we cannot concur." See, also, to the same effect, Baker v. Johnson Co., 33 Iowa, 151. If the facts stated in the complaint in the case at bar constitute a cause of action, they constitute a cause of action which accrued, and for which an action might have been instituted, from 14 to 18 years before the present complaint was filed. The statute of limitations is intended to embrace all causes of action not specially excepted from its operation, and there is no exception applicable to the present proceeding. Bates v. Gregory, 89 Cal. 387, 26 Pac. 891, was an application for a writ of mandate to compel the trustees of the city of Sacramento to do certain acts. The defendants therein set up the statute of limitations, and this court said: "A municipal corporation has the legal right to avail itself of the defense of the statute of limitations as fully as any other creditor. It is a privilege personal to the debtor, and whenever, in any legal proceeding, it is invoked by the debtor, the court is compelled to recognize it as a proper defense. This defense is pleaded in the present proceeding, and, as we have before shown, is sustained by the facts, and must therefore be held sufficient." Appellant relies greatly on Freehill v. Chamberlain, 65 Cal. 603, 4 Pac. 646, but that case is not pertinent to the case at bar. That case was simply mandamus to the treasurer of the city of Sacramento to compel him to pay the interest on certain bonds. Those bonds had been issued by the city under the act of April 24, 1858 (St. 1858, p. 280), which has frequently been held by this court to constitute an express contract between the city and the bondholders, by which the latter were prohibited from suing the city, and were to rely exclusively upon a certain special fund, distinct from the general fund and from all other funds of said city. The only remedy which the bondholders had was mandamus against the city treasurer to compel him to pay the interest on the bonds when there was money in the fund to which they could alone look under their special contract; and all that the court decided in Freehill v. Chamberlain was that no cause of action in mandamus against said treasurer had accrued until there was money in said fund, and that consequently the statute of limitations did not commence to run while there was no money in said fund with which the treasurer could pay said interest. It was not a proceeding which might have been commenced 15 years before it was instituted. The judgment is affirmed.

DAVIS v. RANDALL et al. (Sac. 177, 178.)

MORTGAGE—MERGER IN DEED—INTERVENING LIENS.

After defendant had declared a homestead in her husband's land, which he had previously mortgaged, the holder of the second mortgage purchased the fee, and thereafter took an assignment of the first mortgage to enable him to foreclose defendant's rights, neither mortgage being satisfied of record. Held, that the mortgages did not merge in the deed, so as to make them subject to the intervening homestead lien.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county; E. A. Bridgford, Judge.

Action by J. T. Davis, substituted for E. C. Vancil, the original plaintiff, against Nicholas W. Randall, Mary J. Randall, and others, to foreclose two mortgages. From a judgment holding said mortgages subject to the homestead right of defendant Mary J. Randall, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

H. M. Albery, for appellant. C. W. Eastin and Mr. Griffin, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. In August, 1893, there were pending in the superior court two certain actions, in each of which the appellant here (Davis) and the respondent Mary J. Randall were the main contestants. One of these actions was brought in the name of E. C. Vancil to foreclose two certain mortgages upon the premises described in the complaint,—one executed October 19, 1883, by the defendant Nicholas W. Randall, who was then the owner of the premises, to one A. Montgomery to secure a promissory note made by said Randall to said Montgomery for the sum of $9,000, with interest, and the other a mortgage upon said premises executed October 1, 1884, by said Randall to said E. C. Vancil to secure a promissory note made by said Randall to said Vancil for the sum of $5,000 and interest. The said mortgage to Montgomery had been assigned to said Vancil before the commencement of this suit, and during the pendency of the action the said Davis was substituted as plaintiff in place of said Vancil, upon a showing that said Vancil had assigned both of said mortgages to said Davis. In said action the said Nicholas W. Randall made default, but the said Mary J. Randall filed a lengthy answer, in which, after a general denial, she made a great many averments of matters in defense; but the only averment of the answer necessary just now to be noticed was that she held a homestead to the extent, in value, of $5,000, upon the mortgaged premises, which she claimed to be superior in right to the said mortgages. The court found and decreed that the said mortgages sought to be foreclosed were subordinate and subject to the said homestead right, and from the judgment the said Davis appeals. He also appeals from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Said appeal is numbered in this court 178, and is the one in which this opinion is written. The said other action then pending was a partition suit by the said Mary J. Randall, as plaintiff, against Nicholas W. Randall, J. T. Davis, and others, in which she averred that she held a homestead interest to the extent, in value, of $5,000, upon the premises described in said mortgages, and also an undivided interest in the rest of said premises, and that said Nicholas W. Randall was the owner of the undivided one-half interest of said premises not covered by said homestead. She prayed to have her homestead, to the value of $5,000, set apart to her out of the said premises, and also that she have awarded to her the undivided one-half of the rest of said land. To the complaint the said Nicholas W. Randall and J. T. Davis filed answers, in which they denied the plaintiff's homestead right, and set up that the said Davis was the sole owner of all of said premises. The court found in favor of the plaintiff, Mary J. Randall, as to her homestead right, and ordered that a homestead to the extent, in value, of $5,000, be set apart to her. Nothing seems to have been found or decreed as to her undivided interest in the rest of said premises. From this judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, the said Davis and the said Nicholas W. Randall appeal, which appeal is designated in this court as No. 177. On the 24th day of April, 1893, the said two actions above referred to were, by the consent and agreement of the respective parties, "consolidated and tried together, and upon the same evidence, said evidence to be introduced at the trial of this action [the foreclosure suit], and considered as if the same were offered and submitted on the trial of each of said actions separately, and that both the said actions may be submitted for decision and decided upon the said evidence." Thereafter the said two actions were tried and submitted together; the evidence being introduced in the case in which this present appeal, No. 178, is taken.

The appellant attacks a great many of the findings of the court, and the record shows some 70 different assignments of errors in rulings upon the admissibility of evidence; but, under our views of the case, many of the points made for reversal need not be noticed. The court finds that while the said Davis was pretending to act, in the various transactions brought before the court, as the agent of said E. C. Vancil, he was really acting for himself; that the note and mortgage purporting to have been given by Nicholas W. Randall to said E. C. Vancil were in fact given to the said Davis on his own account; that the purchase of the Montgomery mortgage was made really by Davis, and that Vancil had no interest in it, and that, in all the transactions, Davis, and not Vancil, was the real party in interest. But this finding, as well as many others attacked by appellant, are, in our opinion, unimportant. The main question in the case is whether or not the said mortgages were subject to the said homestead right of Mary J. Randall; and, if the court erred in finding that they were subordinate to said homestead right, then the judgments in both cases must be reversed, and the other findings become unimportant. And in our opinion the court below did so err.

Assuming, as the court found, that Mrs. Randall lived upon the land at the time she filed her homestead, and that it was in all respects a valid homestead, still her declaration of homestead was not made until the 20th day of July, 1886, and at and before said time the said two mortgages were valid and subsisting liens on said premises, prior and superior to any homestead right which Mrs. Randall could acquire thereto; and said mortgages at the time of the commencement of this suit were, and still are, subsisting liens, not affected by said homestead, unless they have been satisfied and ended as such liens. But there is no evidence warranting the court in finding that said liens have been paid and satisfied, except the naked fact that in September, 1886, about two months after the filing of said homestead, the said Nicholas W. Randall made a deed to said Davis, conveying the fee of said mortgaged premises to said Davis. The only ground upon which it could be held that said mortgages have been satisfied is that they were merged in said deed. But the case is not one to which the doctrine of merger can be applied. In Scrivner v. Dietz, 84 Cal. 298, 299, 24 Pac. 172, the principle that a merger will not be implied in a case like the one at bar is stated, with the authorities cited, as follows: "Merger is always a question of intent, when the question is as to whether a mortgage lien is merged in the fee, upon both being united in the same person. Jones, Mortg. §§ 848, 856, 857, 870, 872, 873. Equity will keep the legal title and the mortgagee's interest separate, although held by the same person, whenever necessary for the full protection of the person's just rights. Carpentier v. Brenham, 40 Cal. 221. If there is an intervening mortgage, the acquirement of the title will not operate as a merger. Brooks v. Rice, 56 Cal. 428. The same rule would apply as to an intervening attachment or other lien. The same rule as to merger is laid down in Rumpp v. Gerkens, 59 Cal. 496." In 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. par. 788, it is said: "If, from all the circumstances, a merger would be disadvantageous to the party, then his intention that it should not result will be presumed and maintained." Again the same author (paragraph 792) says: "If there is no expression of an intention at the time, then all the circumstances should be considered, in order to discover what is the best interest of the party. He will be presumed to have intended that the charge should be kept alive, or to merge, according to the benefit resulting from either." In the case at bar there is no evidence showing an intent upon the part of Davis that the mortgages should be merged in the deed. At the time he took the deed he was not the owner of the Montgomery mortgage. Indeed, the court finds that, when Davis bought the Montgomery mortgage, "instead of having Montgomery execute a satisfaction of said mortgage said Davis procured said Montgomery to make an assignment thereof, as herein found, for the purpose of placing said Davis in a position to foreclose the rights of said Mary J. Randall," and that "neither of said mortgages have been paid in any other manner or way than by the means and the manner herein found." Both Randall and Davis testified that the deed was given for about $3,000 additional indebtedness of Randall to Davis over and above the amount of said mortgages. Neither of the mortgages was satisfied of record, and both still remain recorded as valid and unpaid mortgages. There is no pretense that the mortgages given by Randall to Montgomery and to Vancil prior to the filing of the homestead claim were not just and valid liens upon the property, to the full amount stated upon their face. The court finds that "on the 19th day of October, 1883, the defendant Nicholas W. Randall was indebted to one A. Montgomery in the sum of $9,000, and, to secure the payment of the same," made and executed said note and mortgage. The court further finds that "on the 1st day of October, 1884, the defendant Nicholas W. Randall was indebted to the substituted plaintiff, J. T. Davis, in the sum of $5,000, and, to secure the payment of the same," gave a note and mortgage in the name of E. C. Vancil. There is no doubt, therefore, that those mortgages wer just liens upon the premises at the time the homestead was filed; and the respondent seeks to avoid them, not upon any equitable consideration, but solely upon the technical ground of merger. But, as we have seen, the doctrine of merger does not apply here, and equity will keep the liens alive for the purpose of doing justice.

Under the foregoing views, the judgment and order denying a new trial must be reversed, and it is unnecessary to inquire into the many other questions presented in the complicated record. Whether Davis, when taking a mortgage from Randall, which was in form to Vancil, and when purchasing and taking an assignment of the Montgomery mortgage, was acting for Vancil or for himself, seems to be an immaterial matter, and of no consequence to respondent. Any rights she has as against the one she has also as against the other. The objective and controlling question in the case is whether or not the prior liens of the mortgages were lost, as against the subsequent homestead, because they were merged in the deed afterwards executed by Randall to Davis. If, as we have above held, they were not, then the judgment was clearly erroneous. We cannot make findings for the court below; but it is apparent that if, at another trial, no different state of facts appears, there should be a decree foreclosing the mortgages as liens prior and superior to respondent's asserted homestead, and not subject or subordinate to said homestead. And for these reasons the judgment and order denying a new trial in the said partition suit (appeal 177), must also be reversed. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

PEOPLE v. CADY. (Cr. Sac. 212.)

HOMICIDE—DEPOSITIONS—BRIEFS.

The introduction of the testimony given at the preliminary examination by an absent witness for the prosecution in a homicide case is not inhibited by Const. art. 1, § 13, providing for the taking in defendant's presence of depositions in criminal cases other than of homicide, where there is reason to believe that the witness will not attend at the trial.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Shasta county; Edward Sweeny, Judge.

George D. Cady was convicted of manslaughter. A motion for a new trial was denied, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Clay W. Taylor and J. Chadbourne (H. E. Highton, of counsel), for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., W. H. Anderson, Dep. Atty. Gen., M. P. Rose, and A. M. McCoy, for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The defendant was charged in the information with the crime of murder, and was convicted of manslaughter. He appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. The main point made by appellant for a reversal is that the court erred in permitting the testimony of one Champion, taken at the preliminary examination, to be read in evidence by the prosecution; the contention being that such testimony cannot, under the constitution, be admitted under any circumstances. But this cause had been submitted upon oral argument and written briefs some time before the decision by this court of the case of People v. Sierp, 48 Pac. 88, and in the latter case the arguments presented upon this point in the case at bar were fully considered. In the Sierp Case the point as to the admissibility of testimony given at a preliminary examination was thoroughly considered, and determined adversely to the contention of the appellant in the present case. We adhere to the rule there declared. See People v. Sierp, supra.

2. Appellant contends that the verdict was unwarranted by the evidence, but an examination of the record clearly shows sufficient evidence to justify the jury in finding the appellant guilty of manslaughter. We do not deem it necessary to state the evidence here in detail.

3. Under the head of "Assignment of Errors," the appellant states 17 alleged errors of the court below in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence. These assignments of errors are little more than mere concise statements of conclusions that the court did err in its rulings, with but little, if anything, in the way of argument to show the correctness of the conclusions arrived at by appellant as to such rulings. All these "assignments" are answered quite fully in the brief of the attorney general; and in appellant's reply brief he merely says that "in reference to the seventeen assignments of error shortly discussed by the state, with the exception hereinafter mentioned, there is neither time nor opportunity for a reply, even if a reply be needed; but they are, and each of them is, implicitly relied upon." "The exception hereinafter mentioned" was the objection to the testimony of the witness Champion hereinbefore alluded to, which objection was also put in a concise way in said "assignment of errors" in addition to being elaborately argued in another part of the brief. Under these circumstances, we do not feel called upon to notice the other 16 alleged errors in detail. It is sufficient to say that we have examined the rulings of the court so excepted to, and find in them no prejudicial error. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

QUIETING TITLE—BURDEN OF PROOF—NEW TRIAL—JOINT MOTION—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—IRRIGATION DISTRICT—LIABILITY TO SUIT.

1. In an action to quiet title, where plaintiff's title is denied, and it is stipulated that the land was within a government grant in aid of a railroad, under which plaintiff claims, and that before plaintiff purchased a decree was entered, at the suit of the United States canceling the patent, but saving the rights of certain classes, plaintiff must show that he is within one of the exceptions.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 475, providing that the court must disregard any error or defect which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties, a new trial may be granted to one of several parties who join in the motion, though as to others it must be overruled.

3. Where two quarter sections were granted, each by a separate patent, mere contiguity cannot extend to one a riparian right which is appurtenant to the other, though both have come into the possession of the same person.

4. An irrigation district, though a public corporation, may be sued, under the Wright act (St. 1887, p. 35, § 14), providing that in all courts, actions, suits, and proceedings, its board of directors "may sue, appear and defend, in person or by attorneys, and in the name of such irrigation district."

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by F. Boehmer against the Big Rock Creek Irrigation District and its board of directors. There was a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order granting defendants a new trial, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Schutze & Luckel, for appellant. Will D. Gould and Mulford & Pollard, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. This action is prosecuted by the plaintiff to quiet title to certain water rights alleged to be appurtenant to certain of his lands as riparian owner. The cause was heard upon an agreed statement of facts and the deposition of one witness. Written findings were filed, and judgment entered. The defendants moved for a new trial, and upon the hearing thereof the following minute order was made: "Defendants move the court for new trial herein on the grounds stated in the notice of motion on file. Motion is argued, and thereupon granted on the grounds stated, and also on the court's own motion, for the reason that the findings are contrary to the evidence, and were signed and filed inadvertently by the court without observing the error, the same having been prepared by counsel for the plaintiff." This appeal is by the plaintiff from said order. Defendants' motion for a new trial specified three findings as not justified by the evidence.

1. That the second finding, in so far as it finds that the plaintiff and his predecessors in interest have been since the year 1871 the owners and seised in fee of the N. E. ¼ of section 7 in township 4 N., range 9 W., S. B. and M., is not justified by the evidence. Plaintiff's ownership of said quarter section was denied by the answer, and therefore the burden was on the plaintiff to prove title. The stipulation shows that said land was within the grant to the Southern Pacific Railroad in aid of its branch line, under the act of March 3, 1871, and also within the grant to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad under the act of July 27, 1866; that said quarter section was patented to the Southern Pacific Company in 1876, and was conveyed by said company in 1882 to one James O'Reilly, under whom the plaintiff claims; that before O'Reilly conveyed the United States brought suit against the railroad company and O'Reilly to cancel the patents to a large quantity of land, embracing the above quarter section; that a decree was entered adjudging that the United States was the owner thereof, and canceling the patent issued therefor, but saving the rights of preemptors and homesteaders holding under patents issued to them, and also saving the rights of the defendants other than the railroad company acquired under the act of congress entitled "An act to provide for the adjustment of land grants," approved March 3, 1887. The patent to the railroad company having been canceled, and the plaintiff not having given any evidence to show that he or his grantor was within any of the exceptions named, he failed to prove his allegation of ownership.

2. It is also clear that defendants' exception to the third finding is well taken. The second finding is that plaintiff is seised in fee of a large number of quarter sections therein described by section, township, and range, but not otherwise; and the third finding is that said lands lie along and adjoin natural streams of running water, namely, the Rio Llano, or Big Rock creek, and another stream known as "Pallett's Creek." The individuals named as defendants—as to whom the only allegation is that they constitute the board of directors of said irrigation district—disclaimed all interest in the controversy, and the corporation disclaimed all interest in the waters of Pallett creek. The stipulation shows that three of the quarter sections in township 4, range 9 W., do not touch Big Rock creek, though they adjoin other quarter sections owned by plaintiff through which said stream runs; and the same is true of certain quarter sections in township 4 of range 10 W. The third finding would show, therefore, that all the lands of plaintiff described in the complaint are riparian, and would eliminate the question whether the quarter sections which do not touch the stream are riparian because they are contiguous to other quarter sections through which the stream runs, and which are thus brought within the fourth finding, which is that plaintiff's lands through which the streams run are riparian, and entitles the plaintiff to the reasonable and necessary use of the water therefrom for domestic and irrigation purposes, while said fourth finding clearly limits plaintiff's riparian rights to those quarter sections through which the streams run.

3. The fifth finding is also excepted to so far as it finds that certain springs on plaintiff's land are fed solely by percolating waters. This exception is unimportant in view of the sixth finding, which is to the effect that the rights of the defendants to the waters of Big Rock creek, or to said springs, is subject to said rights of the plaintiff; and it is therefore not necessary to consider whether the presumption is that said springs are fed by percolating waters, in the absence of any evidence as to how they are fed.

Appellant further contends that the order appealed from must be reversed because the motion for a new trial was made by all the defendants, while the individuals named as defendants, having disclaimed all interest in the controversy, were not affected or injured by the findings or judgment; in other words, that "a motion for a new trial is indivisible, and when made jointly by two or more parties, if it cannot be allowed as to all, it must be overruled as to all." Appellant cites six or seven cases from Nebraska, about the same number from Indiana, one from Minnesota, and one from Wyoming, which sustain his said proposition. The early Indiana cases —which seem to have been the pioneers of this line of decisions—adopted it in analogy to the ruling that a joint demurrer will be overruled unless it is well taken as to all the demurrants jointly; and Asevado v. Orr, 100 Cal. 293, 34 Pac. 777, and Rogers v. Schulenburg, 111 Cal. 281, 43 Pac. 899, are cited to the point that a joint demurrer by all the defendants is properly overruled if the complaint is good against either of them. The question here presented has not before been considered or decided by this court so far as I have been able to find. Whether the cases cited by appellant were rightly decided under the practice prevailing in those states, we need not consider. Obviously it is one of those questions which should be determined in harmony with the principles governing our own practice. It is true that the individual defendants, having disclaimed all personal interest in the controversy, were not injured by the findings or judgment, and were not "aggrieved" thereby. But, the order granting a new trial having been rightly made as to one of the defendants,—the irrigation district,—the plaintiff was not injured by the joinder of the individual defendants in the motion, nor by the granting of the motion as to all; and he should not be permitted to profit by findings which do not accord with the facts which he has stipulated to be true, if it can be avoided. Section 475, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "The court must in every stage of an action disregard any error or defect in pleadings or proceedings which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties, and no judgment shall be reversed or affected by reason of such error or defect." In the face of this provision, appellant's contention cannot be sustained.

It is also contended by appellant that the court had no power to order a new trial of its own motion, the cause having been tried by the court without a jury. The order granting a new trial does not profess to have been granted solely upon the court's own motion, and, as the grounds stated in defendants' motion fully justified the order, the point made by appellant need not be considered.

Appellant also contends that his riparian rights extend to those quarter sections not on the stream, inasmuch as they are contiguous to those that are washed by it. As already seen, the fourth finding obviously intended to limit plaintiff's riparian rights to those descriptions through which the streams run; but this intention was defeated by the third finding, and, the judgment having been entered in accordance therewith, the result is that all of plaintiff's tracts of land described in the complaint are adjudged to be riparian, except two quarter sections constituting the N. ½ of section 2 in township 4, range 10 W., and there is nothing in the findings to show that these parcels are differently situated. If appellant's contention as stated in his brief were sound, it would follow that, if A. owned a tract of land upon a stream, his riparian rights which he acquired by the purchase of that tract would extend to all lands he might subsequently acquire, no matter from whom, nor under what circumstances his vendor obtained title, nor how distant from the stream, provided he owned all the land between the stream and the land so purchased. The facts stipulated are, however, that all the lands described in the complaint, except the N. E. ¼ of section 7, township 4 N., range 9 W., and two quarter sections in range 10, were patented by the United States to William S. Chapman on June 1, 1870, by 14 separate patents based on 14 different entries, and that plaintiff is the owner of each of these 14 quarter sections "by mesne conveyances under said William S. Chapman." With the exception of lands within confirmed Mexican grants, the Virginia military reservation and perhaps some other reservations, granted in early days, it has been the policy of the general government to subdivide the public domain into small tracts, and to dispose of them as such, and, for the purpose of carrying out such policy, it has restricted the right of entry under the homestead and pre-emption laws to 160 acres. Even in its grants to railroads, by granting alternate sections, it prevented the acquisition from the government of large bodies of contiguous lands, and a similar policy is pursued by the state in disposing of state lands. In Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 10 Pac. 674, at pages 424, 425, 69 Cal., and page 773, 10 Pac., it was said: "It is to be borne in mind that if the court had found a water course to, through, or past any one of the tracts described in the complaint, only such of the certificates of purchase would have been admissible as showed the purchase of tracts so found by the court to be touched or traversed by the water course. * * * If we shall say, in general terms, that the certificates of purchase ought to have been admitted, this must be understood in a limited sense, and to apply only to the certificate with reference to the land described, as to which there is evidence that they are lands by or through which the water course passed. All the sections or fractional sections mentioned in any one certificate constitute a single tract of land." In the case at bar the stipulation is that these 14 quarter sections were granted each by a separate patent, each patent being based upon a separate entry, and these 14 quarter sections therefore constitute 14 distinct tracts of land, and mere contiguity cannot extend a riparian right which is appurtenant to one quarter section to another, though both are now owned by the same person.

It is alleged in the answer that said irrigation district "is a municipal corporation, and is not subject to be sued in this action," and we are asked by respondent to adjudicate that question. It is true, as appellant suggests, that it cannot be considered as affecting the order appealed from; but as that order must be affirmed, and as the question must again arise, unless abandoned by the defendant corporation, it should be disposed of now so as to avoid another appeal. We are not referred to any case where this question has been raised or decided. The fact that it has not been before made, while by no means conclusive, is suggestive of the construction given to the statute by the bar. Section 14 of the Wright act (St. 1887, p. 35), after giving express authority to the board of directors "to institute and maintain any and all actions and proceedings, suits at law or in equity, necessary or proper in order to fully carry out the provisions of this act, or to enforce, maintain, protect or preserve any and all rights, privileges and immunities created by this act, or acquired in pursuance thereof," adds: "And in all courts, actions, suits, or proceedings, the said board may sue, appear, and defend, in person or by attorneys, and in the name of such irrigation district." This language is quite as effective to subject the district to an action as the more common expression "to sue and be sued." "Appearance" is defined by Bouvier to be "a coming into court as a party to a suit, whether as plaintiff or defendant"; "the formal proceeding by which a defendant submits himself to the jurisdiction of the court"; while the word "defend" is defined in Black's Law Dictionary as follows: "To contest and endeavor to defeat a claim or demand made against one in a court of justice." It is conceded that the state and its public agencies cannot be sued without express authority from the state itself, and that, as held in Re Madera Irr. Dist., 92 Cal. 296, 28 Pac. 272, 675: "An irrigation district organized under the Wright act becomes a public corporation, and its officers become public officers of the state." Undoubtedly a general statute authorizing individuals or private corporations to sue or be sued would not be construed to include municipal corporations; but where, as here, the statute in question relates directly and exclusively to corporations formed under it, that part relating to its liability to sue or be sued must be determined by those rules of construction intended to aid in ascertaining the intention of the legislature, for whatever power it does bestow is granted directly and expressly to such corporation. If such corporations may not be sued, no judgment can be rendered against them, whether they appear and defend or not, and certainly the legislature did not intend that such actions should be profitless to the parties and only profitable to the attorneys, and perhaps not even amusing to the court. The right to appear and defend implies the liability to be sued. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

ROTHSCHILD v. SWOPE. (L. A. 220.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—STOCK IN TRADE—CHANGE OF POSSESSION—INTENT—CONDITIONAL SALE—PAROL EVIDENCE—AGENCY—EVIDENCE OF AUTHORITY.

1. A debtor wrote certain of his creditors, informing them of his financial embarrassment, but stating an intent not to quit business, and a belief that, by the end of three weeks, he would have sold enough goods to pay all his debts, and offering to give them a bill of sale of his stock if they felt insecure. About 10 days later, such creditors assigned their claims to plaintiff, with authority to buy the stock, "the goods to be taken in full of the creditors' claims"; and possession was taken by plaintiff under a bill of sale absolute on its face, and sales were made by the agent of such creditors, with the debtor's assistance, for two weeks, when the agent surrendered possession to the debtor, and the latter erased plaintiff's name from the sign in front of the store. There was no consideration for the transfer other than the claims, and the sale was advertised by plaintiff to continue for 14 days only, and there was evidence that plaintiff authorized an advertisement that, after part of the goods had been sold, the debtor would again conduct the business. The testimony as to whether the bill of sale was to be conditional for the payment of the creditors' debts, or absolute, was conflicting. Held, that a finding that the sale was fraudulent as to creditors, under Civ. Code, § 3440, because of the equivocal nature of the transaction and of the possession taken, was justified.

2. Though a creditor knew of a sale of the debtor's goods to other creditors, he may attach them in good faith if they are afterwards found in possession of the debtor with all the indicia of ownership.

3. Evidence that creditors assigned their claims to plaintiff for the purpose of conducting a sale of the debtor's goods; that plaintiff took possession under the belief that it was to be surrendered to the debtor when enough to cover the claims was realized from sales; that plaintiff employed an agent to make the sales, with authority to act generally for him; and that thereafter the creditors corresponded with such agent,—sustains a finding that a surrender of possession to the debtor by the agent, after conducting sales for two weeks, was authorized by the creditors.

4. Evidence of things said and done by the parties before and after the execution of a bill of sale absolute on its face is admissible to show that the instrument was intended to operate as conditional security.

5. Where creditors, after receiving an offer of a bill of sale from their debtor, assign their claims to an agent for the purpose of conducting the transaction, with authority "to take the goods in full of the creditors' claims," the agent has authority to agree with the debtor that the sale shall be conditional, and that the goods will be surrendered to him when enough is realized from the sales to satisfy the claims.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Riverside county; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Action by Henry L. Rothschild against F. W. Swope. There was a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a new trial plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. A. Rankin, for appellant. Oscar Philo Taylor, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. This is an action for conversion, brought by plaintiff against defendant, for a certain stock of goods and merchandise which defendant had seized by writ of attachment, as sheriff of Riverside county, in the suit entitled "J. A. Simms versus E. M. Stanton." The defendant justified under his writ. Plaintiff claims ownership of the goods at the time of their seizure. The cause was tried by the court, and it rendered judgment for defendant. Plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is from the order denying the motion.

The testimony tended to show the following facts: The said Stanton, in 1893, was engaged in the jewelry business at Riverside. He made a proposition to certain San Francisco creditors by letter, dated December 10, 1893, as to his financial situation, the result of which was that these creditors assigned their claims to plaintiff, and empowered him, as they testify, to purchase the stock of goods held by Stanton, and receipt the several claims so assigned; "the goods to be taken in full of the creditors' claims." This letter becomes important in the decision of the case, and should be at least partly given. Stanton inclosed a statement of his condition. He called attention to the fact that he owed much more than he or his creditors had supposed, and explains how he lost sight of his true condition. He disclaims having attempted to deceive his creditors. I quote: "Now, if you feel that you would be more secure, I will give you a bill of sale of stock and fixtures, as I do not want to do anything that is not satisfactory to all my creditors. They have all been kind to me. I send you a paper containing an advertisement to close out my business, which, of course, I do not intend to do, but had to write it in such a way as to convey that idea in order to make a success. I expect to sell enough by December 31st to pay all I owe." The letter continues in some detail to show how he hopes to work out. He explains why he has advertised the special cut-rate holiday sale, and that he thought it best for all concerned, etc. Following this letter, the creditors addressed sent plaintiff as their representative to Riverside. They also employed one Hugh Mauldin, an expert jewelry salesman, to go with plaintiff. On December 23, 1893, Stanton made and delivered to plaintiff a bill of sale, and plaintiff went into immediate possession of the property. Attached to the bill of sale was an inventory headed "Invoice, Riverside, November 20, 1893," purporting to contain an inventory of the goods sold, including book accounts, fixtures, and a horse and saddle, and on the bill of sale was recapitulated Stanton's assets and liabilities, showing: Assets, $11,874.86, and liabilities, $6,342.09. The sale was absolute on its face, and was for the consideration of $5,532.77. Plaintiff took the assignment of two insurance policies covering the property, which were accepted by the companies. Plaintiff testified that by his own inventory, made at the time, the goods were reasonably worth $7,007.81, besides fixtures and tools, etc., worth $1,200 more. He also testified that, at the time of the sale, he receipted to Stanton the bills due to the creditors whom he represented to the amount mentioned in the bill of sale, to wit, $5,532.77, and there was no other consideration. The sale and transfer took place about 9 o'clock Saturday evening. The following Monday was Christmas, and the inventory was begun on the following Tuesday, and the store was closed until Thursday, December 28th, when plaintiff opened it. On that day, as plaintiff testifies, he "placed Mr. Hugh Mauldin in charge, who is a jewelry salesman, and makes a specialty of forced sales in the jewelry line; * * * employed him to take possession of the store for me"; and plaintiff himself went away. He testified also that Mauldin "was employed as a clerk for the purpose of carrying on the business, and not otherwise." One of the creditors testified that Mauldin was authorized to be employed by them, and that his employment was for a short time, and the sale was to be forced. In the daily papers of Riverside, Mauldin caused the following notice to be published, as he testified: "Sale Extraordinary. For Only Fourteen Days. By authority of San Francisco creditors of E. M. Stanton, I will offer for sale at cost, for a limited number of days, the entire stock of the Stanton jewelry establishment, 855 Main street, Riverside, commencing to-day, December 28th, at 10 a. m., and continuing until the evening of January 13th prox. In no instance will more than the cost the dealers pay at wholesale be asked, and, as no new goods will be added to the stock, it is confidently believed that fourteen days will attain the object of the sale. Mr. Stanton himself and his able assistant, Mr. J. S. Baker, will be in attendance. Come early, and get your pick. Hugh Mauldin, Manager." He testified that he received $1,459.81 from sales. I quote further from his testimony: "I ran the sale until the night of 13th January. Q. What did you do with the store then? A. I left it. I was through. Q. To whom did you give the keys? A. I left them on the cases. I put Mr. Stanton in my position, and left the thing that way." Mauldin added to this notice of sale, and it was published on the last day of the sale, the following: "Closes to-night. The Stanton sale closes to-night, at ten o'clock." On January 19, 1894, the defendant levied a writ of attachment upon the remaining goods then in Stanton's possession, at the suit of said Simms, and subsequently sold them for $2,270.94.

From plaintiff's statement of the facts it appears that Mauldin returned to San Francisco on the 14th of January, and informed plaintiff and the creditors that he had turned over possession of the goods to Stanton. On the 15th of January, plaintiff wrote one J. S. Baker (who had been a clerk of Stanton, and had assisted Mauldin) to get the keys from Stanton, and take charge of the store, to which Baker replied on the 17th, stating that Stanton was in charge of the store; that Mauldin had expected instructions, and, receiving none, turned over the store to Stanton. Stanton refused to turn over the store to Baker. As to the real purpose of the bill of sale the evidence is conflicting, as indeed it is almost throughout the record. The creditors concur in testifying that plaintiff had no authority to promise Stanton anything but that the goods would be taken in payment of the debts; that it was to be an unconditional sale; and that plaintiff had no authority to make it a conditional sale. The evidence of Stanton was to the effect that the bill of sale was given as mere matter of security; that Rothschild (plaintiff) so recognized it; that it would not take over two weeks to realize the amount due, and he would then return the stock; that the purpose of the bill of sale was merely to protect plaintiff, as well as himself, to show authority; that it would be better for him (Stanton), so that people would think it a bona fide sale. Plaintiff, as a witness, denied substantially that any such understanding existed as testified to by Stanton, and objected to the latter's testimony as incompetent, because it contradicted the terms of his written bill of sale, and because plaintiff, as agent of these creditors, had no authority to make such agreement. This objection will be dealt with later.

Before Mauldin turned the goods over to Stanton, they had some conversation on the subject, and to the statements of Mauldin objection was made by plaintiff, on the ground that he (Mauldin) had no authority to make them, and this objection will be hereafter noticed. Stanton testified that, two or three days before turning over the store, Mauldin said to Stanton that he expected to be through on Saturday night, and would turn the keys over; that he (Stanton) had better stay out of the store until Saturday evening; then he would turn it over to him. On January 20th plaintiff wrote to Stanton a letter, from which I quote: "In a letter from Mr. Baker this morning, I learned that Mr. Mauldin gave you the keys, and placed you in possession of the store, which he did without my knowledge, and without any authority whatever. For the present such was not my plan, and I request you to kindly give the keys to Mr. Baker, and leave him in the possession of the store. In a very short time we can make satisfactory arrangements between us, but for the present the above instructions are necessary to be followed; else people will think the sale is over, and that things are again in their normal condition, which spoils every possibility of realizing money to any extent. For the same reason, I would request you to keep out of the store as much as possible, until we make other arrangements." It appeared also that, when plaintiff took possession. Stanton had a sign over the door in letters two feet long, and eight inches wide, and covered most of the sign. Plaintiff caused to be painted on the margin of this sign, in letters about one-half inch in size, "Henry L. Rothschild, Successor." There were two small bevel signs, consisting simply of Stanton's name in black letters, one inch in size, that were placed in the windows as part of the dressing of the windows. These were not removed. Stanton erased the name of Rothschild from the large sign when he retook possession. Defendant introduced in evidence a local item published in the Riverside Daily Press of December 26, 1893, reading as follows: "E. M. Stanton's jewelry store was closed to-day pending taking invoice. Hugh Mauldin, who closed D. E. La Rues' jewelry stock a couple of years ago, is here in charge of the store. After a certain amount of goods have been sold, we understand Mr. Stanton will take charge again, and conduct the business. We sincerely hope they will come out all right, for Ed. Stanton is a popular and highly esteemed young man." Stanton testified that this was inserted by either plaintiff or Mauldin, and it was while plaintiff was there. As to Mauldin's authority, the plaintiff testified as follows: "Q. Did you ever give Hugh Mauldin authority to turn this store back to Stanton, or return the possession of it? A. I told him to act for me. Q. Act for you in what? A. In every capacity that I could act for myself." At another time he testified that Mauldin was simply a clerk to sell the goods, and his further instructions were not to leave until further directed.

Appellant makes two points in his brief as to the findings of the court: First, that Mauldin had no authority to turn over the goods to Stanton, and that in doing so it did not revest the title in Stanton; and, second, that, if Mauldin acted within the scope of his authority, it does not follow that the goods became subject to attachment at the suit of Simms, because plaintiff's possession was open, notorious, and continued.

The view of the case taken by the court below was that the possession was not open and notorious and continued, and that the sale was fraudulent and void as to the then existing creditors, under section 3440, Civ. Code. It appears to me that the court was fully warranted in reaching this conclusion from all the facts and circumstances, and therefore neither the question as to the authority of the vendee, as the representative of the creditors, nor of those who were acting as agents of the vendee, need be considered, except so far as their acts and conduct may throw light upon the original transaction. If, as to creditors of Stanton, the sale to plaintiff was void ab initio, it becomes immaterial whether Stanton was or was not revested with title by Mauldin. As to creditors, the title never left Stanton. There is perhaps no one section of our Civil Code that has given rise to greater perplexity in its application to the transfer of personal property than section 3440. Notwithstanding the numerous decisions of this court, and the many lucid and comprehensive opinions found in our Reports, it has been found impossible to formulate a rule for all cases. It must always rest with the enlightened judge or jury to say whether, under the given facts and circumstances, the sale should be upheld as against existing creditors. The justice and wisdom of the statute are too deeply intrenched both in the lay, as well as in the judicial, mind, to longer admit of question. The law has the sanction of adoption by all civilized countries, and has found application in the affairs of men everywhere since the days of Queen Elizabeth. Counsel for appellant is quite correct in saying that the statute of frauds should not be "changed into an instrument for the perpetration of fraud, instead of its prevention"; but neither should it be made a cloak under which fraud can find shelter.

The case before us is unique in many features. As an illustration of an attempt of certain creditors to secure payment by preference, with a reasonable belief that enough would remain out of which to pay the remaining creditors, the transaction was not unnatural nor strained. But as a transaction importing an absolute transfer of title, as vendor and vendee ordinarily regard title, or as the law considers it, it seems to me the essential elements are wholly wanting. I do not think the fact alone that Stanton took possession within two weeks after the sale necessarily imports fraud, or that the possession was not continued; neither does it imply a right to repurchase or take back the property. At most, it is but a circumstance in the case. No rule can possibly be laid down as to the length of the interim during which the vendor is out of possession before he can repurchase or become repossessed. It all rests with the intent and conduct of the parties in making the sale, and upon the circumstances surrounding the parties while the vendor is out of possession. Stevens v. Irwin, 15 Cal. 503. I have already attempted to summarize the salient facts from which the trial court apparently drew its conclusions. There were still other facts of more or less significance. It is true, the evidence was not without conflict, but there was evidence tending to show the facts to be as already stated, and we cannot say that the court took the wrong view in these conflicts. This court, 37 years ago, in Stevens v. Irwin, supra, gave an interpretation to the statute which has stood unassailed ever since. Perhaps no better general interpretation of the law has since been given. It was there said: "The delivery must be made of the property. The vendee must take actual possession. That possession must be open and unequivocal, carrying with it the usual marks and indications of ownership by the vendee. It must be such as to give evidence to the world of the claims of the owner. He must, in other words, be in the usual relation to the property which owners of goods occupy to their property. This possession must be continuous; not taken to be surrendered back again; not formal, but substantial." In the case before us I think there was immediate delivery, followed by actual possession. As to length of time possession was held, that alone would not, in my judgment, change the fact of possession. But it was the character of the sale and the character of the possession that gave the true color to the transaction. Immediate delivery and actual possession alone are not enough. Actual and immediate delivery, followed by possession and continued change of possession, are not enough, although these are literally all the law requires. The possession must be open and unequivocal, carrying with it the usual marks and indications of ownership of the vendee. It must be such as to proclaim to the world the new ownership. It must have carried with it evidence of the usual relationship between property and its owner. It must be taken to be retained, and not with a purpose to return it to the vendor. Levy v. Scott (Cal.) 46 Pac. 892. Tested by this rule, I cannot say that the court erred in applying the facts found, nor that it erred in finding the facts as it did.

Appellant submitted much testimony tending to show that the suit of Simms against Stanton, under which defendant justifies, was collusive, and that Simms knew of the sale by Stanton to plaintiff. The court below, in its opinion (found in the record), stated that Simms knew of the sale to plaintiff, but the court held that at the time of the attachment the property was in Stanton's possession, with every apparent evidence of ownership in him, and all evidences of plaintiff's ownership obliterated, and was therefore subject to attachment by Stanton's creditors; and I cannot say the court erred in this conclusion. If plaintiff had alleged and proved a fraudulent collusion between Simms and Stanton to get possession, followed up by proof of a collusive attachment, the case would have been quite different. But it nowhere appears that Simms and other creditors, who were not provided for in plaintiff's purchase, had anything to do with the surrender of possession to Stanton by Mauldin. As to the powers of plaintiff and Mauldin, as agents of the creditors, I think the evidence warrants the conclusion of the trial court that plaintiff had full authority to act for the creditors. He went to Riverside upon the written invitation of Stanton, in which he said to his creditors in San Francisco: "Now, if you feel that you would be more secure, I will give you a bill of sale of stock and fixtures, as I do not want to do anything that is not satisfactory to all my creditors." There was believed to be sufficient to pay all. The evidence tended to show that plaintiff went into possession with the understanding that it was not an absolute and unconditional sale, but a temporary possession for the purposes of a forced and limited sale, and that Stanton was again to have possession. Plaintiff turned the property over to Mauldin, to conduct the sale, and the evidence tended to show with such powers as he himself had. Plaintiff returned to San Francisco, and we must presume reported the facts as they existed. If he did not, the creditors ought not to be heard to complain. They trusted him to take the title, and to conduct the business, and I think should be bound by the acts of plaintiff. The evidence tended to show that Mauldin succeeded to the power of plaintiff. Stanton testified that there was a mutual understanding between plaintiff, Mauldin, and himself that the store was to be returned to him when the amount due the San Francisco creditors was realized; that Mauldin stated that he had realized different amounts; at one time he stated it at $1,500, and at another $3,000 or $4,000, and that, when the stock was turned over to him (Stanton), he did not know but that the claims were paid in full, and he stated he supposed they were paid, or the stock would not have been turned over to him; that he did not then know, nor did he know when he testified, whether they had been paid in full as a fact. After plaintiff left, the creditors corresponded with Mauldin, and gave him instructions. This correspondence, so far as printed, seems to me to corroborate the view of the case taken by the trial court.

The objection made to Stanton's testimony as to the purpose of the bill of sale, noted in the summary of facts, I do not think well taken. It did not relate alone to conversation after the sale, but, as I understand it, related to the understanding both before and after the paper was signed, and was while he was in possession. I think it was competent for defendant to show just what was said and done by the principals to the sale at the time it was made, and what they both understood was its intention. The rule of law as to impeachment of deed by the grantor after its execution does not here apply. The facts both before and since the making of the bill of sale tend to show that it was not intended to work an absolute sale. Nor was the objection well taken that plaintiff had no authority to make such an agreement. As already observed, Stanton had a right to assume that plaintiff had full authority; and, this being so, he could show what was done by plaintiff. For like reasons, the statements of Mauldin at the time he turned over the property to Stanton were admissible. The evidence tended to show that Stanton understood from both plaintiff and Mauldin that he (Mauldin) was clothed with all of plaintiff's authority, and, in turning over the property, he seemed to be doing no more than what the evidence tended to show was originally contemplated. Other errors of law are assigned by plaintiff as occurring at the trial. Several questions were asked plaintiff on cross-examination as to what was said or done when the bill of sale was signed, intended to draw from plaintiff an acknowledgment as to the purpose of the instrument. I see no error here. If it was true that the bill of sale did not in fact express its true meaning, and that it had a purpose different from what it disclosed, I see no error in having asked plaintiff about it. I find no prejudicial error in any of the other specifications.

My conclusion upon the whole case is that the record discloses no reversible error, and it is recommended that the order be affirmed.

REILLEY v. WRIGHT et al. (Sac. 161.)

QUIETING TITLE — EVIDENCE—EXECUTION SALE — TITLE OF PURCHASER—PRIORITIES.

1. In a suit to quiet title by a purchaser of land sold on execution under a judgment in an attachment suit, the production of the judgment, execution, and sheriff's deed makes a prima facie case, as against the judgment debtor, without showing that the latter had an interest in the land at the date of the attachment or of the sale.

2. The title of a purchaser at execution sale under a judgment in an attachment suit relates back to the levy of attachment, and is therefore superior to a mortgage lien acquired by a third person between the date of said levy and the execution sale.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; John Caldwell, Judge.

Suit by Cornelius Reilley against Whitaker Wright and others to quiet title. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants Wright and Johnson appeal. Affirmed.

E. M. Gibson and Welles Whitmore, for appellants. Chas. W. Kitts and Fred Searls, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Appeal by defendants Wright and Johnson from a judgment quieting plaintiff's title to a piece of mining ground in Nevada county, and from an order denying said defendants a new trial. The complaint was in the usual form, alleging title and possession and right of possession in plaintiff, and that defendants made some claim adverse to the plaintiff in the premises, which was without right. Appellants answered jointly, denying plaintiff's title, and averring legal title in fee in Wright, and a mortgage lien on the property by Johnson under a mortgage from Wright. At the trial, plaintiff deraigned title to the premises in dispute under a judgment and execution sale in an attachment suit theretofore brought by him against the defendant Wright in the superior court of Nevada county. After showing that the complaint was filed and attachment issued in that action October 16, 1889; that the attachment was levied on the property October 17, 1889; that judgment was entered therein in favor of Reilley for $15,000 and costs May 1, 1893; the issuance and levy of execution thereon against the property May 5, 1893; a sale of the property by the sheriff, under the execution, June 5, 1893, to one L. Gilson; sheriff's deed to the purchaser December 11, 1893; and a deed from Gilson to plaintiff March 3, 1894,—plaintiff rested. Thereupon appellants moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that the evidence did not show "whether, at the time of the levy of the writ of attachment, or the execution admitted in evidence, the defendant Wright had any interest in the property." The motion was denied, and the only material question in the case is the correctness of this ruling. The contention of appellants, in keeping with the ground of their motion, is that plaintiff made no case, because he offered no evidence "showing or tending to show that Whitaker Wright had any interest in the property" either at the date of the attachment or of the levy of the execution, and, consequently, that there was nothing to show that plaintiff acquired any interest through his deed from Gilson. There is no merit in the contention. The plaintiff was claiming under an execution sale based upon a judgment against Wright as the judgment debtor, and in such case, in an action of this character, it was only necessary for plaintiff, in making out a prima facie right to recover as against Wright, to show the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, the execution thereon and sale thereunder, and transmission of the title to the plaintiff. Bank v. Raynor, 61 Cal. 145. "As against the judgment debtor, the production of the judgment, execution, and sheriff's deed is prima facie evidence of the plaintiff's right to recover; but, if the action is against a stranger to the judgment, the plaintiff must also show that the judgment debtor had the title or possession of the land at the date of the lien or of the sale." Robinson v. Thornton, 102 Cal. 675, 681, 34 Pac. 120, and cases there cited. The same is true as to defendant Johnson. His mortgage interest or lien was acquired intermediate the levy of the attachment and the execution sale in the attachment suit of Reilley v. Wright, and was therefore subordinate to the lien of the attachment; and, as the title acquired through the sheriff's deed related back to the levy of the attachment (Porter v. Pico, 55 Cal. 165), his rights under the mortgage were as effectually concluded thereby as were those of his mortgagor. Robinson v. Thornton, supra.

The other questions presented all grow out of an attempt on the part of the defendants to show an equitable title in defendant Wright, which was not pleaded. The whole matter was entirely without the issues raised by the pleadings, and, while the court admitted evidence upon the question, it eventually, and we think properly, entirely ignored such evidence in making its findings, and confined itself to the issues made by the pleadings. The errors assigned thereon have no material bearing upon the case, and the judgment and order must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

RHOADS et al. v. GRAY et al. (Sac. 312.)

APPEAL FROM JUDGMENT AND ORDER—UNDERTAKING—SUFFICIENCY—EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

1. Where an appeal is taken from the judgment, and also from the order denying a new trial, an undertaking which recites only that it was in consideration of the appeal from the judgment is ineffectual as to the appeal from the order.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 939, providing that an exception to the decision or verdict on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence cannot be reviewed unless the appeal from the judgment is taken within 60 days after its rendition, the judgment must be affirmed where the only ground urged on an appeal not taken within 60 days is that the evidence was insufficient to sustain certain findings of fact.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, King county; Justin Jacobs, Judge.

Action by one Rhoads and others against one Gray and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Horace L. Smith, for appellants. J. A. Hannah and M. L. Short, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. At the hearing of this cause the appeal from the order denying a new trial was dismissed for want of an undertaking upon such appeal, the $300 undertaking for costs which was filed herein reciting only that it was in consideration of the appeal from the judgment. Duncan v. Times-Mirror Co., 109 Cal. 602, 42 Pac. 147. The only ground urged by the appellants in support of the appeal from the judgment is that the evidence was insufficient to sustain certain findings of fact; but, as the appeal was taken more than 60 days after the rendition of the judgment, we are precluded from the examination of that question. PEOPLE v. WONG SAM. (Cr. 231.)

FORGERY—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

A false letter purporting to have been written by another with intent to influence the collector of customs to reject the application of a Chinese subject to land is not an instrument which could defraud, within Pen. Code, § 470, defining forgery.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Wong Sam, alias Wong Ng Tai, was indicted for forgery. From an order sustaining a demurrer, the people appeal. Affirmed.

W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and Chas. H. Jackson, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People. Henry C. Dibble and Barclay Henley, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Appeal by the people from an order sustaining a demurrer to an amended information attempting to charge defendant with forgery in writing and sending to John H. Wise, as United States collector of customs, at the port of San Francisco, a certain alleged false, forged, and fraudulent letter, purporting to have been written and signed by one Chin Qu Sing, the interpreter of the police court of the city of Los Angeles, the intent and purpose of which letter was "to influence the judgment of said collector adversely" to the application of one Lu Goon, a Chinese subject, then seeking the permission of said collector to land at said port under the terms of the Chinese exclusion act, and thereby "defraud said Lu Goon." Of the reasons suggested in support of the demurrer, one is sufficient to sustain the order: that the paper is not one of which forgery may be competently predicated. The letter purports to be nothing more than an unwarranted assault upon the veracity, reputation, and business standing of the person against whom it was aimed; and, while it might constitute the basis of a prosecution for criminal libel, it is not an instrument which, upon its face, could have the effect to defraud, within the meaning of section 470 of our Penal Code, defining forgery, according to any interpretation of that or any similar statutory provision which has been called to our attention. See People v. Munroe, 100 Cal. 666, 35 Pac. 326; Foulke's Case, 2 Rob. (Va.) 836; Jackson v. Weisiger, 2 B. Mon. 214; Shannon v. State, 109 Ind. 407, 10 N. E. 87. Order affirmed.

Actions of replevin by Elizabeth Adams against N. M. Weaver, and by Elizabeth Adams and I. O. Stephens, executors of D. O. Adams, deceased, against the same defendant. The two cases were tried together, and from an order in each case denying defendant's motion for new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

Philip S. Driver and Albert M. Johnson, for appellant. F. E. Baker and R. L. Simpson, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. These are two actions of replevin, brought by the respondents respectively, and, by stipulation of counsel, tried together. The appeal is from an order in each case denying defendant's motion for a new trial, and the two cases come up on the same record. The question involved in each case (aside from a proposition involving the exclusion of a deposition offered by defendant as testimony) relates to the validity of certain conveyances of the property in dispute made by one J. R. Williams to the plaintiffs in the actions. The property transferred to plaintiff Elizabeth Adams is a combined steam harvester and engine, and that transferred to Elizabeth Adams and L. O. Stephens, executrix and executor of D. O. Adams, deceased, consists of horses, mules, sheep, farming implements, hay, grain, etc., all of which was situate on the D. O. Adams ranch, in the county of Yolo. The defendant, N. M. Weaver, is sheriff of the county of Yolo, and as such levied upon the property in dispute under an execution upon a judgment in favor of Stanton, Thomson & Co., and against J. R. Williams, for $2,375.78 and costs, entered October 4, 1892. The execution was levied October 4, 1892, and defendant's claim is that the property at the date of the levy was the property of said J. R. Williams, the judgment debtor, and subject to the payment of his debts. The findings of the court were in favor of the plaintiffs in each case upon all the material issues.

The attack of defendant upon the transfers of the property by J. R. Williams to the plaintiffs, respectively, is predicated upon the theory that such transfers were void under the statute of frauds. There is really but little conflict in the evidence. It tended to show that about September 1, 1890, Elizabeth Adams and L. O. Stephens, as executrix and executor, etc., of D. O. Adams, deceased, executed to J. R. Williams a lease of the Adams ranch for a term of five years; the lessors to place a flock of sheep upon the ranch, and to receive in lieu of rent one-third of the hay, grain, etc., produced thereon, and one-half of the product of the sheep. At the same time Williams purchased from the executors of the estate a large amount of personal property, including therein most of the property involved in these actions. Williams did not pay for the personal property so purchased, but gave his promissory notes therefor, as follows: One to Mrs. Adams for $7,111.11, and two notes to the estate, aggregating about $13,434.73. These notes were secured by a mortgage on all of Williams' share of the crops raised. At the date of the transactions of 1892, hereafter mentioned, a large portion of the wheat crop, subject to the lien of the crop mortgage, was stored in warehouses at Madison and Esparto in the name of the executors, as by the mortgage provided. A small portion was on the ranch, piled in a barn. In August, 1892, Williams found that he could not carry on the place, under his lease, and meet his ranch bills. He proposed to surrender up the ranch, and sell the personal property to the executors for the payment of his debts to them, and to work for the estate as foreman on the ranch. On or about the 25th of August, Mrs. Adams, her attorney, and Williams met and agreed upon a surrender of the ranch, and purchase by the executors of all the personal property. For the purpose of ascertaining the value of the property, except the grain, sheep, and a few other things, having a well-known market value, they each selected an appraiser, and they were to select a third, and the parties were to abide by their valuation of the property. The appraisers were selected, and on the 29th day of August valued the property, making duplicate lists thereof, which they turned over to Williams and the executors. For a day or two thereafter the parties were engaged in fixing the value of the wheat and other property not submitted to the appraisers for valuation, and upon a final footing it was found the aggregate value of the whole was $25,450.35, and the aggregate of indebtedness on the part of Williams to Mrs. Adams and the executors was $20,545.84, and the excess of the purchase price over the indebtedness was $4,904.51. The combined harvester was valued at $5,000, and Mrs. Adams took it in payment of her note upon which that amount was due. A part of the same agreement was that Williams should furnish to the executors a list of his creditors, and the amount due to them, which debts were to be paid out of the balance going to him after satisfying the demands of the executors and of Mrs. Adams. This list was furnished, and Williams declared it was all he owed in the world. It turned out that his indebtedness to the ranch hands was in excess of his statement; but the executors paid them, and the accounts of others presented by him, although the amount was in excess of the sum due on the sale. On the 1st day of September, 1892, according to the testimony, the executors "took formal possession of everything. Mr. Williams surrendered the lease to us, and delivered possession of the leased land. We called up the men, and told them that Mr. Williams' possession of the ranch was terminated; that he surrendered the same to us, and that the men would thereafter remain in our employ; and that the estate would pay them for their services subsequent to the 1st of September." The combined steam harvester had belonged to plaintiff Elizabeth Adams prior to September, 1890, was sold by her to Williams, and she held a chattel mortgage thereon to secure the purchase price, which was represented by her note against Williams. This mortgage was of record. The sale was conducted openly. Notice thereof was published in a newspaper during its progress, and creditors were notified to exhibit their accounts, and plaintiffs knew nothing of any debts owing by Williams except those settled. After turning over the property to the plaintiffs on the 1st of September, Williams returned to the ranch, and under an agreement with Mrs. Adams, acted as foreman until the 12th of September, when he left, and, it is claimed, absconded, and, it would appear from the record, is in Mexico. There was no written bill of sale of the personal property, and no written surrender of the leasehold estate. Defendant levied his execution on the property October 4, 1892.

The first point made by appellant for reversal is that the contract was invalid because not in writing. The argument is based largely upon the fact that the transaction involved the surrender of the leasehold estate of Williams in the ranch, and compensation to him for plowing a portion of the land, etc. Under our statute of frauds, the surrender of the estate of a lessee can only be by the consent of the parties in writing, or by operation of law. Welcome v. Hess, 90 Cal. 507, 27 Pac. 369. Whether the acts of the parties in this case amounted to a surrender by operation of law need not concern us, as neither the land nor the leasehold interest of Williams therein is involved in the action. The question relates solely to the personal property seized by defendant under the execution. The leasehold interest of William in the ranch was not, so far as appears, levied upon; and, had it been, it would not be the subject of inquiry in this action, which is replevin. The property involved in this action was subject to be sold by a verbal agreement, provided the purchase money, or some portion thereof, was paid or possession taken as provided by section 1973 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We think the evidence shows that the entire purchase price was paid, and possession of the property taken under the sale.

It is next urged that the sale was void because not accompanied by an immediate delivery, etc., as required by section 3440 of the Civil Code. That section is in part as follows: "Every transfer of personal property * * * is conclusively presumed, if made by a person having at the time possession or control of the property, and not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things transferred, to be fraudulent, and therefore void, against those who are his creditors while he remains in possession. * * *" Appellant cites Edwards v. Bank, 59 Cal. 148, and Watson v. Rodgers, 53 Cal. 401. In each of those cases the trial court found that there was not an immediate delivery or continued change of possession, and thereupon the supreme court held the transfers void as against creditors of the vendor who were such while he remained in possession. In these cases the finding is that the purchase was open, notorious, and for a valuable consideration, and was accompanied by immediate delivery and continued change of possession. We cannot say that these findings are not supported by the evidence. The only thing militating against the conclusion reached by the court is the circumstance that, after the sale and delivery of the property, the vendor was employed as a foreman on the ranch, and filled that office for some 10 days, more or less; but his changed position from that of an owner to a servant was open and notorious, not only to the men on the ranch, but to the neighbors, and, while his employment was some evidence of fraud, it was not conclusive. Godchaux v. Mulford, 26 Cal. 316; Etchepare v. Aguirre, 91 Cal. 295, 27 Pac. 668. We are not often called upon to investigate a case of alleged fraud, either actual or constructive, in which the evidence of upright conduct and fair dealing is more apparent than that of the vendees and plaintiffs in this action. The contention of appellant that the wheat in the warehouse was never delivered is not sustained by the record. In the first place, it was deposited or stored in the name of the executors as mortgagees. Again, Williams and the agent of the executors counted the sacks, estimated the weights, and figured the value at market rates.

It is also urged that the court erred in excluding the deposition of the plaintiff Elizabeth Adams. This deposition had been taken on motion and on behalf of appellant. The said Elizabeth was present at the trial, was a witness on her own behalf, testified at length, was cross-examined by appellant's counsel, and was present when the deposition was offered. It was not offered for impeachment, and no foundation was laid for offering it for that purpose. All that appears is that defendant offered the deposition; that respondents objected to it as incompetent, and that it did not appear that the witness was absent, but it did appear that she was present in court, and had fully testified, and been cross-examined by appellant; and that "the court sustained the objection, and the defendant then and there duly excepted." The witness was a party to the action, and her deposition was taken evidently under subdivision 1 of section 2021 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and, of course, her deposition could not have been rightfully rejected on the sole ground that she was present in court, for the provision to that effect to be found in section 2032 does not apply to subdivision 1 of said section 2021. Newell v. Desmond, 74 Cal. 46, 15 Pac. 369; Johnson v. McDuffee, 83 Cal. 30, 23 Pac. 214. But the deposition is not in the record, and there is nothing there which gives the slightest intimation of its contents, except only "that it was duly and legally taken." Therefore it does not, of course, appear that appellant was prejudiced by the ruling; but, if this be a case where the rule that injury is presumed from abstract error can be successfully invoked, still it does not appear that the exclusion of the deposition was error. The judgment of a trial court will not be reversed for the exclusion of evidence unless it appears that there was no sufficient ground for such exclusion. But in the case at bar the contents of the deposition may have been utterly immaterial or inadmissible as evidence, and therefore the conclusion that the court erred in excluding the deposition does not follow from the mere fact of its exclusion, the deposition itself not being before us. The orders appealed from are affirmed.

MURPHY v. CITY OF SAN LUIS OBISPO et al. (L. A. 273.)[1]

MUNICIPAL BONDS—FORM—SUBMISSION TO VOTERS—METHOD OF VOTING—VALIDITY.

1. A city has no power to issue bonds payable in "gold coin of the United States" (in conformity with the ordinance submitting the matter to the voters, and the notice of election), instead of in "gold coin or lawful money of the United States," as required by Act March 1, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 61).

2. The term "five per cent. per annum," in a municipal bond, means that the interest is payable annually.

3. Under St. 1889, p. 399, § 2, authorizing a city to prescribe by ordinance the manner of holding a special election for the issuance of municipal bonds, an ordinance directing each voter to indicate his wish by "writing or causing to be written or printed 'Yes' or 'No' on the right-hand margin on his ticket, opposite the proposition on which he may desire to vote," is mandatory, and is not satisfied by stamping a cross opposite the word "Yes" or "No" printed after the proposition, as provided by the general election law, which the ordinance declares shall only be followed when not in conflict with said ordinance.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Suit by P. W. Murphy against the city of San Luis Obispo and others. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and judgment ordered for plaintiff.

Graves & Graves, for appellant. W. H. Spencer, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. This is an action brought to enjoin the defendants from selling or disposing of certain bonds issued, but not yet sold, by the city of San Luis Obispo (one of the defendants), and to restrain defendants from levying the taxes mentioned in the complaint, and from enforcing a certain ordinance of the said city. The cause was tried by the court, and judgment given for the defendants. The appeal is from the judgment, and also from the order of the court denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

Appellant presents three grounds of attack upon the bonds in question: First, that the bonds are made payable in "gold coin of the United States" instead of "gold coin or lawful money of the United States"; second, that the question as to whether the interest on the bonds would be payable annually or semiannually was not submitted to the voters; and, third, that the voters voting for said bonds voted by stamping a cross opposite the propositions submitted to them, instead of indicating their wish by writing "Yes" or "No" opposite the proposition they desired to vote for. The regularity of the proceedings of the city authorities is not drawn in question, except as these may relate to appellant's second and third points. By the act of March 1, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 61), it is required that the bonds and interest "shall be payable in gold coin or lawful money of the United States." The ordinance provided that both principal and interest shall be payable "in gold coin of the United States," and the notice of election was in that form. The contention of appellant is that the bonds should have been made payable "in gold coin or lawful money of the United States," and not in "gold coin" only. The argument is that, because the previous statutes authorizing the issuance of bonds (Act March 19, 1889, —St. 1889, p. 399; and Act March 11, 1891,—St. 1891, p. 94) were silent as to the kind of money in which the bonds might be made payable, and there was no restriction in this regard; therefore the amendment introducing a restriction was intended to limit the power and to compel the proper authorities to insert the precise language of the statute, and all of it, to wit, "gold coin or lawful money of the United States"; and, not having done so, the bonds were void. Appellant relies upon Skinner v. City of Santa Rosa, 107 Cal. 464, 40 Pac. 742. The respondents reply that the intention of the statute was to leave with the municipality the option of making the bonds payable in either "gold coin" or in "lawful money of the United States." In the case of Skinner v. City of Santa Rosa the ordinance calling a special election to vote upon the bonds described them as serials, "payable in gold coin or lawful money of the United States," following the language of the statute. The notice of the election contained the same description of the bonds proposed to be issued. There were some features introduced about which other questions arose, not involved in this case. After the election, at which the vote was favorable to the issue, bonds were prepared in exact conformity to all the particulars stated in the notice; i. e. the bond was "payable in gold coin or lawful money of the United States." Steps were taken to sell the bonds, but, failing to find a purchaser in their then form, the city council passed another ordinance rescinding the former ordinance, prescribing the form of the bond, and changed the form in three particulars: (1) They were made payable at the Chemical Bank in New York City, instead of the place named in the notice. (2) They were made payable "in gold coin of the United States of America of the present standard of weight and fineness," instead of the statutory form, and as stated in the notice. (3) Interest was made payable semiannually in like gold coin, instead of annually, as stated in the notice. The question presented and decided was, has the assent of the voters been given to the proposed bond? One of the changes made was to make the bond "payable in gold coin of the United States of the present weight and fineness," whereas the voters had voted upon a bond "payable in gold coin or lawful money of the United States"; and the court said: "The kind of money in which payment must be made would influence any business man in determining whether he will favor his municipality incurring a debt for the payment of which, in common with others, his property is liable to taxation." The decision is based largely upon the proposition that the city council could not change the terms of the submission after the vote was taken, but it also points strongly to the further proposition that the council must submit to the voters a bond in strict conformity to the statute, for it is said in the opinion that "the logical inference from the case above cited [referring to Yesler v. City of Seattle, 1 Wash. St. 308, 25 Pac. 1014] is that, as to all matters required to be submitted, such submission measures the authority of the common council." The opinion then calls attention to the fact that the law prior to 1893 was silent as to the kind of money in which payment should be made, but that by that latter act an amendment required that the bonds and interest "shall be payable in gold coin or lawful money of the United States; that before this amendment there was no restriction as to the kind of coin or currency; that the power to determine that question was as ample as that of a natural person to stipulate in what his personal obligations should be paid." The opinion then says: "The amendment must, therefore, have been intended to restrict that power, and this was done by expressly stating the kind of money in which alone they 'shall be' made payable." And it is added: "Whether the increased value of the bonds caused by the stipulation that they [referring to the Santa Rosa bonds] shall be paid in gold coin of the present standard of weight and fineness would equal or exceed any probable appreciation of gold cannot control the express provisions of the statute in that regard." The court holds, in conclusion, that, where the case arises before the bonds have been delivered, the city has no power to issue them in a form which does not substantially comply with the terms stated in the ordinance of submission and notice of election, and with the statute under which the proceedings were had.

In the case at bar the bonds are in conformity with the ordinance and with the notice of election, but they are not in the terms of the statute as to the kind of money made payable, and the question is, do they substantially comply with the statute? It seems to me that to hold that they do would violate the reasoning upon which Skinner v. City of Santa Rosa rests. Respondent, with much force and reason, suggests: "That the plain grammatical and common-sense construction is that the city should choose between the two kinds of currency. It must adopt one or the other, but the wisdom as well as the expediency and responsibility of the choice was left to the people themselves or their representatives. That they might deem it more advantageous to themselves, in seeking a market for their bonds, to pay in gold; and the legislature did not intend to deprive them of this advantage, or to substitute its judgment for theirs." This, it seems to me, is as strong a view as it is possible to present, and covers concisely the whole argument. But this is precisely what the legislature did when it passed the act in 1889, and later, when it was amended, in 1891, the municipality was left without restriction. If, then, the legislature so intended the law to remain, why did it amend the act in this very particular? We had the same kind of money in 1889 and 1891 as in 1893. In fact all our money was of equal value, and no conceivable motive occurring to my mind could have actuated the legislature to introduce this amendment unless it was to provide against a possibility that the time might come when "gold coin" would have a different value from that of some other "lawful money of the United States." If "gold coin" and "lawful money of the United States" were terms importing money of equal, fixed, and unchangeable value, there would have been no occasion for a change in the law. But, as this is not true, I can see a motive in so providing that the maker of the bonds should always have the option to pay in that money declared by the United States to be lawful money.

2. It is further contended that the question as to whether the interest on the bonds would be payable annually or semiannually was not submitted to the voters, but should have been. I think the law was fully complied with in this particular. The term "five per cent. per annum" means interest payable annually, and this is the form prescribed in the bond. There is no merit in this point.

3. Appellant objects further that the ballot used was a violation of the directions in the notice of election; that the notice required the voter to write the word "Yes" or "No" opposite the proposition he desired to vote for, whereas by the ballot voted he was directed in fact to stamp a cross. It was found by the court that two-thirds of the voters who voted at said special election voted said ticket by stamping a cross opposite the word "Yes" or "No," which was printed after the proposition on said ticket, and in no other way. Appellant says that this method of voting may be good under the Australian ballot system, but, as that system applies to general elections only, not having been made applicable to a special election for the issuance of bonds, but, on the contrary, the city having by ordinance required the voters to indicate their wish by writing or causing to be written or printed "Yes" or "No," the election must be held to be void. Section 6 of Ordinance No. 76 prescribed the manner of holding the election, which was: "(1) As provided by law for holding elections in said city; (2) as provided by the general election laws of this state, except where such general laws may conflict with the state law for elections of the kind hereby called, or with this ordinance; and (3) as provided in this ordinance." The mode of voting for or against the indebtedness was prescribed in several particulars, size of paper, heading of ticket, etc., and, among other things, it was provided as follows: "Each proposition set forth in section 2 of this ordinance shall be voted on separately, and must be printed on such tickets as follows: '(1) Bonding for city waterworks, $90,000. Bonding for sewer improvements, $34,500.' Each voter shall indicate his wish by writing or causing to be written or printed 'Yes' or 'No' on the right-hand margin on his ticket, opposite the proposition on which he may desire to vote." It will be observed that the election was to be held as provided by law for holding elections in the city of San Luis Obispo, and as provided in the ordinance, and the general election law of the state was to be resorted to only (1) where not in conflict with the mode pointed out in the ordinance, or (2) where the general law did not conflict with the state law for elections of the kind called. Section 2, p. 399, St. 1889, prescribes the manner of procedure to call an election for the purposes named. It provides that the legislative branch of the city shall by ordinance "fix the day on which such special election shall be held, the manner of holding such election and the voting for or against incurring such indebtedness; such election shall be held as provided by law for holding such elections in such city, town or municipal corporation." The act of 1891, supra, made no change in this regard, nor did the act of 1893, supra. Appellant does not challenge the regularity of the proceedings, except in the single fact that the voter made known his wish by stamping a cross after the proposition, instead of writing his wish. The question presented is certainly one involving a clear departure from the provisions of the ordinance. It was plainly stated therein that "each voter shall indicate his wish by writing, or causing to be written or printed, 'Yes' or 'No' on the right-hand margin on his ticket opposite the proposition on which he may desire to vote." The general election law was to be applicable only when not in conflict with the ordinance. It seems to me that the board had no authority for changing the form of the ballot in the feature under consideration. I do not think that, in view of the ordinance, we are at liberty to fall back upon the Australian system, now embodied in our general law, for in the particular mentioned it is in direct conflict with the mandate of the ordinance.

The question, then, is, was the ballot prescribed and voted such compliance with the ordinance as should be upheld by this court? It is true, as respondents suggest, that the words "Yes" and "No" were printed on the ballot opposite the proposition in separate lines, but can it be said that the voter printed them, or caused it to be done? It is true, the ballot is so formed that placing a cross opposite the "Yes" or "No" would convey the wish of the voter, because the ballot informs him that he is to so express his wish, and the operation is easy and simple. The question must, it seems to me, resolve itself into the one proposition: Was the method directed by the ordinance mandatory? In the case of Lay v. Parsons, 104 Cal. 661, 38 Pac. 447, the provisions of the so-called "Australian Ballot Law" were under review. Mr. Justice Van Fleet, speaking for the court, said: "The law requires the voter to mark his ballot by means of a stamp, by putting a cross opposite the name of each candidate thereon for whom he intends to vote. This provision of the law is, we think, mandatory, and no other method will satisfy it." In the case of People v. Town of Sausalito, 106 Cal. 500, 39 Pac. 937, where the same law was before the court, Mr. Justice McFarland said: "Appellant also contends that ballot 'F' should have been counted against incorporation; but it had no mark of any kind, except at the bottom, entirely below all the printed matter, it had the words 'Against Incorporation' written with a pencil, and was properly excluded. There is no provision for that method of voting except when one desires to vote for a candidate for office whose name is not on the printed list on the ballot. Under our present election laws it is not enough to find out generally the intention of the voter (as it was under a former and simpler system). That intention must be expressed in the manner prescribed by the law, which has also other purposes, as the preservation of absolute secrecy," etc. In the case of Tebbe v. Smith, 108 Cal. 101, 41 Pac. 454, the general election law again came under review. Mr. Justice Henshaw, speaking for the court, said: "It is the rule that mandatory provisions for the holding of an election must be followed, or the failure will vitiate it, while the departure from terms of a directory provision will not render it void in the absence of a further showing that the result of the election has been changed, or the rights of the voters injuriously affected thereby. But the rule as to directory provisions applies only to minor and unsubstantial departures therefrom. There may be such radical omissions and failures to comply with the essential terms of a directory provision as will lead to the conclusive presumption that the injury must have followed." Mr. Paine, in his work on Elections, says (section 497): "The disregard of directory requirements of law by voters or by officers of registration or election is not, in the absence of fraud, a sufficient ground for rejecting the entire poll of a precinct. But a violation by electors or officers of a mandatory requirement of law which changes or materially affects the result is, even in the absence of fraud, a sufficient ground for rejecting an entire poll when it cannot be purged. Statutes prescribing in affirmative language specific directions for electors or officers of registration or election are directory, unless the acts prescribed are in their nature essential to the validity of the election. Statutes expressly declaring specified acts or omissions fatal to the validity of an election, or expressly prohibiting the performance or omission of specified acts, are mandatory;" and he adds: "The most unimportant requirements may be made mandatory by a clear expression of the legislative will." In the case here it can hardly be said that the manner of indicating the voters' wish was unimportant, but, whether so or not, the ordinance did very clearly declare that "each voter shall indicate his wish in writing, or causing to be written or printed, 'Yes' or 'No' on the right-hand margin on his ticket opposite the proposition on which he may desire to vote." And how can we say that this is not mandatory? or how can we say that an election board could disregard this plain mandate, and change the method so radically? or how can we say that ballots marked with a cross opposite a printed "Yes" or "No" are the equivalent of ballots which the ordinance declared should have written or printed, or caused to be written or printed, on them by the voter himself the word "Yes" or "No"? Respondents cite several cases where official signatures made by the use of a fac simile stamp were held to be good, and like cases, but they do not seem to me to involve the same principle as here. A case is cited also where the form of ballot prescribed was "For the Bonds" or "Against the Bonds," and a ballot was cast with the printed words upon it, "For the Bonds," with a line running through the word "for," and the word "against" written under it, and it was held a valid vote against the bonds; citing Clark v. Commissioners, 6 Pac. 311, 33 Kan. 202. This case is in harmony with others where the question alone is as to the intention of the voter, and where he scratches out a name and writes another in lieu of it, but it does not meet the case where an entirely different method than that prescribed by the statute is adopted for an entire ballot. I think the directions of the ordinance as to the manner of voting were mandatory, and should have been followed. In this view of the case a new trial could avail nothing, and it is therefore recommended that the judgment of the court below be reversed, and judgment be entered for plaintiff as prayed for in the complaint.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the court below is directed to enter judgment for the plaintiff as prayed for in the complaint.

HOWE et al. v. JOHNSON. (Sac. 248.)[1]

SALES — IMMEDIATE DELIVERY — CHANGE OF POSSESSION—CONVERSION—TITLE BEFORE JUDGMENT.

1. W. was indebted to his barkeeper, K., and proposed that if K. would pay him the difference between the debt and value of the stock in the saloon, he would sell them to him. K. had left the employ of W., and another barkeeper had been employed. W.'s offer was accepted, and K. received a bill of sale. The property was delivered to K., the barkeeper was discharged, and the place was locked up by K., who had no license, and who kept the key, and was the only person who thereafter entered the place. The property was subsequently attached by creditors of W. Held, that there was an immediate delivery to K., followed by actual and continued change of possession, as required by Civ. Code, § 3440.

2. The conversion of chattels does not pass the title to the wrongdoer, and before judgment obtained for their value the owner may pass the title to a third person.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Action by S. Luke Howe and Charles M. Beckwith against F. T. Johnson. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. T. Hatfield, for appellant. S. Luke Howe and Chas. M. Beckwith, pro se.

SEARLS, C. This action is brought to recover $500 damages for the unlawful taking and conversion of a stock of liquors, bar fixtures, and furniture, the property of one L. Koch, and by him assigned to the plaintiffs herein December 31, 1895. Defendant denied the allegations of the complaint. For a further answer he justified the taking by showing that he was and is the sheriff of the county of Sacramento; that in an action in which Thomas B. Hall was plaintiff and L. J. Wells was defendant in the justice court of Sacramento township, county of Sacramento, a writ of attachment duly issued, and was placed in his hands for execution; that under and by virtue of said writ he, as sheriff, levied upon and took into his possession the property in question as the property of said L. J. Wells, the defendant in said action. The answer shows that a judgment was subsequently obtained in said action against said Wells, and that an execution issued thereon, under which defendant, as such sheriff, sold the property. The cause was tried by the court, and written findings were filed, in which the court found all the allegations of the complaint were true, except that the value of the property taken was $313 instead of $500, as alleged in the complaint, and except that the articles taken by defendant were those described in his answer. Thereupon judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs. Defendant appeals from the judgment.

The record contains a bill of exceptions or statement of the testimony. The testimony tended to show that L. J. Wells kept a saloon known as the "Yosemite Saloon," at No. 228 J street, Sacramento, in the year 1895, and owned the stock of liquors, cigars, bar fixtures, furniture, etc., therein. L. Koch was a bartender for Wells from October 13 to December 23, 1895, at $65 per month. The latter was indebted to the former in December in the sum of $240, viz. $140 for wages and $100 for money loaned, in evidence of which Koch held the promissory note of said Wells. Koch desired payment, and Wells, having no money, proposed to Koch that if he would pay him another $100 in cash, give up the note, and receipt his demand for wages, he (Wells) would sell to him the stock, fixtures, etc., in the saloon. Koch accepted the offer, and on the 26th day of December, 1895, the sale was consummated, a bill of sale was given to Koch by Wells, the money paid, note given up, claim canceled, etc. Koch received possession of the property, and, having no license to sell liquor, locked up the saloon, and carried the key. Koch was negotiating a sale of some of the fixtures in the saloon, but had not effected a sale, when, on the 30th day of December, 1895, the defendant, sheriff of the county of Sacramento, levied upon and took into his possession said property as the property of said L. J. Wells, under a writ of attachment in favor of T. B. Hall and against said Wells. On December 31, 1895, Koch, in consideration of legal services thereafter to be rendered him by plaintiffs, assigned and transferred to the plaintiffs herein, by bill of sale, all of said property. On January 6, 1896, the plaintiffs made a demand in writing, duly verified, as provided by sections 549 and 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure, upon defendant, requiring him to deliver to them said property, which was refused. There was no evidence tending to show the sale from Wells to Koch to have been fraudulent, unless it be that Wells had no property subject to attachment other than the property in question, and that the sign, "Yosemite Saloon. L. J. Wells, Proprietor," remained upon the place until the property was attached. Defendant denies that Koch was the owner of the property, or that he transferred it to the plaintiffs.

Appellant contends that the sale from Wells to Koch was void, under section 3440 of the Civil Code, for want of "an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession." We think this contention is not supported by the evidence. Koch had ceased to be in the employ of Wells before the sale, and another bartender had been employed. When the sale was made, the property was delivered to Koch, the bartender discharged, and the place locked up by Koch, who kept the key, and was the only person who thereafter entered the place, except such friends as he took in and treated to cigars, etc. There is no evidence that Wells was ever in or about the place after the sale. The consideration paid by Koch seems to have been more than the property was worth, and there is nothing in the evidence showing an intent on the part of Wells to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors. It is apparent from the testimony that Wells was making no profits from the saloon, and was willing to sell to pay his indebtedness to Koch. Under these circumstances we think the evidence warranted the court below in finding in favor of the plaintiff.

2. Appellant contends further that the conversion of the property took place on the 30th day of December, 1895, when the defendant took possession thereof, and that thereafter Koch only had a cause of action against defendant, and that his bill of sale of the property eo nomine made December 31st, or the next day, transferred no interest in the property to plaintiffs upon which they can maintain an action. Title to personal property may pass by act of law. Examples of such change occur in cases of forfeiture, succession, marriage, judgment, insolvency, and intestacy. "On a recovery by law in an action of trespass or trover of the value of a specific chattel, of which the possession had been acquired by tort, the title of the goods is altered by the recovery, and is transferred to the defendant; and the damages recovered are the price of the chattel so transferred by operation of law." 2 Kent, Comm. 388. There is a conflict in the adjudged cases whether the title passes in such cases to the tort feasor upon the recovery of judgment, or only upon its satisfaction. The clear weight of authority is in favor of the latter branch of the proposition, but the question is of no practical importance in the case at bar, and we need not pursue it, as all the authorities agree that in such cases the title does not pass to the wrongdoer upon conversion, and not until judgment obtained for the value of the chattel. Koch, then, if his purchase of the goods was a valid one, had title thereto at the time of his sale to plaintiffs, and the latter, after acquiring such title, might lawfully make demand for their return as provided by statute, and upon a failure or refusal by defendant to yield up possession could maintain an action for conversion. The error of appellant's argument consists in confounding conversion with change of title, which are two very different things, and not at all synonymous. After an unlawful conversion, the owner may, by virtue of his title, maintain replevin to recover possession of the chattels; and, if possession cannot be had, may recover their value, or he may maintain trover for their value as damages. The labor of examining the transcript has been enhanced by the want of an index thereto as required by rule 8 of this court. We find in the cause as presented no cause for reversal, and recommend that the judgment be affirmed.

BOWERS et al. v. MODOC LAND & LIVE-STOCK CO. (Sac. 145.)

CHANGE OF VENUE—CONFLICTING AFFIDAVITS.

A refusal of a change of venue on conflicting affidavits as to where the contract sued on was to be performed will not be disturbed on appeal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Modoc county; C. L. Claflin, Judge.

Action by John H. Bowers and others against the Modoc Land & Live-Stock Company, a corporation. Defendant's motion for a change of venue was denied, and it appeals. Affirmed.

Spencer & Raker and Clarence A. Raker, for appellant. G. F. Harris and H. L. Spargur, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This action was commenced in the superior court of Modoc county to recover the sum of $425, alleged to be the balance due and unpaid for 30 head of cattle sold and delivered by plaintiffs to defendant on or about November 7, 1892, at the agreed price of $22.50 per head. The complaint, which was verified, alleged that defendant paid to plaintiffs, on account of said purchase price, the sum of $250 at the time of the sale and delivery of said cattle, and agreed to pay the balance thereof, $425, on or about April 1, 1893. It also alleged "that the aforesaid sale of said cattle was made, and the obligation from defendant to plaintiffs hereinbefore set out arose and is payable, within the county of Modoc, state of California." After being served with summons, defendant appeared, and filed a demurrer to the complaint, an affidavit of merits, and a demand in writing that the place of trial of the action be changed to the city and county of San Francisco. The demand was based upon the grounds that, for many years prior to the commencement of the action, defendant's principal place of business was, and ever since had been, situated in the city and county of San Francisco; that no sale of cattle, as alleged in the complaint, was ever made by plaintiffs to defendant in Modoc county or elsewhere; and that no obligation on the part of defendant to pay plaintiffs for cattle sold ever arose or was payable in Modoc county or elsewhere. The notice served and filed stated that the motion would be "based and heard on affidavits and oral and documentary evidence to be introduced at the hearing thereof, and on the records and files in said above-entitled court and cause." The motion was subsequently heard and denied, and, from the order entered, this appeal is prosecuted.

The defendant was organized as a corporation under the laws of this state in 1886, and its articles of incorporation stated that the purposes for which it was formed were "the dealing in, buying, and selling, management, and disposition of land and live stock, and everything pertaining thereto in all respects," and also named the city and county of San Francisco as its principal place of business. Section 16 of article 12 of the constitution provides: "A corporation or association may be sued in the county where the contract is made or is to be performed, or where the obligation or liability arises or the breach occurs; or in the county where the principal place of business of such corporation is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as in other cases." The action was properly brought in Modoc county if the averments in the complaint as to the facts constituting the alleged cause of action were true. The defendant, however, without filing any answer or raising any issue of fact as to these averments, sought at the hearing to prove by affidavits that they were not true, and that plaintiffs had no cause of action whatever against it; and hence it was claimed then, and is claimed here, that the place of trial should be changed. Lakeshore Cattle Co. v. Modoc Land & Livestock Co., 108 Cal. 261, 41 Pac. 472, was a case very similar to this. The action was commenced in Modoc county, and the facts alleged in the complaint showed that the obligation of the defendant to the plaintiff arose in that county. The defendant moved the court to change the place of trial to San Francisco, and, at the hearing of the motion, attempted to controvert the averments of the complaint by the affidavit of one Bayley, its president. The court said: "Without determining whether a court would be authorized in any case to determine that the affidavits presented to it upon a motion of this nature were sufficient to overcome the allegations of the complaint, or to permit these allegations to be determined by affidavits, it is sufficient to say that there is a direct conflict between the affidavit of Bayley and the complaint in the present action, and that we cannot set aside the decision of the court thereon." So, here it is enough to say that, upon the hearing of the motion in this case, there was not only a direct conflict between the affidavits read by defendant and the complaint, but counter affidavits were introduced and read by plaintiffs, which supported the averments of the complaint, and were in direct conflict with the affidavits of defendant. Under these circumstances, the decision of the court cannot be disturbed, and we therefore advise that the order be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order is affirmed.

McGOWAN v. KRELING. (S. F. 720.)[1]

VACATING DEFAULT JUDGMENT.

Before time to answer, defendant procured an order to take the deposition of the plaintiff, to enable him to draw the answer. By written stipulation, several continuances as to the deposition were entered into, and, by final stipulation, the taking of the deposition was continued indefinitely. Defendant meantime had not filed any answer. Held, that a judgment by default after the last continuance, for failure to answer, was properly set aside, it being apparent that defendant intended to make a defense, and relied on the action of plaintiff in agreeing to the continuances aforesaid.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Thomas A. McGowan against Ernestine Kreling. From an order setting aside a judgment by default, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lowenthal (D. J. Murphy, of counsel), for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order of the court below opening the default of the defendant, and setting aside a judgment which had been entered upon said default, in favor of plaintiff, and against the defendant. The action is brought against the respondent, as administratrix of the estate of William Kreling, deceased, to recover quite a large sum of money alleged to be due plaintiff for certain services averred to have been rendered by plaintiff to said Kreling, deceased, in his lifetime. The respondent filed a demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled on April 26, 1895, with leave to the respondent to answer within 10 days thereafter. Before the expiration of the 10 days, the respondent, upon an affidavit that she desired to take the deposition of the plaintiff as a witness before trial, "with a view of preparing her answer to the plaintiff's complaint herein, and also prepare for the trial of said action," had procured an order of the court that the deposition of the plaintiff be taken before a certain notary public on the 24th day of April, 1895. By written stipulation of the parties, the taking of the deposition was continued until the 8th of May, when the taking of it was commenced, and afterwards continued by stipulation to the 11th of May. It was further continued from time to time until May 25th; and, the deposition not having been completed, it was stipulated by the parties that the taking of the deposition be continued indefinitely, "to be reopened upon a notice of three days by either party." The respondent had not filed any answer at the expiration of the 10 days above mentioned, and the appellant had not taken any default, but had entered into a stipulation relative to the taking of said deposition, as above mentioned, while the respondent was in default for want of an answer; but on June 7, 1895, the clerk of the court entered the default, in which it was recited that the demurrer was overruled, and "notice thereof having been given and served upon the defendant." A few days afterwards, the respondent gave notice of a motion to set aside the default, which was accompanied by an affidavit of merits, made by respondent, and also by a verified answer, setting up a defense upon the merits, and an affidavit of her attorney. The affidavit of her attorney stated, among other things, that the attorney for the appellant agreed orally to serve upon the attorney for the respondent the notice of the overruling of the demurrer, and not to take any further steps in the action until the taking of the deposition of the plaintiff had been completed; and that he relied upon said promise of plaintiff's attorney, and upon his conduct in proceeding to take the deposition, and the consent to continuances thereof, etc.

Counsel for appellant relies mainly upon the proposition that under section 283, Code Civ. Proc., and a certain rule of the court below, a mere verbal agreement between counsel, not entered in the minutes of the court, cannot be enforced if it be disputed or denied, which was done in the case at bar. But the question here is whether or not the court below, under all the circumstances of the case, abused its discretion in setting aside the default. "Applications to set aside defaults are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and, if granted, the orders are never disturbed by this court, except in cases of gross abuse." Chamberlin v. Del Norte Co., 77 Cal. 151, 19 Pac. 271. The case of Woodward v. Backus, 20 Cal. 138, was very similar to the case at bar. In that case the defendant had failed to file an answer in time, because he relied upon the verbal agreement of the attorneys for plaintiff that he might have further time, and the affidavit of defendant's attorney to the agreement was denied by the attorney for the plaintiff; and the court said: "In making the order, the court below was only required to exercise proper discretion, and the order must have been so plainly erroneous as to amount to an abuse of discretion to justify interference on our part. We think it cannot reasonably be held that the discretion of the court has been abused; and, whatever may be our opinion of the strict propriety of the relief granted, we see nothing in the objection taken to authorize a reversal." The point as to the agreement being verbal is not mentioned in the opinion of the court, but that point was presented and argued in the brief of counsel, and must necessarily have been considered by the court. In Huart v. Goyeneche, 56 Cal. 429, this court reversed an order refusing to open a default in a case very similar in principle to the one at bar. In Underwood v. Underwood, 87 Cal. 525, 25 Pac. 1065, the court said: "The showing made on motion to set aside the judgment is a very weak one, but we are always unwilling to interfere with the decisions of the court below in matters of this kind." In the case at bar the action was founded upon transactions apparently not based upon any written contract which occurred during the lifetime of deceased, and about which the administratrix may be supposed to have had but little knowledge; and it was quite proper and prudent for her to endeavor to get some knowledge of the facts from the deposition of the plaintiff before she filed her answer. The court below no doubt considered the fact that the appellant united in taking the deposition of the plaintiff, and stipulated for various continuances after the defendant had been in default, and that this conduct naturally deceived the respondent. It was quite apparent that the respondent intended to make a defense to the action, and that the furtherance of justice required the opening of the default. No doubt, counsel for respondent, under the circumstances which appear in the affidavit of appellant's counsel, was unwise in subjecting himself to the danger of suffering a default; and the court imposed a penalty of $125 as a condition of the permission to answer. A trial judge is generally acquainted with the attorneys and parties who come before him, and is much better qualified to do justice in a case like this than is an appellate court dealing only with the printed record; and, under all the circumstances of this case, we do not feel warranted in saying that the court below abused its discretion in opening the default. Order appealed from is affirmed.

COUNTERCLAIM — FAILURE TO PLEAD — AMENDED ANSWER—LIMITATIONS—FINDINGS — HARMLESS ERROR.

1. An attorney sued for services under a contract. Defendant claimed damages from negligent advice given by plaintiff before the contract was made, and not given in the performance of the services sued for. Held, that defendant's claim, being for unliquidated damages, should be pleaded, to be available, even though treated as a cross demand, within Code Civ. Proc. § 440, providing that "when cross demands have existed between persons under such circumstances that, if one had brought an action against the other, a counterclaim could have been set up, the two demands shall be deemed compensated, so far as they equal each other, and neither can be deprived of the benefit thereof by the assignment or death of the other."

2. Not having been pleaded in the original answer, limitations ran against defendant's claim, till set up in an amended answer.

3. The trial court's failure to find on issues presented by a counterclaim against which limitations have run is immaterial, where findings upon such issues could not have defeated the bar of limitations.

4. A concluding finding that "all other averments in the pleadings herein and in issue, not comprised and passed upon in these findings, are not true," is improper, but is not reversible error, where the preceding findings are so full and specific, and so clearly cover all the material issues, as to rebut the suggestion of uncertainty.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John C. Campbell, Judge.

Action by C. J. Perkins against the West Coast Lumber Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. W. Gregg, for appellant. Rolfe & Rolfe and Paris & Allison, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This action is prosecuted by the plaintiff, an attorney at law, to recover for professional services rendered to the defendant under a special contract made June 4, 1888, and for moneys paid out for the defendant at its request. Said contract fixed a monthly salary as a retainer, and for advice, etc., and provided that for his services in litigated cases he should have a reasonable compensation. This contract was terminated March 1, 1890. After deducting payments, and an account against the plaintiff for lumber, the court found there was due the plaintiff $1,879.75, with interest thereon from the commencement of the action; and from the judgment entered thereon the defendant appeals upon the judgment roll.

The principal question arises out of a counterclaim for damages pleaded by the defendant, wherein it was alleged, in substance, that in 1887 J. W. Newman, as contractor, agreed to erect for A. P. Clubine 12 frame dwelling houses, for which Newman was to be paid, upon completion, $8,200; that the buildings were completed on April 19, 1888; that the contract was not recorded until long after the work was commenced; that defendant furnished the contractor lumber to be used in the erection of said houses, and which was used therein, of the value of $3,408.77; that on May 18, 1888, the plaintiff, as the attorney of defendant, advised it not to file a lien against said buildings for the material so furnished, as defendant would obtain the amount due it out of the foreclosure suit and lien judgment Newman would obtain in the foreclosure of his lien; that, at the time he so advised defendant, he knew that the contract was not filed for record in the recorder's office until long after the work was commenced; that Newman obtained judgment against Clubine May 16, 1888, but acquired no lien, because of the failure to file the contract in time, and that said judgment has not been paid, because of the insolvency of Clubine; and that Newman is insolvent. This action was commenced by the plaintiff on April 24, 1890, and this counterclaim was first pleaded July 21, 1894. And for the purpose of avoiding the statute of limitations the defendant further alleged that its cause of action for said damages arose out of the transactions set forth in the complaint; that, at the time said advice was given, defendant had no other legal adviser; and that it was agreed and understood at the time the contract of June 4th was entered into that it included the counsel and advice above mentioned, and that at the time the advice was so given a formal agreement as to compensation should be made, and should include the advice so given. To this counterclaim the plaintiff pleaded that it was barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339, Code Civ. Proc. The court found that said advice was given, and that defendant was damaged thereby as alleged, but that no fee was charged by the plaintiff therefor, and that its cause of action was barred by the statute, which requires such actions to be brought within two years. Appellant contends that its counterclaim for damages is not barred by the statute; that said advice was given on April 17, 1888, two years and seven days before plaintiff brought suit, but that the advice was not legally injurious until the time expired within which the defendant might have filed his notice of lien, viz. May 20, 1888; and that this action was commenced by the plaintiff on April 24, 1890.

[1] Reversed in banc. See 52 Pac. 115, 120 Cal. 27.

Upon the first trial of this case the defendant was permitted by the court to give evidence of its said claim for damages without having pleaded it, and recovered therefor, but on appeal by the plaintiff it was held that the finding of damages in favor of the defendant should be disregarded because not responsive to any issue in the case; "that even if it were conceded that the claim for such damage by defendant is a cross demand, within the meaning of section 440 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it would still be necessary to plead it, under the circumstances of this case. It cannot be considered the debit side of the account sued on. It is an unliquidated demand for damages." 33 Pac. 1118. That it was necessary to plead defendant's claim for damages is conclusively settled by the former appeal, and, that being true, it follows that, not having been pleaded within the time limited by the statute, it was barred; such pleading, though made by the defendant in the action by way of counterclaim or cross demand, being the commencement of an action therefor. We see no distinction between an amended answer which sets up a cross demand against the plaintiff, and an amended complaint setting up a new cause of action against the defendant, so far as the statute of limitations is concerned; and as to the latter the bar is determined by the date of the amendment, and not by the date of the commencement of the action. Anderson v. Mayers, 50 Cal. 525; Atkinson v. Canal Co., 53 Cal. 102. It is argued by appellant, however, that plaintiff upon the former appeal made the point that said damages were barred, and that, if this court had been of that opinon, it would have said so. But that question was not before the court upon the record, and its silence cannot be construed as a decision of the question.

Appellant's further contention that the court failed to find upon material issues presented by said counterclaim cannot be sustained. As was held upon the former appeal, it was necessary to plead defendant's demand for damages, even if such cross demand were within the meaning of section 440, Code Civ. Proc.; and, as the bar of the statute must be determined by the date at which such demand is pleaded, it is obvious that, if all the allegations of the sixth paragraph of said counterclaim had been specifically found by the court to be true, it would not avail to defeat the finding that its claim for damages was barred, and in view of that finding it is immaterial whether the wrong advice which caused the damage was given under, or was embraced within, the special contract of June 4, 1888, or not.

It is also contended that the judgment must be reversed because of the sixteenth finding, which is as follows: "That all other averments in the pleadings herein and in issue, not comprised and passed upon in these findings, are not true." We do not see why this so-called finding was made. We have discovered no material issue which is not covered by the specific findings, nor are we pointed to any supposed omissions to find, except those already noticed. This, however, is not a finding upon any issue, but it finds that "all averments in the pleadings" not covered by the preceding findings, whether made by the plaintiff or defendant, are not true; and, if not true, they could not be the basis of any specific finding in favor of either party against the other which could affect the judgment. Such statements, however, are suggestive of uncertainty, and are therefore mischievous, and should not be encouraged. We do not think this finding will justify a reversal of the judgment. The preceding findings are so full and specific, and so clearly cover all the material issues, as to rebut the suggestion of uncertainty; and in this respect we think this case may be distinguished from Harlan v. Ely, 55 Cal. 344, Bank v. Treadwell, Id. 380, and other cases cited by appellant. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

WILSON et al. v. CARTER. (L. A. 208.)

QUIETING TITLE—PARTIES—PLEADING.

Where a complaint alleges that, after defendant ceased to be collector of an irrigation district, he sold plaintiffs' land as such, and issued certificates of sale, and asks that such certificates be set aside as a cloud on title, but fails to allege that defendant holds any of the certificates, or has any interest in the land, or to join the irrigation district or the certificate holders, such failure is not a mere nonjoinder of parties, but a failure to plead a cause of action against the party sued.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by James W. Wilson and others against Henry W. Carter. There was a judgment on demurrer sustained to the complaint, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Mulford & Pollard, for appellants. Frank A. Cattern, for respondent.

BRITT, C. In this case a demurrer to plaintiffs' amended complaint was sustained without leave to amend further, and judgment final was rendered for defendant. It is alleged in said complaint, among numerous other matters, that plaintiffs are the owners of lands situated within a certain irrigation district in Los Angeles county; that defendant was prior to March 6, 1895, the duly elected and qualified collector of said district; that on February 15, 1895, he offered the lands of plaintiffs for sale to enforce an unpaid assessment levied thereon by the district for the year 1894, and that plaintiffs "bid in" the same. in order to prevent the purchase thereof by strangers; that on March 6, 1895, defendant ceased to be the collector of said district, and his successor was installed in office; that, nevertheless, on March 24, 1895, defendant resold to divers persons at public auction the said lands of plaintiffs, and issued certificates of sale thereof, which certificates are of record in the county recorder's office, and are a cloud on plaintiffs' title. There is no averment that defendant has any interest in the land, or in the said certificates of sale. It is prayed that the sale and said certificates be adjudged null and void; that such certificates be delivered up and canceled; and that plaintiffs be declared the owners of said lands, discharged of the lien of said assessment.

If judgment had passed as prayed by plaintiffs, it would have determined nothing, for the obvious reason that no person to be affected thereby is before the court as a party defendant. The complaint shows that the only defendant named was, but is no longer, an officer of the irrigation district. The district itself is not joined, and no purchaser of plaintiffs' lands or holder of a certificate of sale is made a party. Here is not a mere nonjoinder of interested parties, where failure to plead the fact is a waiver of the objection, but a proceeding against one person, when, for all purposes of the suit, the cause of action, if any exists, is wholly against others. It seems, from the argument of counsel, that the demurrer was sustained by the superior court on grounds different from those we have suggested; but, as the view here indicated is conclusive of the case, it is unnecessary to consider other questions made regarding the effect of various transactions, set out in the complaint, between plaintiffs and the irrigation district. The judgment should be affirmed.

PEOPLE v. McCARTY. (Cr. 283.)

CRIMINAL LAW—EXCLUSION OF WITNESSES—EVIDENCE.

1. The exclusion of witnesses while the evidence is being taken is largely in the discretion of the trial court.

2. On trial for burglary the evidence showed that defendant, by means of a tunnel leading from a cellar, entered and robbed a certain bank; that defendant and his confederates entered the cellar during the afternoon, and came out at 12 o'clock at night. Held, that the question whether the robbery was committed at night so as to constitute burglary in the first degree was for the jury.

J. J. McCarty was convicted of burglary, and appeals. Affirmed.

A. B. Hotchkiss, Davis & Mott, and Angus Roy Shannon, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and W. H. Anderson, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of burglary of the first degree, and appeals from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

There was no error committed by the court in allowing the witness Auble to remain in the court room during the examination of witnesses. The exclusion of witnesses during the time in which the evidence is being placed before the jury is a matter largely in the discretion of the trial court. No abuse of that discretion is disclosed here. People v. Hong Ah Duck, 61 Cal. 387. It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict of burglary in the first degree, the claim being that, if a burglary was committed the act was done in the daytime, and therefore it was burglary of the second degree. The defendant and others constructed a tunnel some 120 feet in length from the cellar of a certain saloon to a point immediately beneath the floor of a certain bank building in the city of Los Angeles, for the purpose of committing larceny. Upon the day set for the actual entry through the floor into the building the defendant and his confederates some time during the afternoon entered the cellar, one of them emerging therefrom at 7 o'clock p. m., for the purpose, he stated, of securing fresh air. The others came out of the cellar at 12 o'clock that night. The burglary was committed by these men at some time during these hours. The finding of the jury on this question was a matter peculiarly within their province, and upon this evidence the court will not disturb the verdict in this regard. Again, it is contended that there is not sufficient evidence corroborating the testimony of the accomplice Jones. Without reciting the corroborating evidence disclosed by the record, it is sufficient to say we are entirely satisfied with it. It is ample to satisfy the demands of the statute, and, taking all the evidence together, defendant's guilt is plainly apparent. There is no merit in the remaining points made in defendant's brief. For the foregoing reasons the order appealed from is affirmed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Delia McDowell against Henry W. Hyman and others for damages sustained as tenant. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, for appellants. Smith & Murasky, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to recover damages sustained by the plaintiff as a tenant of the defendants of the third and fourth floors of the building 105 Stockton street, San Francisco, by reason of repairs and alterations made by defendants upon the second floor of said building, whereby the business of the plaintiff as the keeper of a lodging house was injured, her water supply cut off, her furniture damaged by dust and lime, her ingress and egress interfered with by débris in the halls and on the stairs, in consequence of which her lodgers forsook their rooms, etc. The answer denies that plaintiff was at any time an occupant of the third floor of said building as a tenant of the defendants or otherwise; admits that they made repairs on the second floor, and that plaintiff was their tenant of the fourth floor of the house up to April 1, 1889; and denies most of the other allegations of the amended complaint. Plaintiff had a verdict for $900, upon which judgment was entered. Defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The first point made by appellants for reversal is that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that plaintiff was the tenant of the third floor of the building. It would appear that the original complaint averred that plaintiff was the tenant of the fourth or upper floor of the building. At the trial, plaintiff, who was a witness in her own behalf, had testified that she "was engaged in the lodging-house business in the years 1888 and 1889 at No. 105 Stockton street; had been engaged in that business since 1880; had the third and fourth floors of the building, which were used as a lodging house," etc. Thereupon the court, on motion of plaintiff, permitted her to amend her complaint by inserting the words "third floor," so as to read "plaintiff carried on the lodging business on the third and fourth floors." Subsequently plaintiff testified that she used both floors as a lodging house; that when Hyman became owner of the house she entered into an arrangement with him concerning the rent of the third and fourth floors, and told him she had both floors; that she had her sister, Miss Johnston, manage the third floor, and that plaintiff managed the top floor. She also told Madison & Burke's agent, who collected the rent, the same thing. She paid her sister $30 per month to manage the third floor, and that the latter always paid the rent of the third floor. On the other hand, Catherine Johnston, the sister of plaintiff, on cross-examination said: "When the supreme court moved out, I took the third floor. Paid $150 per month for it. After Mr. Hyman became the owner, I paid the rent each month to Madison & Burke's collector in my own name, and took the receipts in my own name. My sister at the same time paid the rent for the floor which she occupied. The rents were not paid at the same time. I paid the rent for the floor which I occupied, and my sister paid the rent for the floor which she occupied." It further appeared that defendants served two notices upon plaintiff in reference to the upper or fourth floor, one raising the rent thereof from $150 per month to $450, and the other requiring her to vacate said floor within three days; and that they wanted Miss Johnston to take both floors, and let her sister go, giving as a reason therefor that plaintiff gambled in stocks, and was never home. H. W. Hyman, one of the defendants, testified that they (Hyman Bros.) bought the property May 1, 1888; that he was introduced to the tenants by Columbus Bartlett, the attorney for the estate from which he purchased. Plaintiff occupied the fourth floor, and Miss Johnston the third. Plaintiff never claimed to be the tenant of the third floor. "The first time I heard that she claimed to be a tenant of the third and fourth floors was in this court yesterday." I. H. Hahns, a member of the firm of Madison & Burke, and head collector for the firm, testified that he collected the rents; called with Mr. Hyman, and was introduced by him to the tenants on May 1, 1888, as follows: "This is Mrs. McDowell [plaintiff], who occupies the upper floor, and this is Miss Johnston, on the third floor. And he said, 'in future pay the rent to Madison & Burke.'" He afterwards collected the rent from them severally for the third and fourth floors,—from plaintiff for fourth, and from Miss Johnston for third,—and gave them separate receipts therefor. We have stated the evidence, or its substance, on this point, at length, out of respect to the apparent sincerity with which counsel have urged the point. There can be but one result, however, in the end, and that is voiced by the oft-repeated statement that there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, and in such cases the verdict will not be disturbed upon the ground that it is contrary to the evidence. If the jury believed the testimony of the plaintiff, they were justified in finding in her behalf on the question under consideration. Again, the court instructed the jury very clearly that the question of the tenancy of plaintiff of the third floor was one of fact for their determination, and that, if they found on that question in favor of defendants, and found further that plaintiff was entitled to recover, then, and in that case, it could only be for such damages as she sustained in the use and enjoyment of and to the property in and on the fourth floor. Non constat but that the jury may have found plaintiff was not the tenant of the third floor, but at the same time found her entitled to recover $900 on account of the disturbance to her use and enjoyment of the fourth floor, and the consequential destruction of her business by the loss of her lodgers, which business, as she testified, yielded her a profit of several hundred dollars per month, coupled with injury to her furniture, etc. In this state of the case we are not prepared to say that the verdict is, in the light of the evidence, so excessive as to warrant the inference that it was given under the influence of prejudice or passion.

2. The second point made by appellants is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The sufficiency of the complaint, and the propriety of the action of the court in giving and refusing instructions to the jury, depend mainly upon the same general principle. The complaint does not count upon the negligence of the defendants in making repairs upon the second floor of the building, but is founded upon the theory that plaintiff was the tenant of defendants of the two upper floors of the building; that defendants, as owners of the building, conducted certain alterations and improvements on the second floor by tearing out partitions and walls, putting in new partitions, plastering, removing the front doors, etc., whereby plaintiff was damaged, and her quiet enjoyment of the premises as a tenant was interfered with. The contention of appellants is that the law relating to landlord and tenant, where lodgings or apartments or floors are rented, is different from what it is where an entire building is rented. That in the latter case the premises pass into the exclusive possession and control of the tenant; but that in the former case—that is to say, where a portion only of a building is let, and the tenant has rights in common with the landlord and other tenants—the landlord retains all the rights and is subject to all the responsibilities of a general owner to all persons, including the tenant or tenants of his building. That in such cases the principle is deducible that only that which is reasonably essential to the enjoyment of the premises leased passes to the tenant, and that, as to the portions of a building retained by the landlord, he has all the rights of an owner, and is only liable for a negligent exercise of those rights. Put more tersely, the contention is that, in the case at bar the defendants are only liable for negligence, and, as negligence is not charged in the complaint, the pleading was insufficient, and the instructions, which proceeded upon the theory that plaintiff could recover without an allegation and proof of negligence, are erroneous. "An agreement to let upon hire binds the letter to secure to the hirer the quiet possession of the thing hired during the term of the hiring, against all persons lawfully claiming the same." Civ. Code, § 1927. The principal covenant on the part of a landlord, which, if not expressed, is implied, is that his tenant shall have the quiet enjoyment and possession of the premises during the continuance of the term. "This covenant, whether expressed or implied, means that the tenant shall not be evicted or disturbed by the lessor, or by persons deriving title from him, or by virtue of a title paramount to his, and implies no warranty against the acts of strangers. It is equivalent to a stipulation that the lessee shall not be rightfully disturbed in his possession during the term, not that he shall not be disturbed at all." 1 Tayl. Landl. & Ten. § 305. If the tenant is evicted, or his possession disturbed by another tenant of a portion of the same premises, or by any other stranger to the title, the covenant is not broken, and his redress is not against the landlord, but against the wrongdoer. "Flats are as much separate dwellings as ordinary adjoining houses are. The difference is that flats are under one roof, and are divided one from another by a horizontal plane, but ordinary adjoining houses by a perpendicular or vertical plane." Stamper v. Sunderland, L. R. 3 C. P., at page 400. "Where these flats are separate tenements, though under one roof, yet, if the owner does not reside as such on the premises, or retain control of the whole, a letting will create a tenancy and interest in real estate, though there is an outer door or gate in charge of a porter, as the tenants have an equal control thereof or easement therein." Tayl. Landl. & Ten. § 66. A mere lodger is one who occupies a room or portion of a tenement, which is under the control or in the occupancy of another, and he has no interest in real estate.

Counsel for appellants have discussed at some length the relative rights of separate tenants in the same tenement or building. Ordinarily, they occupy no contractual relation to one another, and their rights and liabilities depend upon different principles. We are here concerned with the question of the rights between landlord and tenant, upon the former of whom rests the implied agreement for the quiet enjoyment and possession by the latter of the premises she occupied. The landlords, as the owners of the second floor, had an undoubted right to repair, alter, and improve that portion of their premises, but in so doing they were bound by their implied agreement to so conduct their operations as not to dispossess or render uninhabitable the portion of the building they had demised to others, and, if they failed in this duty, they were liable to their tenant, irrespective of the question of negligence. As against third parties, they could take down the outer or inner walls of the building at will, subject only to such negligence and consequent injury as might render them liable to parties injured thereby, but as against their tenant they could not do the same thing, even in the most careful manner, if the result destroyed the quiet enjoyment of such tenant. This was the distinction taken by the learned judge in overruling the demurrer to plaintiff's complaint and in giving and refusing instructions to the jury, in all of which we think he was correct. We would gladly examine the several instructions seriatim, but their length and the space already occupied forbids our so doing. A careful analysis of those instructions convinces us that, within the theory we have enunciated, no reversible error was committed at the trial, and we recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

BARNEY et al. v. PFORR. (S. F. 482.) [1]

CORPORATIONS—DEEDS—VALIDITY.

One claiming under the deed of a corporation executed without the corporate seal by persons signing as trustees must show affirmatively that it was authorized by a resolution of the directors entered on the records of the corporation, or that it was ratified by such a resolution.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Ejectment by Mary E. Barney and another against John Pforr. A nonsuit was granted, and from an order denying a new trial plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Blake & Harrison, for appellants. Pringle, Hayne & Boyd, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action of ejectment to recover possession of a parcel of land in the southerly part of the city and county of San Francisco. Defendant denied the title of plaintiffs, and pleaded the bar of the statute of limitations, as provided by sections 318, 319, Code Civ. Proc. At the trial a nonsuit was granted on motion of defendant, and plaintiffs appeal from an order of the court denying their motion for a new trial.

The question involved turns upon the propriety of a ruling of the court excluding a deed of conveyance of the property in question by the Islais and Salinas Water Company (a corporation) to Henry B. Potter and Abel Wade, dated January 2, 1861. Plaintiffs claimed under said Potter and Wade. A like deed from the same grantor to Charles Mayne was the subject of a like ruling, but, as the deed first indicated presents the question fully, further mention of the Mayne deed is unnecessary. The deed to Potter and Wade describes the grantor as follows: "The Islais and Salinas Water Company, a corporation duly formed under the laws of the state of California, having its principal place of business in the city and county of San Francisco, of the first part," etc. The deed continues in the usual form, and, after the habendum clause, closes as follows: "In witness whereof, the said party of the first part hath caused these presents to be signed with its corporate name by Francis L. A. Pioche, Henry A. Cobb, and Cornelius De Boom, the trustees of said corporation, and to be sealed by said trustees with their respective private seals (said corporation having no common seal), at the city and county of San Francisco, the day and year first above written. [Signed] The Islais and Salinas Water Company, by F. L. A. Pioche [Seal], H. A. Cobb [Seal], C. De Boom [Seal], Trustees." Proof was made that the corporation grantor had three trustees, but there was no proof that the parties signing the deed were such trustees, nor was there any authority shown from the corporation to any one to make the sale or to convey the land; nor was there any resolution ratifying such conveyance. To support the deed of a corporation, which, as in this case, is without a corporate seal, "it is incumbent on the party relying on it to show affirmatively that it was executed by authority of a resolution of the board of directors, entered on the records of the corporation, or that it was ratified by such a resolution." Fudickar v. Irrigation Dist., 109 Cal. 29, 41 Pac. 1024; Smith v. Dorn, 96 Cal. 73, 30 Pac. 1024; Salfield v. Reclamation Co., 94 Cal. 546, 29 Pac. 1105; Alta Silver Min. Co. v. Alta Placer Min. Co., 78 Cal. 629, 21 Pac. 373; Association v. Bustamente, 52 Cal. 192; Gashwiler v. Willis, 33 Cal. 11. These cases establish the doctrine enunciated in the above quotation so firmly that further elaboration is deemed unnecessary.

Appellant claims that, conceding there was not sufficient authority shown from the corporation to the persons who executed the deed to convey, there was a ratification, as is shown by the delivery of the deed by the trustees, receipt of the consideration, and placing the vendees in possession. The infirmity of this argument is: (1) There is no proof that the persons who executed the instrument were trustees of the corporation. (2) There is no proof that any consideration was ever received by the corporation except as recited in the deed, and, as that was not executed by the corporation, no presumption arises that it received any consideration. (3) Wade and Potter are shown to have been squatters as early as 1853 upon the land in dispute, with a large area in addition, amounting probably to 30 acres, and there is no evidence that any possession of any of the land was delivered to or accepted by them from the corporation, grantor in the disputed deed. The case falls far short of showing a ratification by the corporation of the conveyance to Wade and Potter. Aside from the deeds which were properly excluded, the evidence failed to show a possession in plaintiffs sufficient to support ejectment. We recommend that the order appealed from be affirmed.

CARDOZA et al. v. CALKINS et al. (Sac. 200.)

WATER RIGHTS—TITLE—APPROPRIATION.

1. Plaintiff's actual and peaceable enjoyment and possession of waters is sufficient title as against one who diverts them during such possession, and shows no better title.

2. One who files notice of appropriation of waters, but does not construct a ditch to divert them, and never takes any of the water till eight or ten years after, when in two or three instances he diverts it in a fugitive manner by tapping the ditch of another, makes no valid appropriation.

3. Efforts of persons having water rights to amicably adjust the claim of another to the use of the waters give no validity to his claim.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Action by Manuel P. Cardoza and others against James W. Calkins and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

James F. Farraher, for appellants. Warren & Taylor, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. The action involves the right to the use of the waters of two gulches known respectively as "Heybrook Gulch" and "Barker Gulch," tributary to Greenhorn creek, in Siskiyou county. The complaint alleges the ownership in plaintiffs and their predecessors for upwards of 40 years of a ditch known as the "Cornish & Co. Ditch," which taps said Greenhorn creek, and in its course along the bank of said creek crosses the two gulches named, and takes the waters therefrom; that the carrying capacity of said ditch is 300 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure, and that by means thereof plaintiffs and their predecessors have, during said period, and down to the interference of the defendants, appropriated from said creek and said gulches, and devoted to a beneficial use, that quantity of water, which ordinarily included all of the waters of said two gulches; that the plaintiffs' right includes the use of the waters of said creek every day between the hours of 6 o'clock p. m. and 6 o'clock a. m. and the waters of said gulches all of the time, both day and night; that in January, 1895, within 30 days prior to the bringing of the action, and at a time when there was less than 300 inches of water available to plaintiffs from said source, defendants, without right, by means of flumes, etc., diverted the waters of said gulches from plaintiffs' ditch to their own use, and have since continued so to do, and refuse to permit plaintiffs to restore said waters to said ditch. In a separate count the complaint sets up a prescriptive right in plaintiffs to the use of said waters. The prayer is for an injunction. The answers deny plaintiffs' right, by appropriation or otherwise, to the waters of said gulches, and set up in defendants Smith and Harrison a right to the waters of Heybrook gulch, and in the defendants Calkins and Plummer the right to the waters of Barker gulch. The court found in plaintiffs the ownership of the ditch as alleged, and an exclusive right to the waters of Greenhorn creek and the said gulches "from the hour of 6 o'clock p. m. of each day to 6 o'clock a. m. of the following day," but found "that the use of the waters of Heybrook and Barker gulches has never been appropriated, held, or used by plaintiffs or their predecessors in interest, to wit, Morris, Renner, Trustee, and Thomas Orr, as a right during the daytime; that is, between the hours of 6 o'clock a. m. and 6 o'clock p. m., since the construction of said Cornish & Co. ditch. But the waters of said gulches have been used by the miners in main Greenhorn creek and said gulches during the day for many years last past." It further found that the defendant Smith had, during the month of January, 1895, diverted the waters of Heybrook gulch as alleged, and that during said month defendants Calkins, Plummer, and Harrison had diverted the waters of Barker gulch, but that such diversion was only during the daytime, and was not wrongful as against plaintiffs. It also found against any prescriptive right in plaintiffs. Judgment was entered for the defendants. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment and from an order denying them a new trial, contending mainly that the findings are against the evidence.

The evidence as presented in the record is not as specific and satisfactory on behalf of either party as might be wished. On behalf of plaintiff it shows that one Burgess built the Cornish & Co. ditch in 1852, and by means thereof took and appropriated to a beneficial use all the waters of main Greenhorn creek and its tributaries, including the two gulches in dispute, when the ditch would hold them, which it would at all ordinary times, and when not he took all that the ditch would carry, which was about 300 miner's inches; and during the time Burgess owned the property he kept the waters of the creek and these gulches running in the ditch all the time, both day and night. Burgess sold out in 1856, but to whom does not appear, and the subsequent ownership of the ditch and water right, and the extent of the use of these waters during 1856 and down to about 1879 or 1880, is not definitely disclosed, although the evidence indicates that it was in continuous use during the mining season throughout all these years. Cornish, after whom apparently the ditch came to be known, is the next owner mentioned in the record, but when he became such is not shown. One Thomas Orr bought from Cornish, but the date of the latter's purchase is not given, and the evidence indicates that Orr did not acquire by his purchase the full extent of water right appropriated and exercised by Burgess, at least so far as the waters of Greenhorn creek are concerned; that as to the latter it was limited to the night waters. But the evidence shows without substantial conflict that during all the time Orr owned the property—which was at least from 1879 or 1880 down to 1892—the waters of these gulches were diverted by and ran into the Cornish ditch, and were appropriated by Orr and his lessees, both day and night, without objection or material interruption by any one. In March, 1892, Orr conveyed his interest in the ditch and water right to one Charles Bohnert, the property being described in the deed as "that certain ditch taking in the waters from the main Greenhorn creek and the gulches adjacent thereto, and conducting the same to the north fork of Greenhorn creek, together with the flumes, taps, and reservoirs connected therewith, and formerly known as the 'Cornish & Co. Ditch,' together with the right to all the water in main Greenhorn creek naturally flowing therein from six o'clock p. m. to six o'clock a. m. of each and every day throughout the year. * * * Also all the waters flowing down all the gulches across which the said ditch is built." In January, 1893, Bohnert made a contract of sale and deed in escrow of the ditch and water right to the plaintiffs, wherein the property is described substantially as in the deed from Orr to Bohnert, and under this contract the plaintiffs have since been in possession of and were holding the property at the commencement of the suit. During the ownership of both Bohnert and plaintiffs the disputed waters have been, as theretofore, taken and diverted through the Cornish ditch, both day and night, until January, 1895, when the defendants diverted the same therefrom in the manner alleged.

The evidence on the part of the defendants was to the effect that in June, 1882, one Austin Hawkins filed and recorded a notice stating that he appropriated the waters of Heybrook and Barker gulches "for mining purposes, and to mine the claim situated on said Greenhorn creek, known as the 'Clark and Comstock Placer Mine.'" The notice stated that he intended to divert said waters by means of a ditch (describing it) to be constructed, and giving the point of his intended diversion. No ditch, however, was ever built, nor did it appear that the notice of appropriation was ever posted. Hawkins testified: "I am the Austin Hawkins named in the water notice which you have read. * * * I have used the waters some myself from those gulches, and others through me have used it at different times since the location. A year ago last fall I worked there myself. I have also given other parties consent to go and work there. They used the waters from these gulches through the Cornish & Co. ditch; that is, we took it from that ditch. I could not tell the amount of work that has been done there. I know that my sons Rob and Nort worked there one season. I used the water out of that Cornish & Co. ditch when I worked there. We did not use the water very much any one year,—not to exceed two months in the year,—and I can't say the number of years the water was used. * * * The use of the waters from this Cornish & Co. ditch through me by the other persons whom I have named was without consideration. My familiarity with the Cornish & Co. ditch and my mining claim commenced about 1881, when I located the claim. The ground had previously been occupied by Chinese. This Cornish & Co. ditch runs across a portion of my claim, and it was there when I located the claim. The waters from Heybrook and Barker gulches ran into this Cornish & Co. ditch, and from there we took it onto our ground." He also testified that one Tryon, while attending the Cornish ditch under Thomas Orr, applied to him at different times to get "the exclusive privilege of the day water of those gulches," which he declined to grant him; and that the winter before the suit was brought, while his boys were working on his claim, plaintiffs came to him, and wanted to "make arrangements with me to allow the boys to use the night water, and let them use the day water. * * * At that time the main ditch ran from Greenhorn creek, and the waters from these gulches ran into it. They wanted me to make arrangements for the boys to take the night water, and to allow them to use the day water. I was claiming the right to the use of the waters of main Greenhorn creek during the daytime. They wanted to bring the thing around so they could get the day water. * * * I only claimed the day water from these gulches." Norton Hawkins, a son of Austin Hawkins, testified: "I am not very familiar with the Heybrook gulch, but am pretty familiar with the Barker gulch. I think that during the last three years I have performed some mining work on Greenhorn. I worked there two springs on my father's claim. I used the waters from both of these gulches for mining purposes. I used it through the old Cornish & Co. ditch. The first spring I worked there two or three months, and the next spring two or three weeks, I think. The first spring I used all the water I wanted,—all I could get in the ditch in the daytime. In the nighttime the water went to waste." Robert Hawkins, another son, testified: "During the spring of 1895 two railroad boys and myself worked a while on my father's claim on Greenhorn creek. We took the water that we used from plaintiffs' ditch." Defendant Smith testified, in substance: "I am one of the defendants herein. In the spring of 1895 I conveyed the waters of Heybrook gulch in a flume across plaintiffs' ditch, and used it down below their ditch. I had permission from Mr. Hawkins to use the waters from this gulch." The testimony of defendant Calkins was: "Defendant J. W. Plummer and myself placed a flume in plaintiffs' ditch across Barker gulch, and took the waters of said gulch under said flume, and used them during the spring of 1895. We used them until the injunction stopped us. We used also a portion of the waters of Heybrook gulch by running them in an old ditch from Heybrook gulch to Barker gulch, and running them under plaintiffs' ditch. The defendant Al Smith gave us the permission to use these waters from Heybrook gulch. No one gave us permission to use the waters of Barker gulch. We simply took them."

The foregoing is substantially all the evidence from the record, and we think it quite manifest that it does not support the finding of the court, above quoted, to the effect that the day waters of these gulches had never been appropriated by plaintiffs or their predecessors in interest; that is, between 6 o'clock in the morning and 6 in the evening. To our minds, the evidence shows without any substantial conflict that this water had been so appropriated and was being so used long before and at the time of the interference therewith by defendants. Whether the evidence establishes a perfect title in plaintiffs to the use of the waters as against all the world need not be determined, since it unquestionably shows that plaintiffs were in the actual and peaceable enjoyment and possession of these waters at the date of defendant's diversion. Such possession was sufficient as against any one having no better right (Utt v. Frey, 106 Cal. 395, 39 Pac. 807); and defendants show no such right. The entire basis of their claim is the right supposed to have been acquired to the water of these gulches through the attempted appropriation by Austin Hawkins in 1882. But, even if the water was open to Hawkins' appropriation at that time,—which does not appear,—the acts of Hawkins never amounted to a valid appropriation thereof. He failed to follow up the filing of his notice by any actual appropriation of the waters. His contemplated ditch by which to divert the water was never constructed, nor did he ever in fact take any of the water except in two or three instances, when it was diverted in a fugitive manner by tapping plaintiffs' ditch. Even these attempts do not appear to have been made until some eight or ten years after the filing of his notice. He says: "I have used the waters some myself from these gulches, and others through me have used it at different times since the location." But when he undertakes to give the dates of such use, either by himself or others by his authority, it all appears to have occurred within one or two years prior to the commencement of the action, and at no time was the water diverted other than by taking it from plaintiffs' ditch until the diversion made by the defendants in January, 1895. The fact that Tryon, while holding under Orr, and that the plaintiffs after their purchase, made efforts to amicably adjust the claim of Hawkins to the use of the waters of these gulches does not in itself establish any right in the latter, nor impart any validity to his claim which it did not otherwise possess. The diversion of the water by the defendants, being based solely upon their supposed license from Hawkins, was wholly without right, and they were, therefore, in undertaking to interfere with the possession of the waters by plaintiffs, mere trespassers; and the finding that their acts were not wrongful as against plaintiffs is without support.

The other points made require no special notice. It sufficiently appears from what has been said in discussing the evidence that the court, as the evidence stood, should have granted plaintiffs' motion to strike out the notice of appropriation made by Hawkins. The other ruling complained of was not material. Judgment and order reversed.

FATJO et al. v. PFISTER. (S. F. 378.)

TAXATION — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — STATUTES — SUBJECT EXPRESSED IN TITLE.

1. St. 1895, p. 267, § 1, requiring, on filing the appraisement of the estate of any decedent, infant, or incompetent with the clerk of the superior court, a deposit of $1 for each $1,000 of the appraised valuation in excess of $3,000, imposes a property tax, and hence, since it provides an extraordinary tax on certain property, is in conflict with Const. art. 13, § 1, providing that all property shall be taxed in proportion to its value.

2. Such statute, requiring the deposit provided for to be paid into the county treasury, violates Const. art. 11, § 12, forbidding the legislature to impose taxes for county purposes.

3. The title of St. 1895, p. 267, "An act to establish the fees of county, township and other officers, * * *" does not express the subject of section 1, imposing a graduated tax on estates of decedents, infants, and incompetents, and hence such section is in conflict with Const. art. 4, § 24.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Petition by Louis Fatjo and Mariana F. Roca, executors of the will of Mariano Malarin, deceased, for a writ of mandamus commanding Henry A. Pfister, clerk of the superior court of Santa Clara county, to file the inventory and appraisement of the estate of said decedent. There was a judgment denying the writ, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Luis Arques (H. V. Morehouse, of counsel), for appellants. B. A. Herrington, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. Plaintiffs are the executors of the will of Mariano Malarin, deceased, and the defendant is the clerk of the superior court of Santa Clara county. On June 18, 1895, said executors presented to said clerk the inventory and appraisement of the estate of said decedent, and requested him to file the same, and tendered as fees for said and other services rendered prior thereto the sum of $20. The value of said estate, as shown by said inventory and appraisement, is $243,504.70; and the clerk demanded as fees for said filing $240, and refused to file said inventory and appraisement unless said sum should be paid. Plaintiffs thereupon petitioned said superior court for a writ of mandate requiring said clerk to file said inventory and appraisement. The clerk answered said petition, and upon the hearing the court denied the prayer of the petitioners, and from that judgment they appeal.

The only question involved in the case is the constitutionality of the act of March 28, 1895, entitled "An act to establish the fees of county, township and other officers and of jurors and witnesses in this state." St. 1895, p. 267. Said act, so far as it is necessary to quote it, is as follows: "Section 1. The following county, township, and other officers shall charge and collect the following fees: County Clerk. On the commencement of any action or proceeding in the superior court, except probate proceedings, or on appeal thereto, to be paid by the party commencing such action or proceeding, or taking such appeal, five dollars. On the filing of a petition for letters of administration, testamentary, or guardianship, five dollars, to be paid by the petitioner; provided, that at the time of filing the inventory and appraisement in any such proceeding there shall be an additional deposit of one dollar for each additional thousand dollars of the appraised valuation in excess of three thousand dollars." The act proceeds to fix the fees for filing a petition to contest a will or codicil, and the fees to be paid by defendants in civil cases, and for copies, certificates, and other enumerated services, and in like manner fixes the fees of sheriffs, recorders, and other officers. It is conceded that, if the provision above quoted relating to the filing of the inventory and appraisement of the estates of deceased persons in cases where the valuation exceeds $3,000 is constitutional, the fee demanded by the clerk was the proper legal fee; but, if said provision is unconstitutional, that the fee tendered by the petitioners was sufficient. The constitutionality of the act is assailed upon various grounds, of which it will be necessary to notice but one or two. It is perfectly plain that the legislature has attempted by that portion of section 1 above quoted to levy a property tax upon all estates of decedents, infants, and incompetents. The ad valorem charge for filing the inventory is in no sense a fee or compensation for the services of the officer, which are the same, as respects this matter, in every estate, large or small. To call it a fee is a transparent evasion. And it is not merely an inheritance tax, or at all analogous to an inheritance tax, as counsel would contend; for, in the first place, it applies not only to the estates of decedents, but also to the estates of minors and incompetents under guardianship; and, as to the estates of decedents, it applies not to the distributable residue after payment of debts and expenses of administration, but to the whole body of the estate, and would be collectible, if the law were valid, from an insolvent estate as well as from one of equal appraised value and with no liabilities. As an attempt to levy a property tax, the act is in this particular invalid for several reasons: First. It violates section 1 of article 13 of the constitution, in imposing an extraordinary tax upon the property to which it applies, in addition to the equal and uniform tax to which alone all property in the state is liable. Second. The subject of the act is not expressed in its title, and is in no wise germane thereto, and is a violation of section 24 of article 4 of the constitution, which requires that every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title. Third. The act requires the tax for which it provides to be paid into the county treasury for county purposes, and violates section 12 of article 11 of the constitution, which forbids the legislature to impose taxes for county purposes. The judgment of the superior court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to grant the peremptory writ of mandate as prayed by the petitioners.

HOMICIDE — INSANITY — BURDEN OF PROOF—CAUTIONARY INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Insanity as a defense to crime must be proved by a preponderance of evidence.

2. It is not error to instruct, on a trial for homicide, where defendant's insanity is claimed, that insanity is a defense sometimes resorted to where proof of the overt act is so complete as to exclude other defenses, and that therefore, while the defense is to be justly weighed, it is to be examined with care, lest an ingenious counterfeit of mental disorder furnish immunity for guilt.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; William G. Lorigan, Judge.

H. V. Morehouse and J. B. Kerwin, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and Henry E. Carter, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the State.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant has been convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree, and the penalty of death affixed. He appeals from the judgment upon the single ground that the court committed error in instructing the jury as to the law in two certain particulars.

The most serious objection of defendant is taken to the action of the trial judge in giving an instruction bearing upon the question of insanity. As to insanity the jury were told that the burden rested upon the defendant of proving his insanity by a preponderance of evidence. The principle of law thus declared is in full accord with the law of this state. For a period of 35 years this court has repeatedly and uniformly so declared the law to be. The cases to that effect are numbered by the score. We find the doctrine first announced in People v. Meyers, 20 Cal. 518, and we find this court in the recent case of People v. Bemmerly, 98 Cal. 299, 33 Pac. 263, saying that the question is no longer an open one in this state. The law here declared by the trial court is also in line with the decisions of the courts of England, and also in accord with the views of the highest courts of more than one-half the states of this Union. The defendant cites for our consideration Davis v. U. S., 160 U. S. 471, 16 Sup. Ct. 353. In that case the supreme court of the United States holds to views upon this question contrary to those we have so often declared; but it is only necessary to say that upon a principle of law like the one here presented we are not bound by the views of that tribunal.

The trial judge instructed the jury: "The defense of insanity is one which may be, and sometimes is, resorted to in cases where the proof of the overt act is so full and complete that any other means of avoiding conviction and escaping punishment seems hopeless. While, therefore, this is a defense to be weighed fully and justly, and, when satisfactorily established, must recommend itself to the favorable consideration of the humanity and justice of the jury, they are to examine it with care, lest an ingenious counterfeit of such a mental disorder should furnish immunity for guilt." There is no substantial legal objection to this instruction. In effect it has been given by trial courts and approved by this court in many cases. People v. Dennis, 39 Cal. 637; People v. Bumberger, 45 Cal. 650; People v. Pico, 62 Cal. 51.

The judgment is affirmed.

HARVEY v. MEYER et al. (L. A. 205.) [1]

TAXATION—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY—EVIDENCE.

1. A description on an assessment roll of land as "lot fronting 78 feet east side of S. street, between Third and Fourth streets, bounded north by H., south by M.," renders the assessment and a sale thereunder void for indefiniteness of description.

2. Parol evidence is inadmissible to ascertain what particular lot an assessor had in mind in making the assessment roll.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by J. Downey Harvey, administrator, against Samuel Meyer and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Max Lowenthal, for appellants. White & Monroe, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The plaintiff, claiming title to certain real property, and out of possession, brought this action under section 738, Code Civ. Proc., to quiet his title and secure possession. Judgment went against defendant, and he appeals therefrom, and also from the order denying a motion for a new trial.

The title to the parcel in dispute was originally in plaintiff's intestate, John G. Downey, and now rests in his heirs, represented in this action by the above-named administrator, unless a new title has been created in defendant by adverse possession for the statutory period. Defendant's title is dependent solely upon the question of the payment of taxes upon the land in controversy, he having been in exclusive possession of the same under a claim of right for a term longer than that required by the statute. In the year 1876 defendant became the owner of a tract of land fronting 78 feet, more or less, upon Main street, in the city of Los Angeles, and extending in depth to the center of the block about 165 feet. J. G. Downey, plaintiff's intestate, at the same time was the owner of a tract of land fronting 78 feet, more or less, upon Spring street, and extending in depth to the center of the aforesaid block. These two streets are parallel to each other, and form the eastern and western boundary lines, respectively, of the block. The two lots of these respective owners abutted on each other at the rear. When defendant entered into possession under his deed, in the year 1876, he took actual possession of some 30 feet in depth of the rear portion of Downey's lot, and this small tract constitutes the land in dispute. It is conceded that defendant has title if he has complied with the statute of 1878 as to the payment of taxes. In this regard he claims that he has paid all the taxes assessed and levied against this tract since the year 1878; and further insists that, if he has not paid such taxes, the reason is found in the fact that none were assessed and levied. This contention brings us directly to a consideration of the evidence upon that question. The taxes assessed and levied in the years 1879, 1880, and 1881 are the first to become material, and at that time the tract in dispute, marked "A," and its immediate surroundings, are substantially pictured as follows:

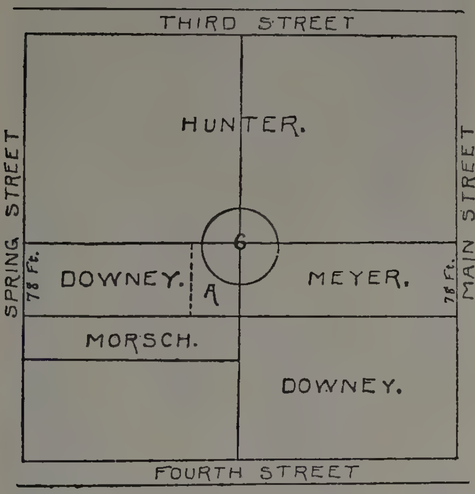
[1] Rehearing denied.



Defendant entered into possession in October, 1876. His title by adverse possession would have become perfected in October, 1881, if all taxes assessed and levied in the interim had been paid by him. It is not shown that he paid the taxes upon this land during any of the five years between 1876 and 1881. But it does affirmatively appear that in the year 1881, at least, he only paid the taxes which were assessed and levied upon the following described tract, and by such description it is evident that the tract in litigation was not included therein. This tract is described as follows: "Lot fronting seventy-eight by one hundred and sixty-five feet, west side of Main street, bounded north by K. Hunter, south and west by J. G. Downey." By reason of his failure to pay the taxes upon the tract in dispute for the year 1881, he acquired no title prior to that date, if taxes were assessed and levied upon it at any time during that period. If taxes were assessed and levied upon this tract during the years 1879, 1880, and 1881, they were assessed and levied upon an assessment to J. G. Downey. The state and county assessment and also the city assessment to Downey were practically the same during these years, and the land so assessed was described upon the assessment roll as follows: "Lot fronting seventy-eight feet, east side of Spring street, between Third and Fourth streets, bounded north by Hunter, south by Morsch." If the land in controversy is included in this description, then the defendant fails in his claim of title, for the taxes levied and assessed upon such assessment were paid by Downey. But defendant now insists that this assessment to Downey is void upon its face, and therefore no assessment, by reason of the description therein set forth being so vague and indefinite as to be meaningless. We agree with this contention and hold the assessment to Downey absolutely void. Upon its face the description found upon the assessment roll describes nothing. It only attempts to give three boundary lines. It is impossible to determine either the form or area of the tract covered by the description. Neither could expert persons go upon the ground and locate the tract. The lot has a frontage of 78 feet upon Spring street, between Third and Fourth streets, and is more definitely described as being situate between the lands of Hunter on the north and Morsch upon the south. All these matters but serve to locate the particular frontage upon Spring street. They do nothing more. There is no way of determining the depth of the lot. If a definite boundary line of some kind were fixed upon the east side of the tract, the description would be complete; but there is none. Conceding, for present purposes only, that the boundary upon the south by Morsch's land is sufficient to establish that the Downey tract extended east upon its south side the full length of the Morsch tract, still such cannot be held with reference to the north line, for there we find the Hunter tract extending the entire width of the block. It is therefore impossible to say at what point upon Hunter's south line the Downey tract ends. There is no way of ascertaining from the assessment, even when taken in connection with the lay of the land as disclosed by the plat, whether Downey's north line is 5, 10, or 50 feet in length. Hence the boundary by "Hunter" upon the north wholly fails to serve the purpose of creating a boundary line. At the most, we then have but two sides of the tract described, to wit, the west and the south. Such a description is fatally defective, and an assessment based thereon wholly void. It is claimed by respondent that in the absence of evidence to the contrary Downey's "lot" is presumed to extend to the center of the block. It is clear that the word "lot" as used in the assessment is synonymous with "tract," "piece," or "parcel"; and certainly there is no presumption of fact whatever as to the depth of such a lot. Neither are we justified in seeking by parol evidence to ascertain what particular tract or lot the assessor had in mind when making the assessment. It becomes unnecessary to pass upon the remaining questions raised by appellant. Judgment and order reversed.

PEOPLE ex rel. VAN LOBEN SELS v. RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 551. (Sac. 156.)

RECLAMATION DISTRICTS—DISSOLUTION—CREATION—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Reclamation districts created by the act of 1861 were not municipal corporations, neither did they belong to any class of corporations defined in the Civil Code, but were special organizations, to which the state had given certain discretion in making improvements contemplated, and ceased to exist as public agencies when the policy of the state was changed.

2. Where the evidence showed that no reclamation district was organized under St. 1878, p. 911, a repeal of such act by the legislature in 1880 destroyed any rights which might have been acquired under the original statute.

3. That the law creating reclamation districts provides that those who are interested in the land, and who must pay for the improvements, shall determine by an election whether the improvements shall be made, does not constitute an exercise of the election franchise, so as to render it void because requiring a property qualification.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Quo warranto by the people, on the relation of P. J. Van Loben Sels, against reclamation district No. 551. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., Johnson & Johnson, and Warren Olney, for appellant. W. A. Gett, Jr., for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an action of quo warranto, in which the only defendant is the corporation whose right to be a corporation is called in question. Whether such an action can be maintained is questionable. People v. Stanford, 77 Cal. 360, 18 Pac. 85, and 19 Pac. 693. But as no objection is made for lack of the proper parties, and the question is of public interest, we will not raise the question ourselves. The defendant claims to be a reclamation district organized under the provisions of the Political Code. It does not claim to have been organized under section 3481 of that Code, but by presenting to the board of supervisors the petition required by section 3446, and by a compliance with the provisions applicable to the conditions shown in such a petition. The relator contends that the lands included within the defendant's district were, at the time of its alleged organization, included within another valid and subsisting reclamation district, and, since the provisions of the Code applicable to an organization which includes lands already within a reclamation district were not followed, defendant was not legally organized. It is averred in the complaint that the lands included in the defendant reclamation district were included in swamp-land district No. 2, and that the latter then was a valid existing public corporation for reclamation purposes.

1. The first reply to this is that the act of 1861 is unconstitutional and void because the district was organized upon the application of the owners of one-third of the land without notice to the owners of other lands. If the board was authorized or required to organize a public corporation upon such an application, which could subject the lands to taxation, there would be great force in this suggestion. The case would be within the decision reached in Brandenstein v. Hoke, 101 Cal. 131, 35 Pac. 562. Whether the same rule would apply, although the power to expend money and levy assessments was not given to a public corporation, but was reposed in a state board of commissioners, it is not necessary here to inquire. This naturally brings us to the next proposition made on behalf of the defendant.

2. The districts marked out under the act of 1861 were not public corporations. They were merely tracts of land susceptible of one mode of reclamation, for which, because of this fact, specific work was to be done by the state board, who were, under certain contingencies, to assess the cost upon the lands of the district. They had no more resemblance to public corporations than benefited districts, which are assessed under our laws for local improvements, such as opening, widening, and grading streets. Section 3481 of the Political Code provides a mode in which owners of land in reclamation or swamp-land districts may reorganize portions of such districts. Nothing is said about public corporations. If there were swamp-land districts which were not corporations, the act would apply to them as well as to those which had some kind of autonomy and were corporations. The point seems to be that the act of 1861 has been repealed, and there is no agency now provided by which the work contemplated under the original organization can be carried on, and, if it was not a corporation, it has ceased to exist. The act of 1861 created a state board for the reclamation of swamp and overflowed lands. Such board was required, upon the petition of the owners of one-third in acreage of any tract of swamp and overflowed land susceptible of one mode of reclamation, to cause surveys to be made, and a plan of the proposed work made. Upon their approval of the plan they advertised for bids, and a contract for the work might be let,—the work to be done under the supervision of an engineer to be appointed by the board. The copies of all surveys, field notes, plats, plans, specifications, profiles, charts, and all other papers made by the engineer, were declared to be the property of the state. When any work was done the account therefor was first to be approved by the commissioners, and then submitted to the state board of examiners, and, when paid, was so paid out of the state swamp-land fund. The commissioners had jurisdiction throughout the state, and were state officers. The district had no autonomy whatever, and nothing was done in its name, or by any board or officer, as officers of the district. No one could act for it or bind it in any way. The charges were paid by the state from the proceeds of the sale of swamp lands within the district, or, if the cost exceeded that amount, it was made a charge against the land within the district. No powers whatever were conferred upon the district or upon any officer thereof, nor was any duty imposed upon any one which implied that a corporation had been created. The district was not organized, in any sense of the word. There was nothing to which corporate powers could be attributed. It had no board, no agency, and no managers. The legislature, through its creative power, might have called into existence some agency for the district, and endowed it with corporate powers, but it never did so. None of the numerous acts referred to attempt to do anything of the kind.

Counsel say district No. 2 cannot, in the respects material here, be discriminated from district No. 5, which was considered in Dean v. Davis, 51 Cal. 410. It is not important now to consider the statute under which that case arose. It is asserted in the opinion there that the district was organized, which would not be true as to this district; that it was endowed with many of the powers of a natural person,—this had no such powers; that it could make contracts, incur debts, issue bonds, levy and collect assessments, and have perpetual succession. Whether these things could properly be said of district No. 5 or not, they are not true of the district now under consideration. That district was not organized under the same statute, but under one which differed in many respects from this. I think this district had no attribute or quality whatever of a corporation of any kind. But if it should be considered a quasi corporation or a public corporation for municipal purposes, as reclamation districts have been said to be, it would make no difference. If these districts can be said to be corporations at all, I think they are properly called "public corporations for municipal purposes." That phrase means no more than that they are state organizations for state purposes. They certainly are not municipal corporations, in the strict sense. Dillon defines a municipal corporation to be the incorporation by the authority of the government of the inhabitants of a particular place or district, and authorizing them, in their corporate capacity, to exercise subordinate specified powers of legislation and regulation with respect to their local concerns. He says, "This power of local government is the distinctive purpose and distinguishing feature of a municipal corporation proper." Many other definitions have been given, but all include, as essential, a territory which is a portion of the state, and the inhabitants thereof, and the purpose to furnish local government for such inhabitants and such territory. The law does not require inhabitants in a swamp-land district, nor in fact to constitute a reclamation district, under the Code. I have no doubt many districts have been formed in which there were no residents, and, if there are residents within a district, the organization in no way affects them as residents. Those who own no land within the district are not affected by the organization at all. The owners, and the only ones affected by the formation of a district, may be nonresident aliens. Residents, as such, have no voice in the management of the supposed corporation. There is no local government beyond that exercised over a specific district whenever street work is done, and property owners are charged with the cost thereof. There is the specified work, its superintendence, and the assessment for the cost in each. Certainly these districts were not "municipal corporations," as that term is used in the constitution, and I think it equally clear that they do not belong to any class of corporations defined in the Civil Code. Section 284 reads: "Corporations are either public or private. Public corporations are formed or organized for the government of a portion of the state. All other corporations are private." These districts, in my opinion, belong to neither of these classes. They are special organizations formed to perform certain work which the policy of the state requires or permits to be done, and to which the state has given a certain degree of discretion in making the improvements contemplated. They are described by Dillon in his work on Municipal Corporations (sections 24–26). He calls them "quasi corporations." Perhaps it would have been more accurate to say that they are not corporations at all, but are so classed because many of the presumptions and rules which apply to corporations have been made applicable to them. They are public agencies which would cease to exist when the policy of the state has changed so that they are no longer required, or when there is no further function for them to perform. And there is nothing in the constitution relating to municipal corporations which would prevent the state from so changing its policy as to put them out of existence. Swamp-land district No. 2 did not, therefore, continue to exist as a corporation, conceding that it had ever been one, after the policy which called it into being had changed so that there was no longer any place for it in the policy of the state.

We come now to reclamation district No. 205. Both parties admit that the act of the legislature specifically forming this district was valid. It was passed in 1878, and included all the land that is now included in the defendant corporation. It was repealed in 1880, if the legislature could then repeal it. If the foregoing discussion as to the nature of these corporations be correct, then certainly counsel have not pointed out the limitation in the constitution which would prevent it. The statute creating the district (St. 1878, p. 911) declares that it shall be "a body politic and corporate, under the name of 'Reclamation District Two Hundred and Five,' under which name they shall hereafter make contracts and shall sue and be sued; and they shall also possess all the powers that are now possessed, or which may hereafter be possessed, by any reclamation district formed under the laws of this state." The statute further provides that the owners of land shall elect a board of trustees, and that the board of supervisors shall designate the place where the election shall take place. The answer denies that the alleged corporation had ever been a valid and subsisting corporation. The findings either contain no finding upon the issue, or find against the plaintiff. The bill of exceptions contains no evidence which tends to show that the reclamation district authorized by the act was ever, in fact, organized. No existing organization was recognized in the act, and thereby made a corporation. No person or body was named who should exercise corporate powers. No entity was brought into existence by the act, but an organization was provided for, and the owners of the land were declared to be a body politic and corporate. Whether, under such circumstances, the land described could be said to be within an existing reclamation district, may be questioned. I think, however, the repeal was effectual. There is certainly no express limitation to be found in the constitution, and the legislative power is plenary, except as limited in that instrument. Evidently it is not a case in which a general law can be made applicable. A general law providing a method in which those interested may cause a corporation to be dissolved would not meet the case. It was a public agency called into existence to construct a public work,—to do something which the general policy of the state required to be done. The state changes its policy, revokes the agency, and thereby ends the corporation which existed only for that purpose. There is no express limitation to be found in the constitution upon the power of the legislature to dissolve a municipal corporation, if we were to concede this to be one. It has been held that an express prohibition against the formation of such corporations by special laws is not a limitation upon the power of the legislature to dissolve them by such laws. Luehrman v. Shelby Co. Taxing Dist., 2 Lea, 425. The provisions which may possibly imply such a limitation refer, expressly, not to municipal corporations, but to cities and towns.

The attorney general also contends that the entire law in regard to reclamation districts is void, because it requires a property qualification for voters. Const. art. 2, § 1; also, article 1, § 24. If these quasi corporations are municipal corporations, designed to provide for local self-government, I see no answer to this suggestion. The point seems to be sustained by the decision in Re Madera Irr. Dist., 92 Cal. 320, 28 Pac. 272, 675. There is a difference, however, between an irrigation district under the Wright act and the reclamation districts. In my opinion, these latter districts are not municipal corporations, and no one is a voter in the sense of the constitutional provisions. Certainly there can be no electors when there are no residents within the district. The district, as already said, was part of a scheme for conducting a public work, and not for self-government. In regard to street work and other local improvements, it has often been provided that the work shall only be done upon the application of the owners of a majority of frontage, or of a certain proportion of the owners of land; and, if the law had provided that the owners could elect a committee of their number to superintend the work, I do not see how it could change the principle. This could not constitute an exercise of the elective franchise, which is the matter to which the constitutional provisions have reference. The general public has an interest in the reclamation of swamp and overflowed land. Nevertheless, it is one of those public enterprises which result in a benefit to private lands, and therefore the cost is made a charge upon such land. That those who are specially interested, and who must pay for the improvement, are heard upon the question as to whether it shall be done, and are permitted to appoint those who shall superintend it, is not unusual, nor would it constitute an exercise of the elective franchise. The order is affirmed.

FERGUSON v. MURPHY et al. (Sac. 154.)

LANDLORD'S LIEN ON CROPS.

Where a lease of farm lands provides that the rent shall be paid in gold coin, and that the crops shall not be removed from the leased premises, without the lessor's consent, until the rent is paid, it gives the lessor no prior lien as against one making advances to the lessee to be secured by a mortgage on the crops, where the lease is not recorded.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

Action by Mary A. Ferguson against J. E. Murphy and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jas. A. Louttit, for appellant. Nicol & Orr, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to recover possession of 1,400 sacks of wheat and 760 sacks of barley, or the sum of $2,300, the value thereof, and $250 damages for detention. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and the judgment was in favor of the defendants, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

The facts of the case, as disclosed by the record, are, in substance, as follows: In September, 1892, one James Caven, being then the owner of the lands described in the complaint, leased the same by written lease to one White for the term of three years from the 15th day of that month at the yearly rental of $1,100, "payable only in gold coin of the United States of America on or before the 15th day of September of each year during this lease." The lease further stated that it is "understood and agreed by the parties hereto that all the crop of wheat, barley, or hay, or other crops that may be raised on said land, shall be and is the property of the first party until the said yearly rental of $1,100 is fully paid; and that no crops shall be removed from said land until said yearly payment of $1,100 is paid, without the written consent of said first party." In October, 1893, the parties agreed in writing that the rent for the year ending September 15, 1894, should be $1,650 instead of $1,100. The lease was not recorded until February 9, 1894, but at the date thereof White entered into possession of the leased premises, and thereafter occupied and farmed the same as tenant. In the fall of 1893 defendants Murphy and Frankenheimer furnished to White wheat and barley with which to seed the leased lands, and on December 6, 1893, to secure payment of such advances, and such other advances as should thereafter be made by them to him, he executed to them a crop mortgage upon "all the right, title, and interest of said party of the first part of, in, and to all the crops of wheat and barley now growing or to be grown during the season of 1893 and 1894" on said leased lands and other lands farmed by him. This mortgage was duly verified and acknowledged, and on January 24, 1894, was duly recorded. After the said mortgage was recorded, an agent of Caven called upon Mr. Frankenheimer, and informed him of the Caven lease, and that Caven claimed a lien on the crops raised on said land for the rent thereof, and subsequently two or three conversations were had between the parties in reference to the said claim and the disposition of said crop. It was finally understood and agreed that Murphy and Frankenheimer should attend to the harvesting of the crop, and that, when harvested, it should be hauled to them in the city of Stockton, and be disposed of by them. Subsequently Murphy and Frankenheimer, under the provisions of their said mortgage, advanced money for the insurance of said crop, for harvesting and sacking the same, and for hauling the same to Stockton; and all of the crop raised on said leased premises, consisting of 1,200 sacks of wheat and 760 sacks of barley, of the value of $1,800, was, with the consent of Caven, and in accordance with the agreement between him and Murphy and Frankenheimer, hauled to Stockton, and delivered to them, and the same has ever since been in their possession.

As to the fact that the crops were to be harvested by defendants, and, when harvested, were to be hauled to the city of Stockton, and disposed of by them, there is no conflict in the evidence, but as to what was to be done with the money received from the sale thereof there was a sharp conflict in the evidence. Plaintiff claimed that the understanding was that Murphy and Frankenheimer were to attend to the collection of the $1,650 due for rent, and were to pay the same without regard to the satisfaction of their own claim. Defendants, on the other hand, claimed that the understanding was that, after they had received payment of the amount which should be due them under the provisions of their crop mortgage, the balance was to be paid to Caven. On June 20, 1894, Caven and his wife assigned the said lease, "together with all advantages to be derived therefrom," to the plaintiff, and on August 31st thereafter she demanded of defendants in writing that they immediately surrender and deliver to her the wheat and barley raised on said leased premises, stating that the said wheat and barley was her property, and she was entitled to take and retain possession of the whole thereof "until the rental of the said premises, amounting to the sum of $1,650 for the current year, has been paid." The defendants refused to comply with this demand, and thereupon this action was commenced.

The court below found upon all the disputed questions in favor of the defendants, and we think the findings were justified by the evidence, and must be sustained. Appellant contends that under the terms of the lease she was the owner of the crop until the rent reserved should be paid, and that it was not necessary that the lease be recorded in order to protect her rights thereunder as against the said crop mortgage. The lease expressly provided that the rent should be paid only in gold coin, and the evident purpose of the provision that the crop should be the property of the lessor, and should not be removed from the leased premises without his written consent until the rent should be fully paid, was to create a lien on the crop to secure payment of the rent. The lessee had a right to control the crop, and no right to the possession of any part thereof was given to the lessor. The question, then, is, did the lease vest in the lessor title to the crop raised as against the mortgagees? The lease was not recorded, and the defendants had no knowledge of its terms and conditions when they took the crop mortgage. "A landlord, in this state, has no lien for rent reserved, or for the value of the use and occupation of property" (Hitchcock v. Hassett, 71 Cal. 331, 12 Pac. 228), and "it must be remembered, in general, that the policy of the law is against upholding secret liens and charges to the injury of innocent purchasers or incumbrancers for value" (Palmer v. Howard, 72 Cal. 293, 13 Pac. 858). This case, in our opinion, is in all material respects like that of Society v. Purvis, 112 Cal. 236, 44 Pac. 561. In that case the plaintiff, being the owner of a tract of land, leased the same to one Dallas for the term of one year upon the oral understanding and agreement that Dallas should farm the land, and pay a cash rental of $2,140; and it was agreed between the parties that the title to the crops raised thereon during the term was to remain in the plaintiff, and that the crop, when harvested, was to be hauled to the nearest warehouse, and stored in the name of plaintiff; and, when sold, plaintiff was to receive from the proceeds its rent, and the overplus, if any, was to go to and be the property of Dallas. Under this agreement Dallas entered upon the land, and planted a crop of wheat thereon. Before the wheat was harvested, a creditor attached the growing crop as the property of Dallas, and the action was brought against the attaching officer for conversion, plaintiff claiming to be the owner of the entire crop. It was held, in effect, that the lease and accompanying agreement must be construed as intended to give security to the landlord for payment of the cash rental, and to create a lien upon the growing crop, as such security, without complying with the chattel mortgage law, but that they were ineffectual for that purpose, and the plaintiff could not recover. It is objected that that case differs from this, because there the agreement was in parol, while here it is in writing. We see no material difference between the two agreements in this respect. An oral lease of real property for a term not exceeding one year is just as operative and binding as a written lease, and in such case an oral agreement, like that in controversy, would be as effective as it would be if in writing. In each case the invalidity of the lien which the plaintiff claimed to have acquired and to have a right to enforce arose from the fact that the agreement relied upon was simply an attempt to obtain the advantages of a chattel mortgage without complying with the provisions of the statute upon that subject. Our conclusion is that the plaintiff had no such interest in the property sued for as entitled her to maintain the action, and we therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

THRESHER et al. v. ATCHISON et al.

(Sac. 176.)

MORTGAGES—REDEMPTION—RATE OF INTEREST—AMENDMENT OF STATUTE AFTER SALE.

A statute decreasing the rate of interest to be paid to redeem land sold on execution is inoperative on a sale made prior to the passage of the act.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; John C. Gray, Judge.

Action by Thresher and others against Atchison and another to recover part of the money paid to redeem from sale on judgment foreclosing mortgage. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

A. F. Jones, for appellants. John Gale, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. By virtue of an order of sale issued upon a judgment entered in the superior court for Butte county for the foreclosure of a mortgage upon certain lands, and their sale in satisfaction of the mortgage debt, the defendant Atchison, who had been appointed by the court a commissioner therefor, sold the land March 23, 1895, to his co-defendant, Green, for the sum of $8,000, and issued to him a certificate therefor. September 22, 1895, the plaintiffs herein, who were entitled to redeem the lands from said sale, tendered to the commissioner for that purpose the sum of $8,474.67. The commissioner refused to receive that amount in redemption thereof, and threatened to execute a conveyance of the lands to the purchaser, unless they should be redeemed from the sale by the payment to him of $8,949.35 before the time for redemption should expire. The plaintiffs thereupon paid to the commissioner the sum demanded by him, under their protest that the amount was illegal and excessive to the extent of $474.68. The present action was brought to recover the last-named amount, upon the ground that it was in excess of what the commissioner was authorized to demand. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $296.95, from which the defendants appeal.

At the date of the sale it was provided by section 702, Code Civ. Proc., that a redemption from the sale might be made within six months by paying to the purchaser "the amount of his purchase, with two per cent. per month thereon in addition up to the time of redemption," with any taxes or assessments that he might have paid after his purchase. By an amendment of this section passed March 27, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 225), and which went into effect 60 days thereafter, it was provided that the redemption might be effected by paying the amount of the purchase, "with one per cent. per month thereon in addition up to the time of redemption," with whatever taxes and assessments might have been paid by the purchaser; and the question presented upon this appeal is the effect to be given to this amendment. The theory of the plaintiffs, as shown by their complaint, is that the provisions of the amended section alone are to be considered, while the defendants contend that the section as it stood at the date of the sale determined the rights of the parties. The court held that the provisions of the original section prevailed until the amendatory section took effect, and that thereafter the amended section alone was to be considered.

It has been frequently held that a law extending the time within which a redemption may be made from a sale under a judgment will be inoperative upon a sale made prior to the passage of the act; that the purchaser at the sale acquires rights thereby of which he cannot be divested by subsequent legislation. Cooley, in his treatise on Constitutional Limitations (page 353), says: "A law is void which extends the time for the redemption of lands sold on execution, or for delinquent taxes after the sales have been made; for in such a case the contract with the purchaser, and for which he has paid his money, is that he shall have title at the time then provided by the law; and to extend the time for redemption is to alter the substance of the contract as much as would be the extension of the time for payment of a promissory note." Mr. Freeman, in his treatise on Executions (section 315), in discussing the effect upon the rights of the judgment debtor of a statute authorizing a redemption from a sale passed after the sale has been made, says: "But the right of the purchaser to a conveyance, or to repayment at the termination of the period allowed for redemption, is deemed to rest upon a contract which the legislature will not be permitted to impair. Hence, while the time for redemption may probably be shortened, it certainly cannot be prolonged by any law enacted after the sale." The same principles which render void an act extending the time for redemption after the sale has been made will render void an act reducing the amount of money required for a redemption from such sale. The sale by the sheriff is regarded as a sale by the judgment debtor (Blood v. Light, 38 Cal. 658), and the purchaser is entitled to rely upon the statutory provisions for redemption existing at the time of the sale to the same extent and in the same manner as if they were incorporated into a contract of sale executed by the debtor.

Section 700, Code Civ. Proc., declares that, "upon a sale of real property, the purchaser is substituted to, and acquires all the right, title, interest, and claim of the judgment debtor thereto," subject to redemption, as provided in the succeeding sections. Section 701 provides that property sold subsequent to redemption may be redeemed "in the manner hereinafter provided." At the time of the sale in question it was provided by section 702 that, in order to effect a redemption, the purchaser should be paid the amount of his purchase, with 2 per cent. per month until the time of redemption. This provision in the section formed an element in the purchase at the sale, and constituted a term in the contract under which the purchaser paid his money to the officer. At the time he made his purchase the statute provided that at the expiration of six months thereafter he should receive a conveyance of the land, unless it should before that time be redeemed from the sale by the payment to him of the amount of his purchase, with 2 per cent. per month until the time of such payment. The legislature was as powerless to diminish the amount which he should receive as a redemption from the sale as it was to extend the time at which he should be entitled to a conveyance and take possession of the land. It could with as much right authorize a redemption without requiring any payment beyond the amount of the purchase as it could reduce the amount then required to be paid. By his purchase the defendant Green became vested with an interest in the land, of which he could be deprived only in the mode then fixed by the statute, and the plaintiffs were entitled to redeem the land from the sale only upon paying the amount of his purchase, with 2 per cent. per month from the date of the sale until the time of redemption. As it appears from the complaint that that is the amount which the commissioner demanded, and which they paid for the purposes of redemption, the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained. The judgment is reversed, with directions to the superior court to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

GUARANTY—CONSIDERATION—EXTENT OF LIABILITY—PLEADING—AMENDMENT—JUDGMENTS.

1. A proposed purchaser of land having refused to buy unless the vendor would furnish a tenant, and a guaranty that the tenant would pay a specified rent, plaintiff, at the request of the vendor, executed the guaranty, and as a result a sale was effected. Held that, though plaintiff received no benefit from the guaranty, it was based on a sufficient consideration.

2. The fact that the vendor furnished a tenant in name only, and intended to continue in possession himself, did not affect the guarantor's liability, whether or not the purchaser knew of such fact.

3. Other persons having subsequently agreed to indemnify the guarantor from loss he might sustain by reason of the guaranty, the purchaser was not bound, on the tenant's failure to pay rent, to proceed against such persons before proceeding against the guarantor.

4. Nor did the purchaser have any right of action for rent against the vendor.

5. The guarantor sued the vendor, the purchaser, and his indemnitors to obtain a decree determining how much was due as rent, and declaring that he was merely surety for defendants other than vendor and purchaser. Held, the purchaser not having filed a pleading showing the amount due him, and not having demanded judgment, he was not entitled to judgment for the rent due.

6. Where an amendment made after trial for the purpose of conforming the complaint with the proof went beyond the proof as to the existence of a certain fact, such fact was not admitted by the adverse party's failure to deny it by answer.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

Action by J. D. McDougald against the Argonaut Land & Development Company and others. There was a judgment for costs against defendant John Boggs, and from an order denying a new trial he appeals. Reversed.

James A. Louttit, for appellant. J. G. Swinnerton, Baldwin & Thompson, Dudley & Buck, and Geo. D. Dudley, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. This action is sui generis. The complaint, as it was originally drawn, and as it was at the trial, and until the close thereof, among other things, averred, in substance, that the corporate defendant, the Argonaut Land & Development Company, on the 1st day of May, 1890, owned a certain tract of land, which it was endeavoring to sell for $140,000, and that certain of the defendants were the directors of the corporation, and were authorized to make such sale, and, as such directors and agents for the purpose of making the sale, were empowered to enter into any and all contracts, agreements, and guaranties, etc., necessary. Pursuant to such authority, they contracted with defendant Boggs to exchange said land for a tract of 12,000 acres owned by said Boggs, and $44,000 in gold coin. Further, that Boggs agreed to the purchase on condition that the corporation would furnish a tenant for the land he was acquiring by said trade, acceptable to said Boggs, who would rent said land for five years at an annual rental of $12,000, and would obtain the guaranty by suitable persons of performance on the part of such tenant. It is averred that the defendant corporation accepted the terms and entered into the contract, and did in fact convey the tract of land to Boggs, and procured one McLaren to enter into such lease; that Boggs received the conveyance, and paid the said sum of $44,000 to the corporation, and conveyed to it the said tract of 12,000 acres of land in Colusa county. Said Boggs also, as part of the same transaction, leased the tract acquired by him from the corporation to said McLaren; and the plaintiff, at the request of the corporation and of the defendants other than Boggs, agents of the corporation, and to enable them to effect the sale or exchange of their said lands, in writing, guarantied to Boggs the payment of the rent reserved in the lease. Hulet, who was president of the corporation, subsequently signed the guaranty. Plaintiff avers that he received no consideration for the guaranty from the corporation, but entered into the same solely at the request of the corporate defendant; also, that, but for such guaranty, Boggs would not have made the said exchange of land, and this fact was well known to the corporate defendant. It is further alleged that on the said 20th day of May, 1890, defendants Fairbrother, Spect, Wilhoit and Foss, in writing, promised plaintiff to indemnify and save plaintiff harmless from all risk, damage, liability, cost, and expense that he might incur or sustain by reason of, or growing out of, his said guaranty. It is then charged that McLaren failed to pay the rent which accrued during the first and second years of the term, but that a stated portion of such rent had been paid by the corporate defendant. It is then averred that Boggs is insisting that plaintiff and Hulet shall pay such rent, and is threatening to bring suit against them therefor, and refuses to sue "any of the other parties hereto." It is charged that the corporation, in violation of its agreement, has failed and refused to hold plaintiff harmless upon his contract of guaranty, and now wrongfully claims and asserts that it is in no wise liable to plaintiff or to Boggs. The other individual defendants who contracted in writing to hold plaintiff harmless upon the guaranty have also made similar default, and all of said defendants are now endeavoring to burden plaintiff with all of such obligations, and to compel him to pay the rent out of his own resources. He asks for a judgment determining how much is due Boggs on the lease, and decreeing that plaintiff is surety for the other defendants, who are bound to pay the rent due said Boggs upon the lease. He asks that such defendants be required to pay all sums found due Boggs, and that plaintiff be exonerated; also, to adjudge that plaintiff is a surety, and entitled to be reimbursed for any sums he may be required to pay upon such guaranty. To this complaint Boggs filed an answer, in which he made no effectual denials of any matters stated, but simply asserted that McLaren was a necessary party to the suit, and asked that he be brought in. The other defendants answered the complaint, denying their liability to plaintiff or to Boggs. No cross complaint was interposed by any of the defendants, and it does not appear that the answers of the other defendants were served upon Boggs; and, as it was not necessary that they should be so served, we must presume that they were not. After the evidence was all in, at the close of the trial, the plaintiff was allowed to amend his complaint for the purpose of making it conform to the proofs. The amendment was made, and consisted in adding an averment to the effect that McLaren was only nominally the tenant of Boggs; that the Argonaut Land & Development Company was the real tenant, and after the execution of the lease the said Argonaut Land & Development Company, with the consent of McLaren and of Boggs, entered upon the land, and sublet portions thereof to McLaren and others, and received certain rents from such subtenants, which were paid to Boggs.

The court found the facts with reference to the sale or exchange of lands about as averred, and that McLaren was not furnished by the corporation as a tenant; that McLaren never took possession as the tenant of Boggs, and never paid any rent; and that, prior to the commencement of this action, plaintiff requested Boggs to bring suit against McLaren as principal, and the other defendants as co-sureties and co-guarantors of McDougald, and that Boggs refused to bring the suit. As conclusions of law, it is found that McLaren was never the tenant of Boggs; that neither McDougald nor any one else ever guarantied the performance of McLaren under any lease; that no rent is due to Boggs from any one, and neither plaintiff nor any of the defendants became or were sureties for Boggs; and that plaintiff is not surety for any of the defendants. Plaintiff's costs were assessed against Boggs. The appeal is from an order denying a new trial.

In the motion the findings of fact are attacked as not sustained by the evidence. Whatever may be said as to the other defendants, it is perfectly certain that the findings I have epitomized are not justified by anything in the pleadings as to Boggs. The complaint not only admits the lease, and liability of plaintiff as guarantor for the tenant, but the fact of the lease and the liability of plaintiff is the foundation of his cause of action. He does not aver that Boggs wrongfully claims that he is liable, and demands an adjudication to the effect that he is not liable, but he avers the liability, and that he assumed it at the request and in the interest of the other defendants, who agreed to indemnify him against loss on account thereof. The suit was brought to establish the liability of the other defendants, and to have it adjudged that, as between himself and them, they are principals, and he a surety only. If Boggs was satisfied with the responsibility of plaintiff, I see no reason why he should concern himself about this controversy. The only allegations in the complaint which he was called upon to deny were the statements as to the sums which had already been paid him on account of rents; and, if those statements were correct, he was not called upon to deny them. Upon the pleadings, it was not competent for the court to find the above facts against the averments and admissions of the complaint. There were no issues to be tried between Boggs and the other defendants, and in fact none as between Boggs and the plaintiff, unless it was as to whether McLaren was a necessary party to the action; for, according to the copy of the transcript before me, there was no denial of the allegations in regard to the partial payment of rent. Respondents contend that there are certain admissions resulting from a failure of Boggs to deny the allegations of the complaint which justify the judgment appealed from. Although I think it obvious that the complaint tendered no issue to Boggs, and contained no averments which would justify any judgment aginst him, except that he had received certain sums as rent, I will notice these contentions separately.

The claim is that Boggs admitted, by failing to deny:

(1) That plaintiff signed as surety without consideration. The complaint avers that plaintiff became surety for the other defendants to enable them to perform their contract with Boggs; that nothing was paid to him for guarantying the payment of the rent, but he executed the guaranty solely at the request of the corporation, to enable it to effect the sale. The complaint also shows that Boggs would not have made the purchase but for this guaranty. Instead of an averment that the contract of guaranty was without consideration, the complaint several times, and by full statement of the facts, avers a consideration for the contract of guaranty sufficient and ample.

(2) That the corporation was substituted as tenant instead of McLaren. This proposition is sustained neither by allegation, finding, nor proof. The contention is also made that McLaren did not enter as tenant of Boggs, and there is a finding to this effect. This finding is contrary to the allegations in the complaint, is not in response to any issue tendered by the complaint, and not sustained by any evidence whatever. There is no evidence which tends to show that Boggs consented to the possession of the Argonaut Land & Development Company, or to any special use of the property other than as stipulated in the lease. The complaint, even as amended, shows that McLaren did enter into possession under the lease. That he was a tenant is essential to plaintiff's cause of action, and necessitated by the theory of the complaint. As to Boggs, the averment that McLaren was only nominally tenant, but that the real tenant was the corporation, is meaningless. Plaintiff avers that the corporation was to furnish a tenant, and that it did furnish McLaren, whose performance plaintiff guarantied. If the corporation did this with the expectation of continuing in possession, and McLaren assented to this, plaintiff cannot complain. This would conclusively prove that the tenant entered under the lease. If Boggs knew of the expectation, it would not matter. An individual was furnished who undertook as tenant, and plaintiff guarantied his performance. If such arrangement did exist, it is not averred, proven, or found that plaintiff was ignorant of it. There is no evidence tending to show that Boggs released McLaren, or accepted another tenant.

(3) It is contended that plaintiff asked Boggs to sue the other defendants, and, since he did not, this releases plaintiff. Upon this subject the allegation is, in effect, that Boggs neglects and refuses to sue any of the other parties hereto, although plaintiff has demanded that he do so. McLaren was not a party to the suit. The finding is to the effect that Boggs was asked to sue McLaren as principal, and the other defendants, save Boggs, as co-sureties and co-guarantors of plaintiff. The only evidence upon the subject to be found in the record is that plaintiff asked Boggs to sue the corporation, and that he did not do so. In the finding, the other defendants are called "co-sureties and co-guarantors of plaintiff." If so, I do not know why Boggs should sue, or why his failure to do so would constitute a defense. In the complaint nothing is said which would give Boggs an action at law against any of them. It is said that some of them had agreed to indemnify plaintiff on his guaranty. He has never paid anything on account of his guaranty, and, if he did pay, that certainly would not authorize Boggs to sue. The corporation, according to the allegations of the complaint, had fully performed its contract with Boggs. Furnishing plaintiff as guarantor on the lease was part performance of the contract. Having furnished this security, which was acceptable to Boggs, it was no further liable to Boggs on account of the contract to furnish a tenant with satisfactory security, if it be conceded that it did contract to do so.

Respondents also contend that, inasmuch as the appellant did not answer the complaint as amended after the trial for the purpose of making it conform to the proof, all its allegations are admitted by him, and neither proof nor findings are required; and it is contended further that the amended complaint shows that Boggs accepted the corporation as tenant instead of McLaren. I think no such fact as this is alleged in the complaint, but, if such allegation were put into the complaint by the amendment, failure to reply would not constitute an admission. Amendments made to the complaint after trial, and for the purpose of making it conform to the proof, must rest upon such proof, and cannot go beyond it. They are not made for the purpose of framing issues for the trial, but to supply some technical defect, or perhaps upon the supposition that certain issues have been tried which are different from those framed by the pleadings. The supposition is that they have been tried as though such issue had been made. I do not find in the record any evidence upon the subject, and, as no such issue was tried, the allegation, if it can be so construed, is an idle one.

Appellant contends that he is entitled to judgment upon the pleadings against plaintiff for the amount due him upon the lease. He is in that respect, however, in the same position as the plaintiff is in respect to the judgment rendered. He had no pleadings which would sustain any such judgment. He has no cross complaint. He quotes on this point decisions which hold that sometimes defects in the complaint may be supplied by allegations in the answer, and claims the benefit of the allegations showing the liability of the plaintiff which are contained in the complaint. But, before the defective allegations can be helped by the allegations of an answer, there must be some sort of a pleading, defective or otherwise. Boggs put in no pleading showing the amount due him, and demanded no judgment. He tendered no issue upon the subject to plaintiff. The judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded.

FORGERY—EVIDENCE.

Conviction of forgery can be had only on proof that the person who signed another's name did so without authority.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Edward A. Belcher, Judge.

John Lundin was convicted of forgery, and appeals. Reversed.

Chas. G. Nagle, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and Chas. H. Jackson, for the People.

SEARLS, C. Defendant was charged by information with the crime of forgery, alleged to have been committed at the city and county of San Francisco on or about December 18, 1895. To the information defendant pleaded: (1) Not guilty. (2) Once in jeopardy. (3) Former acquittal. Upon the trial the defendant was found guilty as charged. The jury also found for the "people on former pleas" of once in jeopardy and former acquittal. Thereupon judgment was entered that defendant be punished by imprisonment in the state prison of the state of California at San Quentin for the term of four years. Defendant appeals from the judgment, from an order denying his motion for arrest of judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The determination of a single question is conclusive of the appeal. The defendant was charged with the forgery and uttering as genuine a certain check or instrument in writing, of which the following is a copy: "San Francisco, Dec. 16, '95. No. 1,245. Pacific Coast Savings Society of San Francisco, Cal.: Pay to John Nelson, or bearer, ($600) six hundred dollars. Clearing House No. 14. John F. Johnson." Indorsed: "John Nelson." At the trial there was evidence tending to show that about 7 o'clock p. m. of December 18, 1895, the defendant, John Lundin, who passed under the name of Thompson, in company with one Albrecht and a man named Nelson, who professed to be the indorser and payee of the foregoing check, called at the saloon and lunch house of Emma Schoenemann (now Dorn), on Spear street, San Francisco, where they negotiated and agreed to purchase, for and in the name of Nelson, from Mrs. Dorn, a one-half interest in her saloon for $400, from which sum Mrs. Dorn was to pay Albrecht a commission of $60, and also a couple of dollars to defendant for his trouble. Defendant produced and passed to Nelson a check, of which the foregoing is a copy, and the latter gave it to Mrs. Dorn. Upon her inquiry the parties all declared the check was good. It being late, Mrs. Dorn declined to make a bill of sale of the property until the check could be cashed the next morning. Mrs. Dorn then gave Nelson a receipt for the check, and it was agreed that he would come the next morning, go with Mrs. Dorn to the bank, where they would get the cash on the check for $600, whereupon Nelson would receive the $200 in excess of the purchase price of one-half of the saloon, the other parties would receive their commissions, etc. After this was arranged Albrecht wanted Mrs. Dorn to pay him his commission, which she refused until the check was cashed. He, or some of them, then sought to obtain $40, $20, and finally $10, but Mrs. Dorn was suspicious, and refused to pay anything. Nelson did not appear the next morning, and has not since appeared. Payment of the check was refused at the bank, no such person as the drawer having any funds there. There was testimony tending to show that the name "John F. Johnson" signed to the check, and the name "John Nelson," indorsed thereon, were both in the handwriting of defendant. Two witnesses named John F. Johnson were called by the prosecution. The first knew nothing of the defendant. The second testified that he had known defendant some seven or eight years, that he (said Johnson) did not sign the check, that the signature was not his handwriting, and that he had no account at the bank upon which it was drawn. No question was asked, and no testimony introduced tending to show, whether or not defendant was authorized to sign the name of "John F. Johnson" to the check.

Under the previous rulings of this court we are compelled to say the evidence was insufficient to warrant a conviction. In People v. Whiteman, 114 Cal. 338, 46 Pac. 99, a case involving a like question, the court, speaking through Temple, J., said: "There was no evidence that the persons by whom the checks purported to be drawn were real persons, and none that, if they were real persons, defendant was not authorized to use their names. * * * To prove that an accused person signed the name of another to an instrument, and that he passed such instrument as genuine, does not prove the commission of a crime. It must still be shown that it was a false instrument, and this is not proven until it is shown that the person who signed another's name did so without authority. Until this proof is made it is not shown to be a false instrument, and the defendant is not put to his proof at all." People v. Mitchell, 92 Cal. 590, 28 Pac. 597, is to like effect. There was some evidence in the case at bar from which the jury might have inferred that the second John F. Johnson, called as a witness, was the person whose name was intended to be signed to the check, but there is no evidence whatever that defendant was not authorized to sign the same. The instructions of the court contained a clear exposition of the law as enunciated in People v. Whiteman, supra, but the jury failed to be governed by those instructions in the rendition of their verdict. We recommend that the judgment and order denying a new trial be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; BRITT, C.

COOK v. COCKINS. (L. A. 176.)

STATUTES—WHEN RETROACTIVE—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—DELIVERY OF DEED—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

1. Prior to 1895, Civ. Code, § 3442, provided that the question of fraudulent intent in the transfer of property was one of fact, and that no transfer should be adjudged fraudulent solely because not made for a valuable consideration. Laws 1895, p. 154, amended such section by adding the proviso that any transfer made without a valuable consideration by a party while insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, should be fraudulent and void as to existing creditors. Held, that the section as amended is a rule of property as well as a rule of evidence, and does not apply to prior transfers.

2. A deed of land in California, made to plaintiff by her husband June 1, 1891, was acknowledged November 17, 1892, and recorded November 26, 1892, 21 days after the land was attached by defendant, a creditor of the husband when the deed was made. Plaintiff did not know of her husband's indebtedness at the time of the transfer, nor of the attachment till after the deed was recorded. There was nothing to suggest insolvency of the husband, and the wife was an innocent vendee, without notice of any infirmity in the title. The deed recited a consideration of $1. She testified that he owned a house in New York, where they resided, the proceeds of which he had always said she should have; that he had got $5,000 out of it, and put it in the California property in question; and that he said he would deed the latter to her when he got title to it. He testified that he told her long prior to making the deed that he would make it as soon as he got title. When it was made, both understood that it was to carry out such promise. The value of the land did not exceed his indebtedness to defendant. Held, that the deed was not fraudulent as to defendant, even on the theory that the husband's property outside of California could not be considered on the question of insolvency, and on that theory he was technically insolvent; and this though the facts did not import a valuable consideration, since when the deed was made Civ. Code, § 3442, provided that no transfer, etc., could be adjudged fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration.

Action by Caroline M. Cook against W. W. Cockins for partition. Pending the action, plaintiff died, and Joseph A. Cook, executor of her estate, was substituted as plaintiff. There was an interlocutory decree in favor of plaintiff, directing partition and appointing referees for that purpose. From an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Collier & Evans (Francis J. Heney, of counsel), for appellant. J. F. Conkey, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. On February 13, 1894, Caroline M. Cook, now deceased (referred to herein as plaintiff), wife of Joseph A. Cook, filed her verified complaint in the superior court of Riverside county, alleging ownership of certain land situated therein, and claiming an undivided one-fourth interest in the land, and an ownership of an undivided three-fourths interest in the same land in the defendant, and praying for partition of their several interests. The defendant filed a verified answer denying that the plaintiff was the owner of any interest in said land. For a separate answer to the complaint, the defendant alleged that defendant and said Joseph A. Cook on January 31, 1891, became the owners, as tenants in common, of the land, by virtue of certain legal proceedings, in the proportion, to wit, the defendant an undivided three-fourths interest, and the said Joseph A. Cook an undivided one-fourth interest, and that they were such owners in fact at the commencement of the action; that the interest of said Joseph A. Cook was subject to the lien and claim of defendant by virtue of proceedings in attachment commenced by him against the said Joseph A. Cook in the superior court of Los Angeles county; that a writ duly issued October 22, 1892, and was served by levy on the interest of said Joseph A. Cook in said land November 5, 1892; that defendant recovered judgment in said action December 13, 1893, against the said Joseph A. Cook for $1,906.92, and $126.20 costs; that said judgment became a lien on the interest of said Joseph A. Cook in said land on and after November 5, 1892, and has not been paid, but is still due, and that said lien was in full force when this action was begun; that defendant had caused execution to issue on said judgment, and to be placed in the hands of the sheriff of Riverside county, and had caused a transcript of the judgment to be filed in the county of Riverside as required by law, and was proceeding to sell said property. Further answering, the defendant alleged that on January 31, 1891, the said Joseph A. Cook was and continued to be a resident of the state of New York, and was at that time indebted to defendant, and continued to be indebted to the date of this action; that the said Joseph A. Cook on January 31, 1891, and prior thereto, was insolvent, and, aside from his interest in said property, had no assets or property with which to pay defendant's said claim; that on November 26, 1892, there was filed for record in the office of the recorder of San Diego county (from which Riverside county was in part afterwards taken) a paper purporting to be a conveyance from said Joseph A. Cook to his wife, Caroline M. Cook, plaintiff in this action; that said conveyance purported to be acknowledged November 17, 1892; that, as to defendant, it was and is void, in that it was without consideration and voluntary; that said conveyance was made with the purpose on the part of said Joseph A. Cook to hinder, delay, and defraud the defendant in the collection of his said claim, and that the said conveyance was accepted and received by the said plaintiff with full knowledge on her part that the same was made with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of said Joseph A. Cook, and particularly defendant; that, at the date of said pretended conveyance, plaintiff well knew that the said Joseph A. Cook was insolvent; that at the date of said conveyance, for a long time prior thereto, and ever since said date, the said Joseph A. Cook was indebted to defendant in the sum of about $2,000. By a supplemental answer, defendant avers that since the filing of his answer in the action the execution issued upon the judgment above referred to has been served, the property duly sold, and that, more than six months having elapsed since said sale, the sheriff of said Riverside county executed his deed to defendant of all the interest of the said Joseph A. Cook in the property described in the complaint. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and its decision was for the plaintiff. Findings of fact and conclusions of law were filed, and an interlocutory decree entered directing partition to be made, and appointing three referees for that purpose. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and this appeal is from the order of the court denying a new trial.

Certain facts are not disputed, to wit: That in January, 1891, the property in question was acquired through judicial proceedings, by Joseph A. Cook an undivided one-fourth, and by defendant an undivided three-fourths interest, as tenants in common; that subsequently, by deed dated June 1, 1891, said Joseph A. Cook conveyed his interest in the land to his wife, the plaintiff; that this deed was acknowledged November 17, 1892, and recorded November 26, 1892; that at the date of the deed said Joseph A. Cook was indebted to defendant about the sum of $2,000; that in 1891, and prior thereto, and until about 1894 or 1895, plaintiff and her husband resided in the state of New York; that, about as stated in the answer, defendant became the owner in 1895 of whatever interest Joseph A. Cook had in the land, through a proceeding in attachment by which levy was made on said interest November 5, 1892.

The ninth finding attacked by defendant is as follows: "That on the 1st day of June, 1891, said Joseph A. Cook, being the owner in fee of an undivided one-fourth interest in the premises described in the complaint, and of all the appurtenances thereto, by deed dated, executed, and delivered that day, duly transferred and conveyed all of his right, title, and interest in said premises to the plaintiff in this action, who thereupon became, ever since has been, and still is the owner of said Joseph A. Cook's interest in said premises." The objection to this finding is that it is against the evidence, for that the evidence shows without conflict: (1) That the conveyance so made June 1, 1891, by Joseph A. Cook to his wife, Caroline M. Cook, was fraudulent and void as to defendant; (2) that at said date, and before, defendant was, and ever since he has been, an existing creditor of said Joseph A. Cook; (3) that at said date said Joseph A. Cook had no other property in the state of California than the property in question, and that the only other property he owned was in the state of New York, incumbered to the extent of $3,000; (4) that the indebtedness of said Joseph A. Cook at the date of said conveyance arose out of a transaction in the state of California, at which time defendant resided and still resides in the state of California, and that the said Joseph A. Cook, until a short time before the commencement of this action, resided in the state of New York; (5) that said conveyance was voluntary, and without valuable consideration. The appellant does not urge in his brief that actual fraud was shown. The alleged fraud upon which he apparently relies is constructive, and results, if at all, from his view of what is a just application of the facts to what he deems to be a proper application of section 3442, Civ. Code, to the case. When this action was brought this section read as follows: "In all cases arising under section 1227, or under the provision of this title, except as otherwise provided in section 3440, the question of fraudulent intent is one of fact and not of law; nor can any transfer or change be adjudged fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration." Before the action was tried, and nearly four years after the transfer, the legislature amended this section by adding the following: "Provided, however, that any transfer or incumbrance of property, made or given voluntarily or without a valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, shall be fraudulent and void as to existing creditors." Laws 1895, p. 154. Appellant urges with much earnestness that section 3442 of the Civil Code, as thus amended, should be considered in determining the rights of the parties at the time of the trial; that the amendment merely establishes a rule of evidence, and goes strictly to the remedy and in no sense to the right; that no retroactive effect is necessary to be given, so as to make it obnoxious to the rule relating to retroactive legislation; and that, thus considered, a conclusive presumption of intent to defraud must flow from the facts in this case. On the other hand, the plaintiff contends that this section is something more than a rule of evidence; that it is a rule of property as well, and cannot, as amended, destroy vested property rights by being given retroactive effect. It seems to me that this latter is the true view. The transfer was dated June 1, 1891. The husband testified that it was delivered the same day to the wife. She testified that she thought it was delivered in the following September or October. The trial court found that the deed was executed and delivered on June 1, 1891. As there was no other testimony on this point, we are not at liberty to say that the court erred in accepting that of the husband. Without now considering the effect of the change in the statute upon this case, appellant's point deserves more than dogmatic negation. The section as it stood at the time of the transfer made the question of fraudulent intent one of fact, and not of law, in all cases arising under the title of the Code in which the section occurs, and this case arises under that title. It was incumbent upon defendant to allege and prove the fraudulent intent. Under the section before the amendment, this court has frequently held that a voluntary conveyance is not prima facie fraudulent, and a fraudulent intent is not to be arrived at as a presumption of law. Emmons v. Barton, 109 Cal. 662, 42 Pac. 303. The section also originally provided that a transfer could not be adjudged fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration. In Emmons v. Barton, supra, the conveyance was a gift from husband to wife, and it was there held that such conveyance "is valid as against creditors, although the consideration was love and affection alone, unless it was made with intent to defraud creditors. * * * But the intent is a question of fact, and must be averred and proved. A voluntary conveyance is not prima facie fraudulent, and a fraudulent intent is not to be arrived at as a presumption of law. Therefore, in a case like the one at bar there must be evidence upon which the jury or court can base a finding of the fact that the intent of the grantor at the time of the grant was to defraud his creditors. * * * Pronounced insolvency at the time of the grant would no doubt be a strong circumstance tending to show fraudulent intent, and, in the absence of other controlling facts, it would be sufficient to justify a finding of such intent."

By the amended act a voluntary conveyance, or a conveyance without a valuable consideration, is declared to be fraudulent and void as to existing creditors if the grantor is insolvent at the time of the grant, or in contemplation of insolvency. The intent is no longer, in such case, a question of fact, to be alleged and proved. Indeed, there need be no intent alleged or proved. The law declares the conveyance to be fraudulent and void, and produces the same result without proof of actual fraud being shown. Under the former law insolvency was only a circumstance tending to show fraudulent intent; and while insolvency, if "pronounced at the time of the grant, would be a strong circumstance tending to show fraudulent intent," there might be "other controlling facts" which would relieve the act from any fraudulent intent, and in such case the grant would stand. But not so now. No other conceivable facts would control when the fact of insolvency is shown and the conveyance is voluntary, or without valuable consideration. Section 3439, Civ. Code, under which this case arises, provides: "Every transfer of property * * * made * * * with intent to delay or defraud any creditor * * * is void against all creditors of the debtor. * * *" But section 3442 formerly said that this fraudulent intent is in all cases a question of fact, and not of law. Now, however, the fraudulent intent in certain cases is a question of law, and not of fact. When Joseph A. Cook conveyed to his wife, the law said that the deed should not be adjudged fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration. There must be intent to defraud, and insolvency did not alone, and of necessity, establish that intent. As the law now is, a deed without valuable consideration by a party insolvent is, as to existing creditors, fraudulent and void. Under the old law the plaintiff's deed might have been good, and the title pass to her; and, if so, can that title be disturbed by any law subsequently passed, whether it be a new rule of evidence relating to a remedy, or some other form of law more directly rendering the title void? If plaintiff owned the land in 1891, whether she got it by gift or however else, can the legislature subsequently make a new rule of evidence, in any case where her title may be drawn in question, that will have the effect to destroy the title with which she had been previously invested by law? It seems to me that the proposition of appellant has neither justice, reason, nor authority to support it. Prior to April 1, 1878, the Code of Civil Procedure (section 325) laid down certain elements constituting adverse possession where claim of title is claimed, not founded on a written instrument, etc. On the day above named a new element was introduced by the legislature, to wit, that the claimant, his predecessors and grantors, must have paid all the taxes levied and assessed upon the land. This court has frequently held that this new element of adverse possession had no retroactive effect, and could in no wise affect a title that had ripened under the former law. Sharp v. Blankenship, 59 Cal. 288, and cases there cited. No part of the Code is retroactive unless expressly so declared. Code Civ. Proc. § 3. The principle decided in Sharp v. Blankenship seems to me to be so closely analogous to the question here presented as to make it decisive and conclusive.

In view of the facts in this case, under the law in force when the conveyance was made, did title pass to plaintiff beyond the reach of defendant as a creditor of the grantor? Was the transfer by said Cook made with intent to defraud defendant? Appellant's brief is constructed upon the theory that the law of the case is found in section 3442, Civ. Code, as amended in 1895, and we therefore have not the full benefit of counsel's views upon the case as judged by the section before amended. He claims under the amended section alone. I will endeavor, however, to meet every possible question presented by the evidence. It is urged that the deed was not delivered on the day of its date as found by the court. The husband testified that he delivered the deed to plaintiff on the day of its date, June 1, 1891. She testified that she thought it was not delivered until the following September or October. The trial court took the date of delivery given by the husband, and as there was no evidence to dispute this fact, except that of the wife, and she differing only as to the date, but not as to the fact of delivery, I think the finding should stand. Besides, the delivery assumed as of date September or October, 1891, would not change the result. The attachment was not served until November 5, 1892.

The facts that may be urged by appellant as badges of fraud are (1) that the deed was not acknowledged until November 17, 1892, nor recorded until November 26, 1892, 21 days after the writ of attachment was levied; (2) that defendant was at the time an existing creditor of the grantor; (3) that the deed was without valuable consideration; (4) that the grantor was insolvent when he made the deed.

As to the acknowledgment and recordation of the deed there is no evidence as to whether said Joseph A. Cook had been served with summons in the attachment suit before the deed was acknowledged, nor is there any evidence that he had been served with summons or knew of the suit before the deed was recorded, nor that the acknowledgment or recordation of the deed was the result of the suit. While an inference might have been otherwise drawn from the facts in evidence, we cannot say that the court erred in not drawing it. But there is no evidence tending to show that plaintiff had at any time prior to bringing the suit, nor for long after, any knowledge whatever of the suit, or the circumstances out of which it arose.

It does appear beyond dispute that defendant was a creditor of said Joseph A. Cook when the deed was made. This indebtedness had its origin in certain shares of the Artesian Land & Water Company, a corporation, owned by said Joseph A. Cook. Defendant was a creditor of the corporation, and sued it by foreclosure proceeding in 1888, and obtained judgment for a deficiency in 1890. It was upon the proportion of this liability due from said Cook as a stockholder upon which defendant afterwards attached the land in question.

As to the consideration, the deed reads: "The party of the first part, in consideration of the sum of one dollar and other consideration dollars ($1.00) [sic] to him in hand duly paid, has sold to party of the second part, her heirs," etc. Both husband and wife testified that she paid him one dollar at the delivery of the deed. The wife also testified that her husband owned a certain house in Auburn, N. Y., the proceeds of which her husband had always said she should have, and that he had realized $5,000 out of this property and put in the California property (the subject of this litigation), and that when he got his title to the California property he would deed it to her. He testified that long before the date of the deed (June 1, 1891) he had told her he would convey the California property to her as soon as he got his title. The Auburn property stood in the name of the husband. But, if these facts could be held not to import a valuable consideration, the law declared that a transfer could not be adjudged fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration. The circumstances, therefore, relating to the consideration, can only figure in determining whether they tended to show fraud. At the time of the transfer, plaintiff knew nothing of the indebtedness of her husband existing in California. She did not know of the attachment until long after it was commenced, and after the deed was recorded and this suit was brought. No evidence points to her knowledge of her husband's insolvency, or belief that he was insolvent, or of facts that would put a prudent person having an interest upon inquiry. So far as the evidence shows, she was an innocent vendee, without notice of any legal infirmity in the title or in the grantor. Whether the transfer was or was not without valuable consideration, as has been said, can only be regarded as indicia of fraud. It was held in Ryan v. Tomlinson, 39 Cal. 639, "that a verbal agreement for an exchange of real property, which has been carried into effect by the execution of proper conveyances in pursuance of the agreement, is not void under the statute of frauds." In Robins v. Hope, 57 Cal. 493, it was said: "Where an adequate motive for making a deed is apparent, that circumstance [want of consideration] does not necessarily militate against the bona fides of the transaction." When the deed was made to plaintiff both the husband and wife understood that it was to carry out the previous agreement that plaintiff should become the owner of the California property, and I think that, under the circumstances, there was an adequate motive for making the deed. The husband, as we shall see later on, was in good circumstances financially, and there was nothing in their surroundings to suggest insolvency at that time, or danger of insolvency. And it was competent for plaintiff to show other consideration than that mentioned in the deed. Carty v. Connolly, 91 Cal. 15, 27 Pac. 599.

I can find no evidence of fraudulent intent on the part of grantor or grantee in the matter of consideration. But it is urged that the husband was insolvent when he conveyed to his wife, and that the conveyance was voluntary, and therefore void. Appellant's position is a non sequitur, because it omits the essential additional element of fraudulent intent. Since the very elaborate consideration of this question by Mr. Justice Garoutte in Bull v. Bray, 89 Cal. 286, 26 Pac. 873 (many times since approved), there has been no doubt as to the law of this state, and it is that, "in an action by a judgment creditor to set aside deeds of gift made by the judgment debtor to his wife as being void as against prior creditors, it is necessary specifically to find that the deeds were made with a fraudulent intent in order to sustain a judgment for the plaintiff, and such findings cannot be inferred from findings that the deeds were without consideration, and that the judgment debtor was insolvent when he made them, though without full knowledge of his actual financial condition, and that by the making of them he hindered, delayed, and defrauded the plaintiff in the collection of his debt." In a concurring opinion, Mr. Chief Justice Beatty said: "It does not seem possible to avoid the conclusion that the law of California on the subject of voluntary conveyances by insolvent debtors is such as in the opinion of Justice Garoutte it is declared to be. But I cannot refrain from expressing the belief that it is most unfortunate that the court should be forced to that conclusion. When an insolvent debtor makes a gift of his property to a donee of his own selection, there can be but one result, so far as creditors are concerned. They are necessarily deprived of what is rightfully theirs, and the law ought to pronounce such a transaction ipso facto fraudulent and void as to them. * * * It ought to be changed, but the legislature alone has the power to change it." And the legislature did change it (probably as the outgrowth of this decision), but the defendant cannot avail himself, as we have seen, of the changed law. But appellant says that the husband was insolvent, and in Emmons v. Barton, 109 Cal., at page 671, 42 Pac. 305, Mr. Justice McFarland, for the court, said: "Pronounced insolvency at the time of the grant would no doubt be a strong circumstance tending to show fraudulent intent, and, in the absence of other controlling facts, it would be sufficient to justify a finding of such intent." Was insolvency proved, and was it of such a pronounced character as to warrant the inference of fraudulent intent? Appellant insists that the evidence shows that the said Cook was insolvent when he made the transfer to his wife. The evidence of Joseph A. Cook is uncontradicted, and tended to show that he owned property in the state of New York at the time of the transfer in question (June 1, 1891) of the value of $36,000, on which there was a mortgage lien of $3,000 and no more; that he continued the ownership until 1893, when the mortgage debt was paid, and the property sold by said Cook to a company then formed, and the said Cook accepted stock in the company for his interest, valued at $30,000. A member of the company was to put in $25,000, and the property (salt works) was to be enlarged. Eight thousand dollars of the company bonds were sold, and $6,000 more used by a director of the company without its knowledge as security for the loan of $6,000 he had made of a friend, making $14,000 of bonded debt. These bonds were secured by a deed of trust or mortgage on all the corporate property. The mortgage or deed of trust was subsequently foreclosed for this bonded debt, and all the property sold under foreclosure, and the said Cook thus lost all his interest in the property. This took place, as testified to by said Cook, some time in 1894. The trial court evidently regarded this as sufficient to show that the said Cook was not insolvent in 1891, when he made the transfer to plaintiff, and we cannot say that the court erred in this conclusion. But it was urged by appellant at the trial, and is urged here, that the ownership of property in

New York state at the time of the transfer, or the solvency of the grantor in New York at that time, is not to be considered, if, with respect to his property in the state of California, and his indebtedness in the latter state at the time of the transfer, he was not solvent. The said Cook is not shown to have had any property in this state at the time of his indebtedness to defendant, other than his interest in the property mentioned in the complaint, and the value of this interest nowhere appears. It was bid in at the sale for the debt. The question is presented whether a person residing in another state, and being indebted in this state to an amount equal to or in excess of the value of his property owned in this state, but who has ample property in the state of his residence to meet all his obligations, must be regarded as insolvent, and that a voluntary transfer of his property in this state, or a transfer without a valuable consideration, is fraudulent and void as to creditors at the time of the transfer. When is a person insolvent under our law? The act of 1880 in force when the transfer in question was made does not define what shall constitute insolvency. In Washburn v. Huntington, 78 Cal. 573, 21 Pac. 305, this court said that it saw no reason why the definition of insolvency as given in section 3450, Civ. Code, is not correct under the act of 1880. The section reads: "A debtor is insolvent within the meaning of this title [the title is "Assignments for the Benefit of Creditors"] when he is unable to pay his debts from his own means, as they become due." There is no suggestion here that the "means" from which the debts are to be paid must exist in this state. In the case of Sacry v. Lobree, 84 Cal. 41, 23 Pac. 1088, the definition of insolvency was very fully given,—perhaps more fully than elsewhere to be found in our Reports,—but it did not involve the question here. In Thompson v. Paige, 16 Cal. 77, it was held that an instruction "that a man who is insolvent for the want of means to pay his debts in this state is in law insolvent, without reference to any property in another state," was too broadly stated. The question is too important a one to decide in a case where it is not necessarily involved. In the case here, insolvency is only an evidence of fraud, and while it might in some cases be conclusive, if property elsewhere than in this state must be excluded, I do not think it so in this cause, in any view. The evidence shows the financial condition of the husband when he made the deed, and has already been referred to. There is no evidence tending to show that in 1891 either the husband or wife had any doubt of his solvency. There is nothing to show that the deed was made because of any financial embarrassment of the husband, present or prospective. At that time the liability of the husband to defendant had been ascertained, but there is no evidence that the husband knew of its existence. The attachment suit was brought against the husband 16 months after the deed was made, and while the husband was operating his salt works in New York. It is claimed that the husband made certain statements to defendant in 1893 tending to show that the deed was made to avoid the attachment or defraud defendant. The statements are denied by the husband as a witness, but, even if he made them, I do not think he could be heard to impeach his title made two years before; and to receive such statements as importing verity, and resulting in the overthrow of plaintiff's title, there should be no doubt left in the mind of the court that they truly reflected the situation when the deed was made. The court below found no evidence of fraud in the transaction; and, if the court erred in holding that the said Cook was not insolvent, I do not think that the technical insolvency shown, on the theory of insolvency advanced by appellant, was such as to evidence fraud. My conclusion, therefore, is that there was no reversible error in the interlocutory decree, and it is recommended that the cause be remanded, with directions to proceed to partition the property in accordance with the findings and judgment of the court below.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed, with directions to proceed to partition the property in accordance with the findings and judgment.

LOFTUS et al. v. FISCHER et al. (Sac. 123, 185.) [1]

APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

Plaintiffs alleged the existence of a partnership and asked an accounting, and a defendant by answer joined with the plaintiffs in that allegation, and made allegations of an affirmative character against a co-defendant, and also filed a cross complaint against such co-defendant, seeking a partnership accounting. The court on motion struck such affirmative matter from the answer, and sustained a demurrer to the cross complaint without leave to amend, and found, from the evidence submitted, that there was no partnership. Held that, if it was error to have sustained the motion and demurrer, it was not prejudicial.

Department 2. Appeals from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Suit by Mariam V. Loftus and another against Jacob Fischer and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Defendant Charles J. Behlow sought relief against his co-defendant Jacob Fischer, and from a judgment for Fischer he appeals. Appeals were also taken from an order, made after final judgment, directing property to be turned over to one of the defendants. Affirmed.

Jas. L. Crittenden, for appellants. Scrivner & Schell and Wheaton, Kalloch & Kierce, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. These are separate appeals from the judgment, taken within 60 days after its rendition, the evidence being brought up for review by a bill of exceptions. In the case numbered "Sacramento 123" the plaintiffs are appellants; in the case numbered "Sacramento 185" defendant Behlow is appellant. As the points presented upon both appeals are identical, they may be considered in one opinion. There are also appeals from an order of the court, made after final judgment, directing the receiver to turn over the property to the defendant corporation, the Consolidated Golden Gate & Sulphuret Mining & Development Company.

This litigation has repeatedly been before the court in one or another of the different phases which it has assumed. An extended review of the facts is therefore unnecessary. It will suffice to refer, for them, to the cases of Behlow v. Fischer, 102 Cal. 208, 36 Pac. 509; Fischer v. Superior Court, 98 Cal. 67, 32 Pac. 875; Loftus v. Fischer, 106 Cal. 616, 39 Pac. 1064; Loftus v. Fischer, 114 Cal. 131, 45 Pac. 1058; Fischer v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 129, 42 Pac. 561.

The amended complaint, upon which the present appeal comes before this court, pleads the formation and existence of a mining partnership, of which plaintiffs were members; pleads the formation of the defendant corporation, that it was organized to be but the name and mere medium of the partnership in carrying on its business, and that the co-partnership should be the real and beneficial owner of the property to be transferred through the name of the corporation; pleads the conveyance to the corporation of the partnership property; pleads the issuance by the corporation to the partners of shares of its stock, which were only to represent the interests of the partners, respectively, in the partnership; pleads the continuance of the partnership in this form; avers an interest in the partnership upon the part of certain defendants, and in particular upon the part of defendants Long and Behlow; sets forth certain acts and threatened acts of defendant Fischer imperiling the interests of the partners and of the partnership business, in fraud of their rights; and asks that an accounting be had, the respective interests of the partners determined, and the affairs of the partnership closed. There is also an allegation that Fischer purchased from the co-partnership 19,200 shares, and caused said 19,200 shares to be issued in the name of Charles Behlow, and that these shares were thereafter transferred by him to Fischer.

Defendant Behlow answered, making no denial of any of the matters set forth in the complaint, saving that he denied that the 19,200 shares issued to him had been transferred by him to Fischer, "except by reason of a fraud practiced and perpetrated upon him by said Fischer," and then proceeded at great length to set forth the facts and circumstances of the alleged fraud. These allegations, in brief, charge Fischer with obtaining by fraud 22,000 shares of the stock, the rightful property of Behlow, and an additional 5,000 shares of stock from Long, to whose interest, it is averred, Behlow had succeeded. The prayer is that the court decree that Behlow is and always has been the owner of an interest in the partnership to the extent of 5,000 shares, and that the court decree that the 22,000 shares were obtained by Fischer from him through fraud and fraudulent representations, that Behlow be declared to be the rightful owner thereof and of the interest in the co-partnership represented thereby, that Fischer be required to assign and deliver the same to him and to account to him for all moneys received as dividends thereon, and that Behlow's total interest in said co-partnership be decreed to be represented by 31,800 shares of the capital stock. The prayer joins that of the complaint in asking for an accounting, a dissolution, and the appointment of a receiver.

At the time of the filing of this answer defendant Behlow also filed a cross complaint, in which all the history of the copartnership, and the transfer of its property and business to the corporation as its agent for the conduct and management thereof, are set forth, the same specific averments of fraud are made against Fischer, and the same relief is prayed for. This cross complaint is substantially the same as was Behlow's complaint in intervention. Loftus v. Fischer, 114 Cal. 131, 45 Pac. 1058. Motion was made by defendant Fischer to strike out defendant Behlow's answer, and a general demurrer was also interposed to the cross complaint. The court struck from the answer all the affirmative matter therein contained touching the alleged fraudulent practices of Fischer. It likewise sustained the demurrer to the cross complaint, and refused to cross complainant leave to amend.

In this state of the pleadings trial was had. The court found as follows: "The said corporation never contracted or agreed that it would act as the agent of any partnership whatever, and never did act as an agent for any partnership whatever. The said corporation never contracted or agreed that the said partnership, nor any partnership, could carry on any partnership business whatever, either in the name of said corporation or by means of the said corporation, in any manner or way whatever, and no partnership business was ever carried on under or in the name of said corporation in any manner or form whatever. The court further finds that, when the said E. C. Loftus, Charles J. Behlow, Jacob A. Fischer, and William G. Long conveyed to the said corporation, by the deed of September 4, 1889, the property described therein, and the said corporation had paid the consideration and performed the conditions which it was agreed should be performed, as stated in the offer made to said corporation by the said parties of the 3d day of September, 1889, all of the partnership debts and liabilities of the said parties became entirely settled, and all of the partnership property was entirely disposed of, and from that time to the present there has been no unsettled matters of the partnership which existed between the said parties." These findings are amply sustained by the evidence. The judgment and decree in accordance with them, and the other findings made, denied plaintiffs and defendant Behlow the relief sought.

Appellants complain of the ruling of the court striking out portions of the answer, and sustaining, without leave to amend, the demurrer to the cross complaint. It is contended that, the action being one for a partnership accounting, it was necessary for the court to determine the interests, respectively, of the partners, and that to do this it was incumbent upon the court, and indeed necessary for it, to entertain the cross complaint, and to hear and pass upon the charges of fraud contained in the answer, by which it is asserted that Behlow was nominally, but not in equity, deprived of his partnership interest, indicated by the shares of stock. But, under the circumstances of this case, this question does not call for determination. Though Behlow's claims against Fischer were eliminated, and though it may be conceded that, in the absence of the eliminated pleadings, it was impossible for the court to have determined as between Behlow and Fischer what their respective interests in the partnership might have been, the controversy first to be determined by the court was whether or not a partnership existed. Upon this proposition Behlow was upon the side of the plaintiffs, and he was not deprived by the court of his right to make any proper showing. Had Behlow's pleadings remained in the case, the court, in directing the order of proof, would have first required substantial evidence of the existence of the partnership as pleaded before it passed on to the determination of the respective partners' interests. Upon this question all the parties were before the court, and all were given a hearing; and after this hearing the court determined, as the findings disclose, that the partnership pleaded did not in fact exist, and had in fact terminated by the conduct of the partners, under the terms of their agreement with and conveyance to the corporation. Therefore, if it be conceded that the rulings of the court were erroneous (and this is not decided), it was error which, under the determination of the court upon the question of partnership, could not and did not injure the defendant Behlow.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed, and with it the order of court, made after judgment, directing the receiver to turn over the property to the defendant corporation. For the reasons given in Loftus v. Fischer, 114 Cal. 131, 45 Pac. 1058, the motion to tax appellants' costs upon these appeals against respondents is denied.

BROOKS v. FORINGTON. (L. A. 125.)

MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE — COUNSEL FEES — COMPLAINT—SCOPE OF PRAYER.

1. On foreclosure by action, recovery cannot be had on default for counsel fees stipulated in the mortgage under a prayer for sale of the mortgaged premises, and application of the proceeds to the amount due, though the right to such counsel fees is averred in the complaint; Code Civ. Proc. § 580, providing that the relief granted on default cannot exceed that "demanded" in the complaint.

2. Such counsel fees are not part of the "costs of suit," so as to be recoverable under a prayer therefor; Code Civ. Proc. § 1021, providing that costs and disbursements shall be allowed "as hereinafter provided," and there being no statute allowing counsel fees as costs.

3. A provision in a mortgage that there might be retained, out of the proceeds of foreclosure, "all costs and charges of suit, including counsel fees," does not make such fees a part of the costs, so as to be recoverable on default under a prayer for "costs of suit."

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Action by Truman Brooks against W. S. Forington to foreclose a mortgage. There was a judgment for foreclosure on default, and defendant appeals. Modified.

Geo. B. Fletcher, for appellant. Wm. R. Cooley and F. A. Dorn, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. Action to foreclose a mortgage, in which defendant suffered default. The mortgage provided that, in the event of foreclosure, the mortgagee might retain from the proceeds of sale the costs and charges of suit, "including counsel fees at the rate of — per cent." The prayer asked for the principal and interest due, "and for costs of suit," the sale of the mortgaged premises, and application of proceeds in payment of the amount due, and for general relief; but it did not in terms ask an award of counsel fees. The court, in its decree, however, made plaintiff an allowance for counsel fees in the action; and the only question involved in the appeal is whether the allowance of that item was proper under the circumstances. Appellant contends that it was not; that the allowance was in excess of the relief demanded in the complaint; and that this was in violation of section 580 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides: "The relief granted to the plaintiff, if there be no answer, cannot exceed that which he shall have demanded in his complaint." Respondent contends that the prayer was sufficient to entitle the court to make such allowance; that in an action of foreclosure it is only necessary to aver the specific relief to which plaintiff is entitled; and that under a general prayer that the mortgaged premises be sold, and the proceeds applied to the amount found due, the plaintiff would be entitled, on default, to any relief consistent with the averments of the complaint; that, as the right to counsel fees was properly averred, the award thereof was authorized. The position of respondent does not find support in the decisions of this court giving application to section 580. The relief "demanded in his complaint" is held to refer to the relief asked in the prayer,—the feature of the pleading to which alone reference may be had in default cases to ascertain what relief the plaintiff seeks; and the rule of the statute applies in its strictness to actions in foreclosure alike with those of any other character. Raun v. Reynolds, 11 Cal. 14, 19; Gautier v. English, 29 Cal. 165; Parrott v. Den, 34 Cal. 79. In Raun v. Reynolds, where the objection was to the manner in which the property was directed by the decree to be sold, it is said, in reversing the judgment: "Judgment was taken in the cause by default, and the decree could give no relief beyond that which was demanded in the bill. Prac. Act, § 147. The complaint simply asked a foreclosure of the mortgage and a sale of the property to satisfy the judgment. There was no prayer that the sale should be had in a manner different from that prescribed in the statute for sales of real property under execution. Admitting the authority of the courts to direct in the decree the manner in which the sale should be conducted, there is no allegation in the complaint which would warrant a demand that the usual course adopted in judicial sales should be departed from in this instance." In Gautier v. English it was held that a judgment by default in an action in foreclosure on a note drawing interest at more than the legal rate should not direct that the judgment bear interest at the conventional rate, in the absence of a demand for that rate in the prayer. In Parrott v. Den the complaint averred that the mortgage allowed the plaintiff to retain, out of the proceeds of sale, counsel fees of 5 per cent., and all taxes and assessments upon the property paid by the mortgagor, with interest thereon at 2 per cent. per month; and the prayer asked for the counsel fees, but omitted any demand for the taxes or interest thereon or on the counsel fees, which latter items were, however, allowed to plaintiff by the court below. This was held error, "in that the relief granted exceeds the relief demanded in the complaint"; and the allowances in excess of the specific demand of the prayer were ordered stricken from the judgment.

Applying the rule of these cases,—and we are pointed to none to the contrary,—it is quite obvious that respondent was not entitled to counsel fees under the general features his prayer suggested. Nor was he so entitled, under the demand therein, "for costs of suit." Counsel fees are not costs or disbursements in the action allowed by the statute to the prevailing party. Code Civ. Proc. § 1021. Nor, when provided for by the terms of the contract, is such charge deemed a part of the costs, or recoverable as such, but is in the nature of "a special damage expressly authorized by the contract to be recovered in addition to the general damages," and must be expressly averred, with the right in defendant to defend specially against its allowance. Prescott v. Grady, 91 Cal. 518, 27 Pac. 755. Manifestly, then, such specific relief may not be had on default under any general prayer for damages and costs. Being matter of purely special or exceptional recovery, and the defendant being entitled to look solely to the prayer in determining whether he will defend against the relief sought in the action, if such special relief is not therein specifically demanded it is to be deemed waived. Gautier v. English, supra.

But it has been suggested that, although such fees are not included in the general or statutory costs, there is no reason why the parties may not, by their contract, make them a part of the costs in the action, and stipulate that they shall be recovered as such, and that such is the effect of the stipulation in the mortgage; and the recent case of O'Neal v. Hart (Cal.) 47 Pac. 926, is cited in support of the suggestion. But, assuming that it would be competent for the parties to make that a part of the costs which is not such by law, we do not regard the language of the mortgage as having that effect. It makes the counsel fee a charge against the mortgagor, recoverable on the foreclosure, and secured by the mortgage, but not as costs of the action; and that is all that is decided in O'Neal v. Hart. We think the item of counsel fees was improperly allowed, and that the judgment should be modified by striking that item therefrom. The cause is remanded to the court below, with directions to modify its judgment accordingly; appellant to have his costs of the appeal.

MEHERIN et al. v. SAN FRANCISCO PRODUCE EXCHANGE. (S. F. 465.)

LACHES—BAR TO EQUITABLE RELIEF—PRIOR DEMAND—LIMITATIONS.

1. Where a firm, without excuse, delays for more than seven years to take any steps to set aside an order suspending it from membership privileges in a produce exchange, a finding that its rights to equitable relief have been barred by its laches will not be disturbed.

2. Where a demand is necessary before the commencement of an action, it must be made at least within the statutory period of limitations, since a person cannot extend the statute of limitations indefinitely by failing to make demand.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Denis J. Meherin and another against the San Francisco Produce Exchange. From a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Mullany, Grant & Cushing, for appellants. Garber, Boalt & Bishop, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The plaintiffs constitute a partnership under the firm name of Meherin Bros., and as such were a member of the defendant, which is a corporation very similar in its character and purposes to the other numerous produce exchanges throughout the country, described by Messrs. Bisbe & Simonds in their treatise on the Law of the Produce Exchange. On November 12, 1884, the defendant, by a unanimous vote of its governing body, suspended the plaintiffs from membership privileges until certain decisions recited in the resolution of suspension as having been made by the arbitration committee and the committee of appeals of the defendant should be complied with. On the 4th day of June, 1892, the plaintiffs commenced this action for the purpose of having it adjudged that they were a member in good standing of the defendant, and entitled to all the rights, privileges, etc., of such member, and that the defendant corporation be adjudged to permit plaintiffs to exercise all their rights as a member thereof, and that plaintiffs also have judgment against defendant for $20,000 damages for exclusion from said privileges. The case was tried without a jury. The court made findings and rendered judgment for the defendant, and plaintiffs appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

A great deal of the testimony, most of the findings, and the main parts of the arguments and briefs of counsel were directed to certain matters which occurred on a trial of plaintiffs for an alleged violation of their duties as a member of the defendant before a certain arbitration committee and a committee on appeals of the defendant, and other matters touching the character and purpose of the defendant, its powers, the sufficiency of notices given appellants of the trial before said committees, etc. The findings of the court upon all of these matters were in favor of respondent, but we do not deem it necessary to follow counsel in their elaborate arguments of these points, because we think that the judgment must be affirmed for another reason.

The court, among other things, found as follows: "That plaintiffs, and each of them, for more than seven and a half years after the said resolution of the board of directors of the corporation defendant suspending them from membership, acquiesced in such suspension, and took no steps whatever to set aside such suspension, and were and are guilty of laches in the premises, and that no fact or circumstance has been shown to the court tending to excuse the same or to counteract the effect thereof." The foregoing was among the findings of fact, and the court, among its conclusions of law, found "that, even if otherwise entitled to relief, plaintiffs are, and each of them is, barred in equity by their laches in not sooner instituting this action." We think that these findings are fully warranted by the evidence and the law. Whether or not the plaintiff has been guilty of laches in any particular case is a question very largely within the province of the trial court. As was said in Chapman v. Bank, 97 Cal. 159, 31 Pac. 897: "The matter is one which is left to the sound discretion of the chancellor in each case. The learned judge of the court below found that the plaintiff's cause of action was barred by his laches, and the finding must stand." If the plaintiffs ever had a cause of action at all, such action accrued at the time that the resolution of suspension was passed, which was nearly eight years before the commencement of the action. The respondent has done no other act in the premises since the passage of the resolution of suspension. On the 11th of August, 1890, appellants demanded of respondents that they be permitted to exercise the rights of a member in good standing of said defendant; but that does not put any different phase on the question, and this demand itself was not made until six years after the suspension.

It is not necessary to consider whether or not such a demand was necessary before the commencement of the action, because, if such a demand was necessary, it should have been made within a reasonable time, which would have been at least within the statutory period of limitations after the order of suspension. In such a case a party cannot extend the statute of limitations indefinitely by failing to make a demand. Opinion by Beatty, C. J., in Bills v. Mining Co., 106 Cal. 21, 39 Pac. 43; Prescott v. Gonser, 34 Iowa, 179; Baker v. Johnson Co., 33 Iowa, 151; Codman v. Rogers, 10 Pick. 119. In the case last cited the court say: "A party must not be permitted to sleep over his rights to the prejudice of the party on whom he makes the claim, who by the delay may be deprived of the evidence and means of effectually defending himself. A demand must be made within a reasonable time; otherwise the claim is considered stale, and no relief will be granted in a court of equity. What is to be considered a reasonable time for this purpose does not appear to be settled by a precise rule. It must depend on circumstances. If no cause for delay be shown, it would seem reasonable to require the demand to be made within the time limited by the statute for bringing the action. There is the same reason for hastening the demand that there is for hastening the commencement of the action, and in both cases the same presumptions arise from delay."

In the case at bar the court found that there were no circumstances to excuse the delay, and this finding cannot be successfully attacked. It is true that the appellants paid certain dues and assessments, but they were those for which a suspended member was liable. The evidence does not show any act done by respondent preventing appellants from exercising their rights of membership, other than the suspension by the resolution of November 12, 1884; so that the situation of the parties with respect to the right of the appellants to the privileges of a member of the defendant was exactly the same at the time this suit was brought as it was at the time of the suspension. The resolution of suspension prevented appellants from exercising any of the rights of a member of respondent, and appellants so understood it from the date of its adoption. Therefore, appellants' cause of action, if any they ever had, accrued in November, 1884. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SAN LUIS WATER CO. v. ESTRADA et al.

OBJECTIONS TO PLEADING—WAIVER—CORPORATION—SPECIAL ACT — SALE OF FRANCHISE — WATER RIGHT—QUANTITY—EVIDENCE—RIPARIAN OWNER—FAILURE TO PLEAD—FINDING—HARMLESS ERROR—DIVERSION OF WATER—CHANGE OF PLACE—APPEAL—REVIEW OF EVIDENCE.

1. By going to trial on the merits without objection to the answer or any evidence under it, plaintiff waives the objection that certain allegations of the complaint are not specifically denied.

2. Act March 28, 1872, granted to three persons "and their assigns" the exclusive right for 25 years to supply the inhabitants of the town of S. with water. It prescribed certain duties, and authorized the town "to purchase all the works and franchises" granted, after 15 years. A corporation was duly organized three years later, and became the owner of the franchise through mesne conveyances. It did not appear that any of the original grantees had any interest in the corporation, or that they had caused it to be formed. Held, that the original grant was not the creation of a corporation by special act, within the prohibition of Const. art. 4, § 31.

3. The grant, being to the grantees "and their assigns," conferred the right to sell or assign the franchise.

4. Under Civ. Code, § 354, empowering a corporation "to purchase, hold, and convey such real and personal estate as the purposes of the corporation may require," and "to enter into any obligations or contracts essential to the transaction of its ordinary affairs, or for the purposes of the corporation," a corporation formed to supply a town with water may purchase and hold a valid franchise, previously granted to certain persons, of the exclusive right for years to furnish such supply.

5. A finding that a diversion of water amounted to 500,000 gallons a day is supported by the testimony of a civil engineer that in 1894 he measured the quantity by velocity and by actual measurement, and found it to equal that quantity, and by the testimony of one who was superintendent of the water company from 1888 to 1894 that he had seen the flume carry 400,000 gallons and had never seen it run full, and that the size of the flume had never been altered,—the evidence being uncontradicted.

6. A superintendent of a water company from 1878 to 1888 testified that the company had diverted the water continuously since 1878, and that the size of the flume by which the diversion was made was the same then as at the time of the trial, and that the company had what its flume would carry all the time; but did not testify as to the actual quantity. Held, that the court could find that the appropriation prior to 1878 was equal to the quantity flowing afterward.

7. On a trial to quiet plaintiff's title to water appropriated in 1875, it appeared that plaintiff had the exclusive right to furnish the city of S.

with water, and had used and was using the water right for that purpose; that plaintiff claimed an appropriation of 500,000 gallons a day, and that the original appropriation had not been enlarged. Plaintiff was allowed to show how much water was required to supply the city of S. in 1894. Held, that the evidence was admissible to show, at least, that plaintiff was not taking water in excess of its needs, and possible error was not prejudicial to defendants, since the reviewing court cannot say as a fact that the population, if smaller in earlier years, used less water then than was used in 1894.

8. Where the evidence is conflicting, findings by the trial court will not be disturbed.

9. In an action by a lower appropriator to quiet his title to the waters of a stream as against an upper appropriator and riparian owner, where defendant pleads only a prior appropriation, and fails to allege that he is entitled as a riparian owner to any definite quantity, or what proportion of the stream he could reasonably exhaust, an issue as to the extent of defendant's right as a mere riparian proprietor is not raised.

10. Where plaintiff bases his claim to a water right on a prior appropriation and adverse use, and the evidence establishes the right by prior appropriation only, a finding for plaintiff as to adverse use is not reversible error.

11. A riparian owner, or an appropriator of water, may change the place of diversion, and the appropriator may do so, if necessary, even on the servient tenement, when others are not injured by the change.

12. The necessity of pointing out wherein the evidence is insufficient to justify a finding, as claimed, is obviated where there is no evidence to sustain the finding, and the various points raised have necessarily called attention to that fact.

13. It is error to exclude evidence where no ground for the objection to it is stated.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A Gregg, Judge.

Action by the San Luis Water Company against Alberto Estrada and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order overruling a motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Modified.

Venable & Goodchild and W. H. Spencer, for appellants. Graves & Graves, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. This is an action to quiet the title of plaintiff to the waters of San Luis Obispo creek, and to restrain the defendants from diverting said waters. The complaint alleges that plaintiff became a corporation June 4, 1895, whose object it was to furnish the town (now the city) of San Luis Obispo, in the county of that name, and the inhabitants thereof, with pure, fresh water, and is now so engaged; that plaintiff became the owner about the date named, by assignment and through mesne conveyances, of a certain franchise, granted by the legislature of California to M. A. Benrimo and others by an act entitled "An act to provide for the introduction of good and pure water into the town of San Luis Obispo," approved March 28, 1872; that the grantees of said franchise, and plaintiff and its predecessors in the ownership of said franchise, have in all things complied with the terms and conditions thereof; that, to carry out the purposes of the corporation, it erected a dam across the bed of San Luis Obispo creek about October 25, 1875, and appropriated and diverted through a dam, pipes, and flume all the waters of said creek, and ever since said date has continuously and adversely to defendants, and under claim of right, diverted all said waters, and ever since said date has been, and now is, the owner of all the waters of said creek; that about June 25, 1894, certain of the defendants built dams across said creek in its natural bed above plaintiff's point of diversion, and by means thereof diverted said waters through flumes and ditches on the lands owned by certain of said defendants, and are now using said waters and obstructing their flow, and are preventing plaintiff from diverting and using all of said waters; that said defendants threaten to keep said dams across said creek and obstruct the flow of water, etc. The complaint was verified. Jones and Moreland, two of the defendants, by their attorneys, filed a demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled, and they filed a separate answer. No point is made on the demurrer. To the answer of Jones and Moreland respondent objects that it is not sufficient, and that judgment should be affirmed as to them. But plaintiff went to trial on the merits without objection to the answer, or any evidence offered under it, and will not be allowed to raise the point for the first time in this court that certain allegations of the complaint are not specifically denied. It will be held to have waived all objection by failure to except at the proper time. McCullough v. Clark, 41 Cal. 298. The court found the allegations of the complaint to be true, with certain modifications. It found that one Joaquin Estrada, predecessor of some of the defendants, for more than 22 years prior to 1893, was in the quiet possession of certain land lying on said creek immediately above the point of plaintiff's diversion; that all the time said Estrada had been in possession he used of the waters of said creek for ordinary domestic purposes, and for watering stock, and said uses continued to the present time; that about 1870 said Estrada built a dam across said creek near his house on said land, and appropriated by a ditch on the east side of the creek waters sufficient for all seasons when required to irrigate and raise crops upon 7 acres of said land on the east side of said creek below his said dam, and said water has been used adversely to plaintiff and the whole world (except said Jones and Moreland) to this time; that since 1875 the said Estrada and those claiming under him have appropriated and used sufficient water to irrigate about 35 acres of land for purposes of cultivation, but subordinate to and after plaintiff had taken 500,000 gallons per day of said water; that one Sandy Sumner in 1870 was seised in fee of certain land on said creek next above that of said Estrada; that said Sumner in 1870 erected a dam across said creek, and upon his said land, and diverted waters of said creek by ditch on the easterly side, and used the said water to run a mill, for domestic uses at his house, and for watering stock on said land, and after said use returned the water to the creek channel, and so used said water adversely to plaintiff to February 20, 1882, when, being seised of the lands, he conveyed them to defendant Jones; that Jones continued to use the said waters as had been done by said Sumner; that for six years last past defendant Moreland has been a tenant of said Jones, and has made like use of said waters, and also to irrigate about 5 acres of land, but the irrigation of said 5 acres was after plaintiff had taken its said daily supply of 500,000 gallons. As to the claim of Maria Y. Harris, a defendant, and those claiming under her, the court found that an adverse use to plaintiff and the whole world had been proved to water as diverted through a ditch, or a grade of 2¾ inches fall in its first section of 10 feet, said stream so diverted being 16 inches wide and 1½ inches deep, and appropriating 50,000 gallons of water every 24 hours at the point of diversion, and no more. From these facts thus found the court concludes: That the plaintiff is entitled to the possession and use of 500,000 gallons per day of said water, and is entitled to divert said water at the point of diversion; that those claiming under Joaquin Estrada are entitled, except as against defendants Jones and Moreland, to divert and use by means of their dam sufficient of said waters to irrigate on the east side of said creek as much as can be irrigated by water taken by said dam and ditch constructed by said Estrada; that said Jones and Moreland are entitled, for domestic purposes at their house and for watering stock upon their said land, to divert through their present ditch water for said uses, and to carry the same on the easterly side of said creek to a place on said creek where the said Sumner Mill formerly stood,—the right to use said water for irrigation to be after plaintiff has taken out its 500,000 gallons per day, and subordinate to the rights of plaintiff; that said Maria Y. Harris was seised in fee June 3, 1891, of the lands mentioned in the answer of one of the defendants; that the allegations therein as to certain springs are true; that for more than eight years prior to June 30, 1891, she and those claiming under her had appropriated through flumes and ditches water from said springs, and used the same for watering stock and for irrigation, adversely to the whole world, and said appropriation amounted to 50,000 gallons of water per day. The court grants the injunction prayed, except as to the rights specially found to be in certain defendants, and already noted; the title of plaintiff is quieted to 500,000 gallons per day. The appeal is from the judgment and from the order overruling the motion for a new trial.

The first point made by appellants in the assignments of error is that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence the franchise pleaded in the complaint, and its transfer to plaintiff, and in finding that plaintiff is the owner of said franchise. The precise point made is that the power to supply a city with water cannot be conferred, directly or indirectly, upon a private corporation by special act. By act of the legislature entitled "An act to provide for the introduction of good and pure water into the town of San Luis Obispo," approved March 28, 1872, a certain franchise was granted to M. A. Benrimo, C. W. Dana, and W. W. Hays. Section 1 grants to these persons and their assigns the exclusive right for 25 years to supply the inhabitants of the town of San Luis Obispo with water. Succeeding sections prescribe certain duties to be performed by the grantees, and confer certain rights. By section 7 the town is authorized "to purchase all the works and franchises" granted after 15 years. No other authority to sell is given in terms. The plaintiff is a corporation duly organized under the laws of this state June 4, 1875, and alleges that it became the owner through mesne conveyances of said franchise about the same date last mentioned. Appellants rely upon San Francisco v. Spring Valley Waterworks, 48 Cal. 493. By an act entitled "An act to authorize Geo. H. Ensign and others, owners of the Spring Valley Waterworks, to lay down water pipes in the public streets of the city and county of San Francisco," approved April 23, 1858, the legislature of this state granted to said Ensign and his associates certain rights to lay down water pipes in the streets of San Francisco, prescribing certain details of conditions, not necessary to be stated. Section 8 provided: "This act shall not take effect unless the parties named in section one shall within sixty days after its passage duly organize themselves in conformity with the existing laws regulating corporations now in force in this state." The said Ensign and his associates formed a corporation soon after under the name of the Spring Valley Waterworks, and introduced water into the city. The act of April 23, 1858, was amended subsequently, and certain other legislation occurred with reference to the company, but it is not involved in the question now presented. When this act was passed, section 31, art. 4, of the constitution provided that "corporations may be formed under general laws, and shall not be created by special act, except for municipal purposes." It was contended in the case that arose supra that this was an attempt to confer corporate rights by a special act upon Ensign and his associates in violation of this article of the constitution. It was held by the court that "an act which grants to individuals and their assigns certain powers and privileges, and then provides that the act shall not take effect unless the persons to whom the grant is made shall, within a certain time, organize themselves into a corporation under existing laws, is a grant, not to the individuals as persons, but to the corporation when formed," and the act was held to be unconstitutional in this respect. In the case now before us quite a different state of facts exists. The act conferring the franchise or rights upon Benrimo and his associates had no such condition as that in the act of 1858, requiring them to form a corporation. When the act here in question was passed, the corporation had no existence in fact, or, so far as we know, in expectancy, and it was not formed until three years later, and it does not appear that any of the original grantees of the franchise had any interest in the corporation, or that they caused it to be formed. It seems to me that the only question presented, therefore, is whether the corporation duly formed to supply the town (now city) of San Luis Obispo and the inhabitants thereof with water could, under any circumstances, purchase and become the owner of this franchise. Appellants do not attack the validity of the franchise to Benrimo and associates, but they say that the assignment of the franchise to the corporation was illegal and void, and the corporation could not hold or exercise it. The plaintiff corporation to which the transfer was made was formed for the purpose and object of furnishing the town of San Luis Obispo and the inhabitants thereof with pure, fresh water, and has been so engaged since its organization. Section 283 of the Civil Code declares: "A corporation is a creature of the law, having certain powers and duties of a natural person." In the Dartmouth College Case, 4 Wheat. 636, Chief Justice Marshall said: "Being the mere creature of the law, it possesses only those properties which the charter of its creation confers upon it, either expressly or incidental to its very existence. These are such as are supposed best calculated to effect the object for which it was created. * * " Speaking of certain properties pertaining to corporations, he further said: "They enable a corporation to manage its affairs, to hold property without the perplexing intricacies, the hazardous and endless necessity of perpetual conveyances, for the purpose of transmitting it from hand to hand. It is chiefly for the purpose of clothing bodies of men in succession with these qualities and capacities that corporations were invented and are in use." Among the powers of corporations given by our statutes are: " * * (4) To purchase, hold and convey such real and personal estate as the purposes of the corporation may require, not exceeding the amount limited in this part. * * * (8) To enter into any obligations or contracts essential to the transaction of its ordinary affairs, or for the purposes of the corporation." Civ. Code, § 354. The grant to Benrimo and his associates was also to their assigns. There can be no doubt but that they might, by the terms of the grant, sell or assign the franchise. It seems to me too plain to require argument that the purchase by the plaintiff was strictly and directly within its powers, and contributed necessarily and directly to its objects and purposes. If any connection could be traced between the plaintiff and the passage of the special act of 1872, or it appeared that the act was obtained for the purpose of evading the constitutional inhibition, I could see how the case of San Francisco v. Spring Valley Waterworks, supra, might apply. But, in view of the facts in this case, I cannot regard the article of the constitution mentioned or the case last cited as having any application here.

Second. Appellants urge that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that plaintiff constructed the dam in 1875, or appropriated 500,000 gallons of water, or any water, or that it has used said water adversely to defendants.

1. As to the construction of the dam there was no evidence except incidental references to it by witnesses, but there was no denial by any of the answers that plaintiff did construct a dam in 1875 as alleged, and this fact stands admitted.

2. As to the diversion of 500,000 gallons of water, or any water which is derived, H. Dittrick, a civil engineer, testified: "I made measurements of the water there last year (July, 1894). Know the flume that conducts the water from the creek to the San Luis reservoir. The capacity of this flume is half a million gallons in twenty-four hours. Made measurements in two different ways; first measuring it by velocity, and second by actual measurement. Had a large barrel, and take the time how long it took to fill that barrel, and on the contents of it figured out the flow in twenty-four hours." Mr. Nock, who was superintendent of plaintiff corporation from 1888 to 1894, said he had known the flume to carry 250,000 gallons, and has seen it carry 400,000 gallons. He said he had never seen the flume run full, but it would carry all the waters of the creek in the summer time. The size of the flume was shown to have been the same from the beginning. Defendants offered no evidence as to the capacity of the plaintiff's flume. I think the evidence justified the finding as to quantity.

3. Was there an appropriation by plaintiff, and what was its nature? Appellants deny that the right was adverse to defendants, or that any appropriation was made. The evidence is clear that there was an appropriation. The only matter open to dispute is as to how the right was acquired, and to what extent as against defendants' right. Appellants claim that there is no evidence of quantity taken prior to 1888. Mr. Egan, superintendent from July, 1878, until August, 1888, when he was succeeded by Mr. Nock, testified that the company had diverted the water continuously since 1888, and that the size of the flume by which the diversion was made was the same then as now; that the water company had what its flume would carry all the time. He does not testify as to actual quantity, but I think the court might well have found that the quantity diverted has not been increased, but was the same all the time. At any rate, there would seem to be no good reason for holding otherwise from the evidence.

Evidence was admitted against defendants' objection to show how much water was required to supply the city of San Luis Obispo. I agree with appellants that the growing necessities of the town—assuming that they did grow—did not give plaintiff the right to more water than it had first appropriated, superior to rights that defendants may meanwhile have acquired, and this would be so, I think, whether plaintiff had or not the right of eminent domain; but the evidence might be admissible to show that plaintiff was keeping within the powers and objects of the corporation, and was not taking water in excess of its needs. It would not follow that, because the town now requires 500,000 gallons daily, therefore, the plaintiff appropriated that amount in 1875; and I do not understand that the court admitted the evidence to prove that fact alone. Defendants say that if the town needed 500,000 gallons daily in 1894, it could not have needed so much in 1878, when the population was less; and they say this court will take judicial notice of the United States census for 1880 and 1890 to show this. We cannot say as a fact that less population in 1878 used less water than a greater population used in 1894. This would be carrying inference too far. If it was true, defendants should have proved it, and when proved there might have followed some inference that the appropriation of water was less then. If there was error in admitting the evidence, it was harmless.

Third. It is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that the use of the water by defendants was subordinate to plaintiff's use thereof; and this because such could only be the case (1) when an appropriation of a certain quantity of water had been made prior to defendants acquiring riparian rights; (2) by acquiring water rights from defendants, which could only be in writing,—and there is none; (3) by adverse use,—and there could be none in this case, because plaintiff only took what defendant suffered to flow by.

As we hold that plaintiff made an appropriation of a given quantity of water in 1875, it becomes necessary first to inquire as to defendants' rights at that time. First on the stream above plaintiff's dam was the Estrada land. The Estrada land was in an early day, 1849, occupied by one Bonillo under Mexican grant. He sold his claim in March, 1869, to P. W. Murphy, but the grant lapsed, and no claim is made under it. Bonillo occupied the land up to 1872. It is not clear when Estrada went into possession. The defendants give the date more than 22 years prior to 1893, and the court finds this to be true. United States patent issued to him September 23, 1879. There is a good deal of evidence as to the use and appropriation of water made by Bonillo and Estrada before patent issued. It was public land when they occupied it. It does not appear whether Estrada filed a pre-emption or a homestead. But riparian rights are claimed by defendants. The evidence as to the amount of water appropriated by Bonillo and Estrada prior to 1875 is conflicting. It seems there was water taken and used on the Estrada place, and water used further down, called the "Goldtree Place," and this latter place is the land apparently acquired by plaintiff. The evidence shows an appropriation and use continuously for many years prior to 1875 on the Estrada place, and adversely to plaintiff; but as to the amount the evidence is conflicting. The Estrada garden is variously estimated at from 6 to 30 acres in extent. But whether all the land was irrigated is not clear, nor is it clear just what the extent of the irrigable land was. The witnesses are much confused and involved in their answers, and at times are unintelligible. Apparently references were made to physical objects, a chart or map of which I infer was used at the trial, and which is not given in the record. Looking at the record alone, there would seem to be a preponderance of evidence against the finding as to the extent of land in the Estrada garden, and the land irrigated long before 1875, but there is not much disagreement as to size of the ditch during all the time. The water came from a dam first erected to furnish power to run a mill, and there was evidence that when the mill was run there was no water for irrigation; the ditch could be used for only one purpose at the same time. The trial court could best judge what evidence to believe and what disbelieve, and we cannot now undertake, from the record, to sift the wheat from the chaff. In view of the conflicting evidence, I think the finding of the court as to the Estrada water right, held to be prior to plaintiff's, should stand. The court further found, as to the Estrada water right, the right to irrigate thirty-five acres of land, but subordinate to plaintiff's right to the water. This finding rests upon the evidence of a greater use of water by Estrada since plaintiff's rights accrued than prior to that time. The evidence is conflicting as to when this greater use began, and as to the extent of the use, and as to whether the use was adverse to plaintiff, or under claim of right, or subordinate to plaintiff's right. Much evidence was introduced pro and con as to agreements entered into between plaintiff and some of the defendants,—particularly those representing the Estrada lands,—partly as to whether the money paid by plaintiff was for the right to the water or as wages or compensation for looking after the water for plaintiff, or as to whether it was to avoid trouble with these parties. The evidence is conflicting, and we cannot say the court erred in the conclusions drawn from it. The plaintiff does not claim under defendants by purchase or otherwise. It claims by appropriation, and the evidence tends to establish its claim. There was no attempt made by plaintiff to establish its right by agreement or purchase. The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that such was not the purpose of its payments of money except in one instance, which would not change the result of the evidence, and hence the doctrine laid down in Hayes v. Fine, 91 Cal. 391, 27 Pac. 772, cited by defendants, does not apply.

Appellants make the point also that there could be no appropriation of water by plaintiff by adverse use, for it only took what defendants suffered to flow by, and that defendants had riparian rights which could not be lost by nonuse, and no rights could be acquired by plaintiff by taking water below them; citing Hargrave v. Cook, 108 Cal. 73, 41 Pac. 18. The rights of upper riparian owners as against the rights of lower appropriators of water are very clearly stated by Mr. Justice Henshaw in the case cited. In that case, however, the riparian owner pleaded his rights as such. But in the case here no riparian rights were pleaded by any of the defendants. They pleaded only the right by appropriation. In the case of Water Co. v. Gage, 89 Cal. 410, 26 Pac. 889, it was decided that an answer pleading a prior appropriation, but which fails to allege that the defendant is entitled as a riparian owner to any definite quantity of water, or what proportion of the waters of the stream he could reasonably exhaust for that purpose, is insufficient to raise an issue as to the extent of defendant's right as a mere riparian proprietor. The question of riparian rights does not, therefore, arise in this case.

It seems to me that from the evidence and the pleadings the question of adverse use is not necessarily involved in the claim of plaintiff or defendants, except perhaps as to defendant Harris. Plaintiff and defendants allege appropriation and ownership, and also adverse use, and the court finds for plaintiff on the issue of adverse use. But the evidence tends to establish the right of plaintiff by prior appropriation, subject to certain prior rights of some of the defendants, and I do not, therefore, regard it reversible error, if the finding as to adverse use is not supported by the evidence, for plaintiff's right may stand upon prior appropriation, even though it fails on other grounds. Appellants, claiming under Estrada, contend that, if they have the right to use a certain quantity of the water of the creek, they have the right to take it where and how they like, while the judgment is that they must take it only from a dam and ditch at a point of no practical use to them; citing Civ. Code, § 1412; Ramelli v. Irish, 96 Cal. 217, 31 Pac. 41; Charnock v. Higuerra, 111 Cal. 473, 44 Pac. 171. There can be no doubt that a riparian owner or an appropriator may change the place of diversion, and the latter may do so, if necessary, even upon the servient tenement, when others are not injured by the change. The judgment here is that the Estradas take the water to which they are entitled from a particular dam and ditch upon their land 100 yards below the Estrada house, and the finding of the court, it is claimed, is not supported by the evidence. This limitation is not warranted by the evidence. I can find no evidence, and respondent points out none, by any witness, that to change the place of use on the Estrada place would injure plaintiff, and to justify the finding this should have been made to appear. It may be very important to the use of water given the Estradas that its place of use be changed, and, if it can be done without injury to any other person, there is no reason for prohibiting it. The decree should be modified in this regard, and made to conform to the provisions of Civ. Code, § 1412, and the decisions of this court, as to the right to change the place of use, found in the cases last above cited. Respondent replies that there is no specification of the particulars wherein the evidence is alleged to be insufficient to justify this finding, and for that reason the evidence cannot be reviewed; citing Thorne v. Hammond, 46 Cal. 530. It is true, as a general proposition, that this court will not review the evidence in a bill of exceptions unless it specifies the particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient to sustain the decision. Code Civ. Proc. § 648. But the various points raised have necessarily called attention to the fact that there is no evidence to sustain the finding, and, if there be no evidence, the party complaining could hardly be expected to point it out. In such case the burden should be on the party sustaining the findings to call attention at least to enough evidence to justify the finding.

I think the point made by respondent as to the necessity of pointing out wherein the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings should hold good in some of the other assignments of error. I have, however, endeavored to notice all the material matters drawn in question by them. The Jones and Moreland water right was next above that of Estrada. Jones purchased in 1882 from one Sandy Sumner, who testified that he went into possession under Bonillo in 1866. He took out water in a ditch by means of a dam in 1868, and used the water for mill power, for household purposes, and for stock, but did not use the water for irrigation except a small garden patch once in two weeks. Moreland, who was Jones' tenant, testified that he used the water for household purposes and for stock, and a little for irrigation (quantity not given). The remaining water was returned to the creek after the above uses. The court found that Jones and Moreland are entitled to divert the water for domestic purposes and for watering stock, and carry the water to the old mill site, but the court subordinates the use of water for irrigation to the right of plaintiff. If these defendants had shown any given or ascertainable quantity of water used by Sumner for irrigation, I think it should stand on the same footing as that used for domestic purposes, for it was used for all purposes at the same time. But, as no given quantity is proven to have been used for irrigation, and seems to have been small at most, I think the court did not err in placing the limitation it did.

As to the findings of the court upon the Maria Y. Harris claim, no objection is made. Defendants pleaded a certain lease of the Estrada lands, and its assignment to plaintiff by way of estoppel. When offered in evidence by defendants, it was refused by the court, and I think improperly. There was no ground of objection stated, and for that reason the objection should have been overruled. But I can see no good ground for refusing it. As evidence tending to show that plaintiff did not own the quantity of water it claimed, it was admissible, and also as tending to admit defendants' right. As it turned out, however, it was, as is claimed by defendants, brought out on plaintiff's cross-examination; and, as it got into the case through plaintiff, it cured the error. At most, however, it was significant only as tending to show the facts above noted. It was not urged by defendants as proving or tending to prove an estoppel.

Defendants' specification of errors of law occurring at the trial have received attention so far as they have been urged in their brief. My conclusion is that the judgment and order of the lower court should be affirmed, except that the limitation as to the place of use of the Estrada water should be removed as herein pointed out, and that the decree, when modified as above suggested, should stand affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed, except that the limitation as to the place of the use of the Estrada water should be removed as herein pointed out, and the decree when modified as above suggested is affirmed.

SAVINGS BANK OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA v. ASBURY et al. (Sac. 213.)

MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE—PLEADING—FAILURE TO ADVANCE MONEY LOANED—RIGHTS OF PARTIES—DAMAGES.

1. An allegation in foreclosure that a mortgage note was executed by defendants for $30,000, but that the actual amount was and is $12,500, and not $30,000, sets forth with sufficient certainty the amount of the mortgage debt which plaintiff seeks to recover.

2. Where a complaint fails to show that water rent paid by plaintiff is a lien on the land sought to be foreclosed, evidence of such payments should be excluded.

3. Where plaintiff seeks to foreclose a mortgage with consideration named of $30,000, but alleges that $12,500 was the actual amount of the same, the defendant, under a cross complaint, may prove by parol that plaintiff had agreed to pay the remaining $17,500 in partial payments from time to time, subsequent to the execution of the mortgage, and, on such proof, may be entitled to a judgment against complainant for this amount.

4. Damages arising from the sacrifice of property, occasioned by the pressure of creditors, are consequential, and not recoverable against one who has bound himself to loan money, and failed to do it.

5. Plaintiff alleges that the actual amount of a loan, for which a $30,000 note was given, was $12,500. Defendant, in his answer, denied that the loan was for any sum other than $30,000. Held that, under the issues, evidence that, at the time the loan was made, plaintiff agreed to advance $30,000 on the note, is competent.

6. A mortgagee cannot recover on a note, nor foreclose a mortgage therefor, so long as he retains in his hands a portion of the money to be paid in consideration of the execution of the instruments, and refuses to perform his part of the agreement.

7. A mortgagee who has retained in his hands, of the consideration money, an amount greater than the interest accrued on the sum actually advanced, cannot declare the note due prior to maturity.

8. To maintain a cross complaint, seeking to recover of the mortgagee an unpaid portion agreed upon as the consideration for the mortgage, the mortgagors are not required to tender the plaintiff the interest on the amount they had received.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. R. Webb, Judge.

Suit by Savings Bank of Southern California against Asbury and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Frank H. Short, M. K. Harris, and Denson & De Haven, for appellants. L. L. Cory and H. D. Cassiday, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff seeks herein the foreclosure of a mortgage upon certain land in Fresno county, and its sale in satisfaction of the debt secured thereby. The complaint alleges that on or about June 1, 1893, the mortgagors made to it their promissory note of that date for the sum of $30,000, payable in three years thereafter, with interest thereon payable semiannually, and at the same time executed a mortgage upon said lands, as security for its payment; that, although the note expressed the sum of $30,000, the actual amount of the loan to the defendants was only $12,500; that, under provisions therefor in the mortgage, the plaintiff had paid certain moneys for insurance upon the mortgaged property, and for water appurtenant to the land; that none of the interest that had accrued upon the note had been paid; and that the plaintiff, as authorized by said note, had elected to consider the whole of the debt due. Judgment was prayed for accordingly. The appellants demurred to the complaint, upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against them, and also that it was ambiguous and uncertain. Their demurrer was overruled, and they then answered the complaint, denying its several allegations, and also filed a cross complaint, in which they set forth the facts connected with the execution of the note and mortgage, and alleged that the plaintiff at that time, and as a part of the same transaction, agreed to pay over and advance to them the full sum of $30,000; that, although requested so to do, it had refused to pay or advance to them $17,500 thereof. In a further cause of action for a cross complaint, they set forth certain facts, and alleged that, by reason thereof, they had been subjected to great damage. Judgment was asked by them against the plaintiff for the balance due on the loan of $30,000, and also for the damage that they had sustained. The plaintiff demurred to the first of these cross complaints, upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and to the second upon the same ground, and also for ambiguity. Although the appellants, in their pleading, styled their causes of action separate cross complaints, they in reality are only separate counts for a single cross complaint, and were evidently so regarded in the court below, as appears from its order "that the demurrer to the cross complaint of defendants be, and the same is hereby, sustained." Upon the sustaining of this demurrer, no amendment was offered to the cross complaint, and the cause was tried upon the original complaint and answer. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff in accordance with its complaint, from which, and an order denying a new trial, this appeal has been taken.

1. The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled. The allegations therein of the execution of the promissory note, and the mortgage to secure its payment, and of the amount advanced thereon to the defendants, and the further averment of the nonpayment of interest, and the election by the plaintiff to treat the entire principal sum as due, sufficiently stated a cause of action. The further allegation "that the said promissory note was executed by the said defendants in the sum of $30,000, as evidence of a debt for a loan, but that the actual amount of the principal sum of such debt and loan was and is the sum of $12,500, and not the sum of $30,000," sets forth with sufficient clearness and certainty the amount of the debt for which the mortgage was executed, and which the plaintiff sought to recover. The allegation of the payment by the plaintiff "for the water appurtenant to said premises" sufficiently stated the amount paid by it, and that it was due, and had not been paid. If, in fact, this constituted a lien upon the land, it was not necessary to state which of the defendants failed to pay it, or the terms of the agreement by which it had become due. The complaint does not, however, show that this amount was a lien upon the land, or that its payment was secured by the mortgage, and, upon objection thereto by the defendants at the trial, the court should have excluded any evidence of such payment.

2. The court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the cross complaint. It was alleged therein that prior to the 1st day of June, 1893, the makers of the promissory note set forth in the complaint applied to the plaintiff for a loan of $30,000 upon the real property described in the mortgage, and that the plaintiff agreed to loan and advance the said sum to them for the time, and at the rate of interest, and upon the terms and conditions, set forth in said mortgage; that, in pursuance of said agreement, said defendants executed and delivered to the plaintiff their promissory note set forth in the complaint, and at the same time, and as a part of the same transaction, and for the purpose of securing the payment of the said promissory note according to the terms and conditions thereof, they executed to the plaintiff the mortgage referred to in the complaint, which was thereafter recorded at the instance of the plaintiff in the office of the county recorder of Fresno county; that, at the same time said mortgage was delivered to the plaintiff, "said plaintiff, in and by said note and mortgage, and its separate agreement then and there made and entered into with said defendants, and as a part of the same transaction, agreed to and with the said defendants executing said note and mortgage to loan, pay over, and advance to said defendants the said full sum of said $30,000 specified and mentioned in said note and mortgage, to wit, $12,000 on accepting and recording said mortgage, $10,000 within 30 days, and the further sum of $8,000 within 60 days from the date of the acceptance and recording of said mortgage by the plaintiff, and the defendants did agree to accept and receive the same"; that, at or about the time of the delivery and recordation of said note and mortgage, the plaintiff advanced and paid over to said defendants $12,500, and no more; that the plaintiff, although frequently requested by the defendants, has not advanced the remainder of said sum of $30,000, or any part thereof; and that the sum of $17,500 is still unpaid and due from it to said defendants. In the other count of the cross complaint, the defendants, in addition to the foregoing averments, alleged that, by reason of the failure of the plaintiff to pay to them the said sum of $17,500, they were unable to meet certain other obligations of theirs, and that the persons and corporations holding the same had proceeded to enforce and collect them, and had subjected property of the defendants held as security therefor to their payment, so that it had been wholly lost to them, and that they had thereby suffered damage to the extent of $50,000 and upward. The cross complainants thereupon prayed judgment against the plaintiff for the balance due to them upon the said loan of $30,000, and for the further sum of $50,000, damages so sustained by them. To each of these counts in the cross complaint the plaintiff filed a general demurrer, and also demurred specifically, upon the ground that there was no consideration for the agreement alleged in the cross complaint to have been made by it, and, in addition thereto, demurred on the ground of ambiguity to so much of the second count as claimed special damages for failure to advance the money.

The facts alleged in this cross complaint sufficiently stated a cause of action against the plaintiff for the unpaid amount of the loan. The execution to it of the note and mortgage by the defendants, upon its agreement that it would pay to them thereon the sum of $30,000, was a sufficient consideration for such agreement, and created an obligation on its part to pay the same in accordance with the terms of its agreement. The further specification in the demurrer that the alleged agreement was made prior to the time of the making and execution of the note and mortgage was evidently either an oversight, or in disregard of the allegation in the cross complaint that it was made at the same time with the delivery of the mortgage, and as a part of the same transaction. It was not necessary that the agreement should be included in the note or mortgage, nor would evidence of its having been made tend to contradict or vary the terms or provisions of either of these instruments. The note and mortgage were by their terms unilateral obligations, executed to the plaintiff by the defendants, and the agreement of the plaintiff set forth in the cross complaint was a correlative agreement on its part, also unilateral, made in consideration of the agreement on the part of the defendants, and became operative and binding upon it to its full extent at the moment that the note and mortgage had become binding upon the defendants. While the averment in the cross complaint that the agreement was made would imply that it was in writing if a written agreement was required, yet it was not necessary that this agreement should be in writing; and the rule that an agreement in writing supersedes all prior or contemporaneous oral negotiations or stipulations concerning its matter has no application to a collateral agreement upon which the instrument is silent, and which does not purport to affect the terms of the instrument. Sivers v. Sivers, 97 Cal. 518, 32 Pac. 571.

The special damages alleged in the second count of the cross complaint to have been sustained by the defendants, by reason of the plaintiff's failure to comply with its agreement, were not proximately caused by the breach of this agreement, or such as, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom. They were eminently such as are styled "consequential damages," and are not recoverable from the plaintiff. It is therefore unnecessary to consider whether the allegations in reference to these damages are clear and unambiguous, or whether they are expressed with sufficient certainty.

3. To the allegation in the complaint heretofore quoted that the actual amount of the debt and loan for which the note was given was $12,500, and was not the sum of $30,000, the defendants, in their answer, "deny that the said loan or indebtedness was made, or said mortgage or said note were made, for any other or different sum or loan or amount than the full sum of $30,000, which said sum the defendants subscribing said mortgage borrowed from the plaintiff herein, and which said sum of $30,000 the plaintiff herein agreed to advance to the said defendants." At the trial of the action, the witness Albrecht was asked whether, at the time the loan was made, the plaintiff agreed to advance to the defendants the full amount of $30,000 on the note. An objection by the plaintiff that the question was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and not relating to any issue in the pleading, was sustained by the court. This question was in direct line with the above averment in the answer, and was both material and relevant to the issue made thereby, and should have been allowed. If the plaintiff did in fact agree to advance the full amount of $30,000 upon the note, the above allegation in the complaint was not sustained, and the plaintiff was not entitled to judgment. Upon the execution and delivery by the defendants to the plaintiff of their note and mortgage for $30,000, in consideration of its agreement to loan them this amount of money, the plaintiff could not enforce the payment of the note against them, or foreclose the mortgage therefor, so long as it retained in its hands a portion of the money so agreed to be advanced, and refused to perform its part of the agreement. Whatever rights it might have to recover the amount of money received by the defendants, it would not have the right to bring an action upon the promissory note for such money prior to the maturity of the note. Unless the time for advancing the remaining portion of the loan was deferred by mutual agreement, the plaintiff could not, while retaining in its hands more than the amount of the accrued interest, declare the sum advanced to be due prior to the maturity of the note, nor were the defendants required, as a condition of maintaining their cross complaint, to tender to the plaintiff the interest accrued upon the amount of the loan which they had received. That portion of the judgment by which the payment of the water rate is made a lien upon the lands is erroneous. There is no averment in the complaint that it constituted a lien thereon, and the evidence at the trial was that the payment was made simply at the request of the defendants. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, and the cause is remanded to the superior court, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the cross complaint, and allow the plaintiff to answer the same within such time as the court may deem reasonable.

BRADFORD INV. CO. v. JOOST et al. (S. F. 507.)

PLEADING—STATUTE OF FRAUDS—PAROL EVIDENCE.

1. Under the code pleading, where an agreement is alleged in the answer which the statute of frauds requires to be in writing, it will be presumed it was in writing, without an allegation to that effect.

2. Plaintiff loaned money to defendant, taking as security certain mortgage bonds, under a written agreement giving power of sale, and providing that, if the security deteriorated in value, defendant should reduce the note in proportion. Held, that parol evidence that plaintiff offered to look only to the securities is inadmissible as contradicting the written agreement.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by the Bradford Investment Company against Behrend Joost and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Joost appeals. Reversed.

Mullany, Grant & Cushing, for appellant. Gunnison, Booth & Bartnett, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. This is an action to foreclose 50 bonds of a railway company, of the par value of $1,000 each, exclusive of coupons, and to have the proceeds, after judicial sale, applied to the payment of a certain promissory note made to plaintiff by Behrend Joost, the appealing defendant, for $25,000. An agreement was made by defendant Joost that the bonds might be sold for payment of the note; and plaintiff's right to a judicial foreclosure is not denied, but the right to a personal judgment against defendant for a deficiency, if any there be, is questioned. Upon filing the answer, plaintiff moved for judgment on the pleadings, on the ground that the answer denied none of the material allegations of the complaint. The court granted the motion, and ordered judgment in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, including a deficiency judgment, to which order defendant excepted, and this appeal is from the judgment against this defendant. The other defendants do not appeal. The pleadings are verified.

The answer did not deny the allegations of the complaint, which fully and clearly set forth a good cause of action on foreclosure, but the answer avers "that prior to and at the time of the making and delivery by him (defendant) to plaintiff of the promissory note and the instrument in writing mentioned, a copy of which is contained in said complaint, it was expressly agreed and understood by and between plaintiff and defendant that it (plaintiff) should and would rely upon and look to said fifty (50) first mortgage bonds of the San Francisco & San Mateo Railway Company, mentioned in said instrument in writing, exclusively for the payment of said note, * * * and that no further or personal or general liability or application or judgment should be sought or obtained; * * * that it was upon said terms and conditions, and not otherwise, that said note and written instrument were made and delivered to plaintiff." The written instrument referred to is the agreement by which the bonds were placed as collateral security for the payment of the above note, and reads as follows: "And as collateral security for the payment of the above note, and interest to grow due thereon, I have deposited with Bradford Investment Co. the following property, to wit, fifty first mortgage bonds of the San Francisco and San Mateo Railroad Company, of the denomination of $1,000 each, numbers from 951 to 1,000, both numbers inclusive; and should the said note, or any part thereof, or the interest to grow due thereon, remain due and unpaid after the same should have been paid according to the tenor of said note, I hereby irrevocably authorize and empower said Bradford Investment Company, or its assigns, to sell and dispose of the above-described property, or any part thereof, at public or private sale, with five days' previous notice to me of such sale, and from the proceeds arising therefrom to pay the principal, interest, charges, and the costs of sale, and the balance, if any, to pay over to me or my representatives upon demand. In case of deterioration of any of the above securities, or fall in the market value of the same, I hereby promise and agree to reduce the amount of said note or to increase the security in proportion to such deterioration or decrease of value, in default of which this note shall be considered due under the above stipulation. On the payment of above note, interest, and charges according to the terms thereof, this agreement shall be void, and the above-described securities returned to me. Behrend Joost." Defendant's brief is constructed upon the theory, apparently, that the learned judge who tried the case refused to consider the defense because the answer did not aver that the agreement relied upon was in writing.

The first point made by defendant is that it will be presumed that the agreement was in writing, if evidence thereof should be deemed to be necessary; citing Reagan v. Justice's Court, 75 Cal. 255, 17 Pac. 195; Emerson v. Bergin, 76 Cal. 202, 18 Pac. 264; Broder v. Conklin, 77 Cal. 336, 19 Pac. 513; Barnard v. Lloyd, 85 Cal. 132, 24 Pac. 658. To this point plaintiff replies that the cases cited are to the effect that, where the statute of frauds requires the agreement to be in writing, it will be presumed that it was so, in order to support the complaint; that at common law the rule applied to the declaration, and not to the plea; that the rule, under the code system of pleading, applies to the complaint, but not to the answer. It would seem to me clear, and in every way consonant with reason, that, if the rule is that where an agreement, to be valid, must be in writing, it may yet be pleaded without alleging it to be in writing, we certainly may plead a like agreement in defense without alleging whether it is in writing or not. Both before and after the passage of the statute of frauds the rule was the same at common law. Wakefield v. Greenhood, 29 Cal. 597; Vassault v. Edwards, 43 Cal. 458; and numerous cases since. But plaintiff says this rule had application to the declaration, and not to the plea (citing 1 Chit. Pl. 304, 534; Steph. Pl. 331); and he further says it has been expressly so held, under our code pleading, as to the answer (citing Reinheimer v. Carter, 31 Ohio St. 587; Wakefield v. Greenhood, 29 Cal. 599; Bliss, Code Pl. § 354a; Maxw. Code Pl. 92; Case v. Barber, T. Raym. 450). The case cited from 29 Cal., supra, did not involve this point. It related only to the sufficiency of the complaint, which was held good although it did not allege the agreement to have been in writing. This court said in Nunez v. Morgan, 77 Cal. 427, 19 Pac. 753: "We cannot conceive that the rule held applicable to a complaint would be different when applied to a cross complaint, and, applying the rule referred to to the cross complaint, the averments in it are all that the law requires." The question before us here was decided in that case, unless some difference exists between a cross complaint and an answer as to pleading an agreement; and I know of none, so far as the point before us is concerned. Nor can I see why the defendant should be required to plead more specifically in an answer than he would have to do if he were setting out the same facts in a complaint; and this would be true whether his answer took the form of a cross complaint, or any other. The reason for the distinction claimed by plaintiff is stated in Case v. Barber, T. Raym. 450, supra (cited with approval in Reinheimer v. Carter, supra), to be as follows: "When the defendant pleads such an agreement in bar, he must plead it so as to make it appear to the court that an action will lie upon it; for he shall not take away the present action, and not give him another on the agreement pleaded." Bliss, Code Pl. § 354a, states the rule of pleading as does plaintiff, and cites the Ohio case in support of it. The Ohio case is based on the rule as stated in Steph. Pl. 331, and this author goes back to the old case in T. Raym. 450. The rule as stated by Mr. Chitty has the same origin. I cannot believe that the rule as claimed by plaintiff, even at common law, was well settled; but, whether so or not, it does not seem to rest upon reason, nor is it in harmony with the theory of code pleading. It was held in Tucker v. Edwards (Colo. Sup.) 3 Pac. 233, on demurrer to an answer setting up a defense relating to an agreement to convey land, but not stating that it was in writing, that it was not necessary to aver it to be in writing. If we could assume that no such agreement as defendant alleges was made in writing, we might be justified in holding with plaintiff. But, as we hold that his answer is good, we must also assume that he will sustain it by competent evidence; and this brings us to notice the second point made by defendant.

2. Defendant next contends that it was not necessary that the agreement alleged should be in writing. On the other hand, plaintiff contends that the case clearly falls within the principle that where parties have deliberately put their engagements into writing, in such terms as import a legal obligation, without any uncertainty as to the object or extent of such engagement, it is conclusively presumed that the whole engagement of the parties, and the extent and manner of their undertaking, was reduced to writing; citing 1 Greenl. Ev. § 275; Harrison v. McCormick, 89 Cal. 327, 26 Pac. 830; Guy v. Bibend, 41 Cal. 322. As the case must go back for trial, it is proper that this question should now be settled. In Harrison v. McCormick, supra, it was declared that whether a writing is upon its face a complete expression of the agreement of the parties is one of law. That the agreement here was such a contract would seem to me quite obvious. The collateral was by the terms of the agreement to secure payment of the note—all of it—and interest. There was power given to sell, and apply the proceeds to payment, and pay to defendant any surplus. It was provided that, if the securities deteriorated in value, defendant should reduce the note in proportion to the deterioration. To prove by parol that plaintiff agreed to look only to the securities is wholly at variance with this latter clause; for, if that were true, defendant would never have agreed to keep the securities good in case of deterioration. Nothing is wanting in this assignment of these securities to make it a complete legal obligation, and it is to be presumed that the parties introduced every material item and term into it. Defendant owed the full sum stated in this note. He agreed to pay that sum, with interest. The bonds were given as security for payment, not as payment. To admit oral evidence to prove defendant's contention would not only vary the agreement as to the collateral, but might also result in varying the terms of the note by oral proof of a contemporaneous agreement, and this, it has been decided by this court, cannot be done. Guy v. Bibend, supra. Defendant insists that the agreement pleaded in defense is not inconsistent with, or contradictory of, any of the provisions of the agreement set out in the complaint, and therefore the answer sets up a good defense against a deficiency judgment; but he does not, either in his opening brief or in his reply brief, mention the point now before us. We hold with him that he was not obliged to plead a written agreement, but, if he cannot prove a written agreement to the effect pleaded, his defense will and should avail him nothing. In Sivers v. Sivers, 97 Cal. 518, 32 Pac. 571, the instrument was silent as to the time of payment, and the court held it competent to show by parol "that a period or event had been agreed upon between the parties thereto at which payment should be made." "The rule which excludes evidence affecting the terms of a written instrument does not apply when the parties have not incorporated into the instrument all of the terms of their agreement, and when the evidence offered or the agreement sought to be proved is not inconsistent with the terms embodied in the instrument." But here we have a proposition, I think, to vary by parol a complete contract as to the collateral security, and possibly to change the terms of the note secured by it, for under it defendant might escape with less than full payment. The case of Guidery v. Green, 95 Cal. 630, 30 Pac. 786, cited by defendant, was the case of a subsequent written agreement superseding a former written agreement, and does not apply here. The agreement pleaded, I think, falls within the meaning of section 1698, Civ. Code, reading, "A contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing, or by an executed oral agreement, and not otherwise." Defendant claims that this refers only to the evidence that may be adduced. But, if it is thus restricted, it will suffice to compel him to exhibit an agreement in writing. Smith v. Taylor, 82 Cal. 533, 23 Pac. 217; Schurtz v. Romer, 82 Cal. 474, 23 Pac. 118; Lumber Co. v. Apfield, 86 Cal. 335, 24 Pac. 993; Nicholson v. Tarpey, 89 Cal. 617, 26 Pac. 1101. Nor is this case within the exceptions mentioned in section 1856, Code Civ. Proc.; Beall v. Fisher, 95 Cal. 568, 30 Pac. 773. Section 1625, Civ. Code, provides as follows: "The execution of a contract in writing, whether the law requires it to be written or not, supersedes all the oral negotiations or stipulations concerning its matter which preceded or accompanied the execution of the instrument." Defendant says in his answer that the agreement pleaded by him was made "prior to and at the time of the making and delivery by him to plaintiff of the promissory note and the instrument in writing mentioned" (the agreement as to the collaterals). For the purposes of this case, we must presume that the defendant in his pleading had in mind a provision supplemental to, or in alteration of, the original contract, in writing. If he can prove such a provision in writing, I do not think he should be precluded from doing so without having first pleaded that it is in writing. When plaintiff moved for judgment on the pleadings, he admitted that all the averments of the answer were true. McGowan v. Ford, 107 Cal. 177, 40 Pac. 231, and cases there cited. My conclusion is that the trial court erred in granting plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings, and it is recommended that the judgment be reversed and that a new trial be granted.

We concur: BRITT, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed and a new trial granted.

WIESTER v. WIESTER. (S. F. 552.)[1]

PARTNERSHIP—DUTIES—RESCISSION OF DEED.

1. Under Civ. Code, §§ 2410, 2411, partners are bound to act in the highest good faith towards each other, and this continues and extends to the dissolution and liquidation of the partnership affairs.

2. Where, on settlement of a partnership, the withdrawing partner accepted certain land in payment of his interest at $70 per acre, the deed will not be set aside, on the ground of fraud in the settlement, where it was evident that both parties believed the land to be of such value, that it was located at a distance, at a town in which there was at the time a "land boom," and similar property was then selling at from $100 to $150 per acre.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

G. R. Lukens (H. A. Melvin, of counsel), for appellant. Denson & De Haven, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to obtain a decree annulling a deed of conveyance by defendant to plaintiff of the undivided one-sixth interest in and to about 480 acres of land situate in the county of Pacific, state of Washington; to have it determined that plaintiff has an interest in the firm of Wiester & Co., which on August 1, 1890, was of the value of $7,000; that defendant be decreed to have received said interest in said firm under a trust for the use and benefit of plaintiff; that defendant be held to account therefor, etc. The cause was tried by the court without a jury. Written findings were filed, upon which judgment was entered in favor of the defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The findings are too lengthy to be set out in full. The following will convey an idea of their drift: On the 1st of August, 1890, and for some four years prior thereto, plaintiff and defendant were partners in business in San Francisco; the former owning one-fourth and the latter, who was his uncle, three-fourths interest in the business. Plaintiff was in bad health, and wished to retire from the business. He asked his uncle, the defendant, to buy him out. The latter wished to retain plaintiff in the business, but finally consented, and they determined that plaintiff's interest was of the value of $7,000. Defendant had no ready money to pay, but had the note of plaintiff for $1,600, given when plaintiff bought into the business, and owned $479\,{}^{2}/_{5}$ acres of land near South Bend, county of Pacific, now in the state of Washington, which cost him $2,000 some five or six years previously. Neither party had ever seen the land, and all their information in regard to it came from telegrams and letters from other persons. A "land boom" was on at South Bend, a railroad and other improvements were in course of construction, and land values were rapidly enhancing. Defendant believed, from newspapers, letters, etc., that his land was worth from $70 to $100 per acre, and that he could in a short time sell it for the latter figure. Plaintiff, who knew as much of its value and prospects as defendant, proposed taking an interest in the land in payment for the remainder of his interest in the store after deducting the amount of the note. The parties agreed to this, and plaintiff accepted an undivided one-sixth interest in said land in full payment of the balance due him, and received a deed therefor. In this deal the land was reckoned at $70 per acre. The court finds that the land was at that time of the value of $50 per acre, and is now of the value of $10 per acre. At and prior to this transaction the parties were on very intimate terms of mutual friendship, confidence, and respect, which conditions existed up to about the time of the commencement of this suit. Defendant took no advantage of plaintiff by reason of their relationship or business or terms of friendship in the said transaction, and "did not make any false or fraudulent representations whatever to the plaintiff concerning the said land, or the character, location, situation, condition, or value thereof, and the said transaction was made without any deceit or fraud, and without any intent on the part of the defendant to cheat, wrong, deceive, or defraud the plaintiff," nor was he fraudulently prevailed upon to dispose of his interest in the partnership business by any false or fraudulent representations, etc., "and it is not true that he (plaintiff) has been imposed upon nor fraudulently prevailed upon by any false or fraudulent representations whatever."

Appellant objects to the sufficiency of the evidence to support each of the more important facts as found by the court. The form of the objection, in every case except one, is that "there is no evidence that," etc., followed by the substance of the finding. The exception is where plaintiff avers that "there is no evidence sufficient to produce conviction that the value of the said lands in suit at the time of the said transaction was $50 per acre." The position assumed by the learned counsel for appellant is: (1) Plaintiff and defendant were blood relations, between whom the most intimate and confidential relations existed. (2) They were partners, and, under sections 2410 and 2411 of the Civil Code, they were trustees for each other, and bound to act in the highest good faith toward each other, and not to obtain any advantage in the partnership affairs by the slightest misrepresentation, concealment, threat, or adverse pressure of any kind, and that this status continued and extended to the dissolution and liquidation of the partnership affairs. (3) That, as the evidence is largely documentary, being contained in the depositions of witnesses, the opportunities of this court to judge of its value are as good as those of the court below, and hence that the general doctrine that we will not interfere in a case of substantial conflict of evidence has no application.

We have perused the evidence in the light of these confidential relations between the parties, and from that standpoint find nothing to warrant a reversal of the judgment. If defendant became liable to plaintiff at all, it was for representing the value of the land at $80 per acre at the time of the sale, either knowing it to be less or not knowing it to be worth as much as that sum. We think the evidence was sufficient to warrant the court in finding, not only that the defendant believed his statement as to the value of the land, but that it was literally true at the time.

Upon the first branch of the proposition the evidence shows that defendant had a brother-in-law named Dennis, who was in the employ of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and located at Tacoma or in that region. About April 18, 1890, Dennis wrote to defendant, for a would-be purchaser of defendant's land, offering $12 to $20 per acre therefor, if properly located and valuable for agriculture, etc. Dennis accompanied this letter with another, in which he stated he had private information to the effect that a railroad was to reach the coast in that vicinity, a town to be built, boomed, etc.; that defendant's land was worth $60 per acre; and, among other things, said: "But if I cannot sell your South Bend tract for $60, my name is not Dennis," and "This much I feel confident of, that I can sell it for $50 per acre within sixty days." He advises defendant "to hold it, even if you could get $60 per acre." About April 25th Dennis telegraphed defendant from Tacoma: "Don't sell any price until hear from me. North tract worth half a million if located right." In May, 1890, defendant requested a traveling salesman of his firm, who was going north, to look after the land, and report to him. He telegraphed to defendant that the land was worth $200 per acre. There is nothing to indicate but that full confidence was placed in these reports by defendant.

As to the evidence of the value of the land on August 1, 1890, the date of the sale to plaintiff, there were the depositions of five witnesses, residents of the vicinity, and familiar with prices in 1890, who placed the value of the land at from $75 to $150 per acre. Some of these witnesses fortified their opinions of value by describing sales and offers made to purchase lands in the vicinity, but somewhat nearer to the new town, at prices greatly in excess of the value fixed by them on this land. On behalf of plaintiff some seven witnesses were offered, who generally fixed the value of the land at from $5 to $10 per acre; but it is quite apparent that most of them speak of the value in the present rather than in the past, and a number of them say, in substance, that all prices above those fixed by them were fictitious, related not to intrinsic value, were the effect of a boom, etc. One of them, the manager of a large lumber company, owning large tracts of land, did say: "I considered all property unimproved in South Bend worthless at that time, and do so consider it now, as the town has three sets of bonds on it, and would have more if anybody would take them." The same witness, however, admitted that his company in 1891 sold 40 acres of land adjoining the town for $15,000, one-third cash, balance in one or two years. He added that the balance was never paid. In 1890, 98 acres in the section adjoining the land of defendant was sold for $10,000, half cash, balance in two years, etc.

Under this state of the evidence, the court would have been, as we think, warranted in finding a higher value of the land than that fixed. Conceding that, in a case like the present, where the testimony as to the value of the land is largely contained in the written depositions of witnesses, we are in as good a position to pass upon its weight and character as the court below, and we still think the findings, and each of them, are correct, and supported by the weight of evidence. There are no errors of law calling for reversal or requiring comment. We recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; BRITT, C.

McCAUGHEY v. SCHUETTE et al. (L. A. 115.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 4, 1897.)

In bank. Petition for rehearing. Denied. For opinion in division, see 46 Pac. 666.

PER CURIAM. After a careful examination of the points involved in this appeal, we are satisfied with the opinion and judgment rendered in department. For the reasons given in the department opinion (46 Pac. 666), the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the court is directed to sustain the demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, with leave to plaintiff to amend.

PEOPLE v. LEWIS. (Cr. 211.)

HOMICIDE—SELF-DEFENSE—DUTY TO RETREAT.

One attacked in his own house does not have to retreat, to justify killing his assailant.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Shasta county; Edward Sweeny, Judge.

Frank A. Lewis was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Reversed.

Claw. W. Taylor and J. Chadbourne, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., Chas. H. Jackson, Dep. Atty. Gen., M. P. Rose, and Thos. B. Dozier, for the People.

HENSHAW, J. The defendant was prosecuted for the murder of William H. Farrell, and was convicted of manslaughter. He appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying him a new trial. Defendant was the husband of Farrell's sister, and, with his wife and nine year old son, was living upon a mountain ranch in Shasta county. Farrell, though he was a not an infrequent visitor at his brother-in-law's house, was ill disposed towards him. His grievance was founded upon a claim of moneys due him from Lewis for services, and there is much evidence of oft-repeated threats upon his part, couched in most abusive language, "to maul Lewis," "to stamp his God damned guts out," "to fix him," and "to kill Lewis, or Lewis would kill him." Some of these threats had been uttered to defendant himself, in the presence of his wife. Others had been communicated to him. Farrell was the younger, stronger, and more active of the two. Upon the day before the homicide, Farrell, stopping at defendant's home, told his sister that one John Miller, at a rodeo, had recently said in his presence, and in the presence of others, that Frank Lewis had stolen his hogs, and had stolen the salt to salt them with. Farrell had then left the house, and gone on to spend the night with one William Wagner, a boy of 17 years, who was camping a short distance away from defendant's home. Wagner broke camp the following morning, and, by previous arrangement with defendant, brought his camping utensils for storage to Lewis' house. He was accompanied by Farrell. The two arrived shortly before 8 o'clock in the morning, and were hospitably received by Mr. and Mrs. Lewis. They had delayed breakfast for them, and invited them to the meal. The young men, however, had eaten their breakfast before breaking camp, and so declined the invitation, and sat down in the door of the front room of the house, while the Lewis family went to their breakfast table in the kitchen. Farrell and Wagner both carried rifles. Lewis had taken Wagner's rifle while helping him to dismount and unpack, and had placed it in the kitchen. Farrell put his rifle inside the door near the threshold of which he was sitting. An open door between the room in which the young men sat and the kitchen where the family were at breakfast permitted conversation. At the table were the Lewises, husband, wife, and son, and Dan Nichols, a half-breed Indian boy, nine years old. The Lewises asked young Wagner if he had been at the rodeo, and had heard Miller charge Lewis with the theft of his hogs. Wagner replied that he had been at the rodeo, but had not heard Miller's accusation. Either Mr. or Mrs. Lewis then asked Farrell who besides himself had heard it. He answered, giving several names, and wanted to know if his word was doubted, and if his word was not good enough for Lewis. Lewis replied that, of course, Farrell's word was good, but he wanted to have some one else corroborate it; so that when he went for Miller, if Miller should deny it, it would not rest simply upon Farrell's statement against Miller's. Farrell became angry, and began to abuse Lewis, saying he was not big enough to dispute his word; if he wanted to dispute his word, to come out and settle. Lewis answered that he did not have to come out, and Farrell retorted that he would make him. Lewis then said he wanted no trouble, and Farrell replied that he was going to have trouble. Lewis arose from the breakfast table, and passed into the front room. As he did so, Farrell stepped out of the front door, and picked up an iron-bound singletree. Lewis stopped in the front door, and told Farrell to leave the ranch, that he wanted no trouble. Farrell replied that he would not leave, and could not be put off, and challenged Lewis to come out. Lewis asked what he meant to do with the singletree, and Farrell replied that he would show him. Then, according to the testimony of Wagner, Lewis picked up Farrell's rifle, standing inside the door, and saying, "Damn you, I will learn you to fight me," fired, and Farrell, who was standing eight or ten feet away, fell to the ground. According to the testimony of Mr. and Mrs. Lewis, Farrell, when asked the last time what he meant to do with the singletree, said, "I will beat your brains out, you damned son of a bitch; I will beat your brains out," and advanced upon Lewis with the weapon raised. Lewis seized the rifle, and fired, when Farrell was nearly or actually within striking distance. Farrell "swung around," dropped the singletree, recovered himself, and came into the house, calling upon Wagner to give him his gun. Lewis left the house. Farrell seized Wagner's rifle, which was in the kitchen. Mrs. Lewis struggled with him for its possession. Farrell visibly and speedily weakened from his wound, and finally ceased the struggle, and was put to bed by his sister. Wagner and the Indian boy were sent for assistance. Mrs. Lewis went out to meet her husband, leaving her own little boy to attend his uncle. While she was gone, Farrell, with his pocketknife, cut his own throat. He had been shot in the abdomen, the bullet passing through the intestines, severing the messenteric artery, and lodging in the hip bone. The wound was mortal, and of a nature to cause intense suffering.

The court instructed the jury in the following language: "If, from the evidence, you believe that, without any overt act or physical demonstration upon the part of the deceased sufficient to warrant the defendant, as a reasonable man, in believing that he was in great bodily danger, he (the defendant) fired the fatal shot at the deceased, and killed him, such killing, under such circumstances, was not justifiable." Complaint is made of this, not as embodying any erroneous proposition of law, but as being foreign to any reasonable theory which might be taken of the evidence. But, by the testimony of Wagner, Farrell was shot, and fell 10 feet away from the front door in which Lewis was standing. The latter picked up the gun, aimed, and fired, saying, "Damn you, I will learn you to fight me." If this evidence was accepted by the jurors, it remained for them to decide whether Farrell's conduct was such as to justify the defendant, under subdivisions 2 and 3 of section 197 of the Penal Code. The instruction was therefore pertinent.

Upon the law of self-defense, the court instructed the jury as follows: "The defendant is not necessarily justified because he actually believed that he was in imminent danger. When the danger is only apparent, and not actual and real, the question is: Would a reasonable man, under all the circumstances, be justified in such belief? If so, the defendant will be so justified. If this was defendant's position, it was his right to repel the aggression, and fully protect himself from such apparent danger. If he could have withdrawn from the danger, it was his duty to retreat. Between his duty to flee and his right to kill, he must fly, or, as the books have it, must retreat to the wall. But by this is not meant that a party must always fly, or even attempt flight. The circumstances of the attack may be such, the weapon with which he is menaced of such a character, that retreat might well increase his peril. By 'retreating to the wall' is only meant that the party must avail himself of any apparent and reasonable avenues of escape by which his danger might be averted and the necessity of slaying his assailant avoided. If the attack is of such a nature, the weapon of such a character, that to attempt a retreat might increase the danger, the party need retreat no further." Appellant especially complains of the italicized language. Respondent shows that this is an exact quotation from an instruction approved in People v. Iams, 57 Cal. 115; but in People v. Williams, 73 Cal. 531, 15 Pac. 97, this court, in bank, said that while the whole charge of the court in People v. Iams was approved, but a small part of it was really under consideration, and, as to the rest, the declaration was obiter, and that, while the charge upon the whole was an able résumé of the law, portions of the charge, if isolated, would require qualification. In People v. Hecker, 109 Cal. 451, 42 Pac. 307, where the right of self-defense is considered at some length, it is pointed out that our law nowhere imposes the duty of retreat upon one who, without fault himself, is exposed to a sudden felonious attack, and that the duty of withdrawal or retreat is imposed upon him alone who is the first aggressor, or has joined in a mutual combat; and it is further said that while, at common law, there was a contrariety of opinion upon the part of the writers as to the duty of retreat, which contrariety has found its way into the differing decisions of our state courts, this state has upheld a defendant's right to stand his ground, and meet by force a sudden and violent attack. "So that, while the killing must be under an absolute necessity, actual or apparent, as a matter of law that necessity is deemed to exist when an innocent person is placed in such sudden jeopardy. The right to stand one's ground should form an element of the instructions upon the necessity of killing and the law of self-defense." Wharton, in the eighth editions of his Criminal Law (section 486a), discussing the necessity of retreat, holds retreat to be necessary upon the part of one who has been the aggressor, and in cases of mutual personal conflict, but concludes: "Nor is retreat required from a party who at the time is standing on his rights." In the tenth edition of his work it is said (section 99): "It has also been said that a party who can fly from an aggressor is bound to fly, and cannot set up self-defense. This, as we will hereafter see, is so far true that an assailed party cannot, unless driven to the wall, take his assailant's life; but, as an elementary proposition, it is not true that, if I can evade the attack by flight, then I must fly to evade the attack. If this were the law, few persons in times of trouble could remain at their posts. This, however, by confining the right of self-defense to attacks of which there could be no prior suspicion, would virtually abrogate the right, for it would be to say that the right of self-defense only exists when there is nothing to defend, and, besides, the fundamental principle is that right is not required to yield to wrong." Rice on Evidence (section 360) thus sums up the principle: "A very brief examination of the American authorities makes it evident that the doctrine as to the duty of a person assailed to retreat as far as he can before he is justified in repelling force by force has been greatly modified in this country, and has with us a much narrower application than formerly. Indeed, the tendency of the American mind seems to be very strongly against the enforcement of any rule which requires a person to flee when assailed to avoid chastisement, or even to save human life, and that tendency is well illustrated in the recent decisions of our courts bearing on the general subject of the right of self-defense." It was in Runyan v. State, 57 Ind. 80, where the language above quoted from Rice on Evidence was employed by the supreme court. That case is quoted with approval by the supreme court of the United States in Beard v. U. S., 158 U. S. 550, 15 Sup. Ct. 962; and the same eminent authority likewise quotes with approval the language of the supreme court of Ohio in Erwin v. State, 29 Ohio St. 186, where the court says: "The law, out of tenderness for human life and the frailties of human nature, will not permit the taking of it to repel a mere trespass, or even to save life where the assault is provoked; but a true man who is without fault is not obliged to fly from an assailant who, by violence or surprise, maliciously seeks to take his life, or to do him enormous bodily harm."

But, whatever diversity of opinion may be found in the books upon the general proposition of the duty of retreat, the right to stand one's ground when assailed in one's own home or upon one's own premises was never seriously questioned, even by the common-law writers. Thus, in East's Pleas of the Crown (page 271) it is said: "A man may repel force by force in defense of his person, habitation, or property against one who manifestly intends or endeavors, by violence or surprise, to commit a known felony, such as murder, rape, robbery, arson, burglary, and the like, upon either. In these cases he is not obliged to retreat, but may pursue his adversary until he has secured himself from all danger." Likewise, in Foster's Crown Law (chapter 3, p. 273) it is said: "In case of justifiable self-defense, the injured party may repel force with force in defense of his person, habitation, or property against one who manifestly intendeth and endeavoreth, with violence or surprise, to commit known felony upon either. In these cases he is not obliged to retreat, but may pursue his adversary till he findeth himself out of the danger, and if, in a conflict between them, he happeneth to kill, such killing is justifiable." In Wharton's American Law of Homicide (Philadelphia, 1855), at page 233, the author quotes from 1 Hale, P. C. 486: "In such a case, A., whether he be a householder or a lodger, being in his own house, need not fly as far as he can, as in other cases of se defendendo, for he has the protection of his house to excuse him from flying, as that would be to give up the protection of his house to his adversary by his flight." Russell on Crimes (volume 1, c. 3, § 2) enunciates the same rule, while Wharton (10th Ed. § 502) thus declares: "When a person it attacked in his own house, he need retreat no further. Here he stands at bay, and may turn on and kill his assailant, if this be apparently necessary to save his own life. Nor is he bound to escape from his house in order to avoid the assailant. In this sense, and in this sense alone, are we to understand the maxim that every man's house is his castle. An assailed person—so we may paraphrase the maxim—is not bound to retreat out of his house to avoid violence, even though a retreat may be safely made." The supreme court of this state, in People v. Payne, 8 Cal. 341, recognized the rule, and, without further quotation from authorities, it is sufficient to refer to the cases of Beard v. U. S., 158 U. S. 550, 15 Sup. Ct. 962; State v. Cushing (Wash.) 45 Pac. 145; Willis v. State, 43 Neb. 102, 61 N. W. 254; and State v. O'Brien (Mont.) 43 Pac. 1091,—where a multitude of authorities will be found collated. It follows herefrom that the court erred in giving the instruction under consideration. That injury to the defendant resulted may not be doubted. We do not note any other points which call for special consideration, but, for the foregoing error, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

WELLS v. BLACK et al. (L. A. 155.)[1]

Savings Bank—Depositor — Debtor and Creditor — Stockholder's Liability — Waiver — Agreement — By-Laws — Finding of Fact — Limitations.

1. A savings bank was organized, under Civ. Code, div. 1, pt. 4, tit. 10, regulating savings and loan corporations, and had a capital stock and stockholders. Under its by-laws, term deposits were payable six months after demand, and ordinary deposits at longer or shorter periods after demand, dependant on the amount to be withdrawn. Depositors received such interest as the directors might determine, and, less such interest payments, the profits belonged to the stockholders. Held that, unmodified by special contract, the relation of debtor and creditor existed between the bank and the depositors.

[1] Rehearing denied.

2. The liability of the stockholder, in such case, for his proportion of the debt, could be modified or waived by contract.

3. A waiver of stockholder's liability, classed as one of the by-laws and printed with them in each depositor's book, and followed by a formal agreement to be signed, was of no effect unless actually signed by the depositor.

4. A by-law asserting that the stockholders were not held to their constitutional liability was void, since corporations may make only such by-laws as are consistent with the constitution and laws of the state.

5. A finding of fact by the court, on sufficient evidence, will not be disturbed.

6. Where the relation of debtor and creditor exists between a banking corporation and its depositors, a debt is created and a liability incurred at the time of the acceptance of each deposit; hence, under Code Civ. Proc. § 359, requiring actions to enforce a liability against stockholders of a corporation to be brought within three years after the liability is created, an action against the bank stockholders is barred as to all deposits made more than three years before its commencement.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by Edwin A. Wells against William Black and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying them a new trial, defendants appeal. Modified.

McNealy & Whitehead, E. Parker, M. A. Luce, and Bryant Howard, for appellants. Works & Works, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff, as a depositor in the Savings Bank of San Diego, a corporation organized under the laws of this state, and as assignee of the claims and demands of other depositors therein, sued defendants to enforce their constitutional and statutory liability as stockholders of the bank. Judgment passed for plaintiff, and from this and from the order denying them a new trial defendants appeal. The propositions for which they contend may be thus stated: (1) The bank of which defendants were stockholders was a savings bank, and deposits therein did not create corporate debts or liabilities. (2) If, however, a stockholder's liability exists for such deposits, that liability was waived by the depositors in this case. (3) In any event, that liability is barred by the statute of limitations upon all deposits made more than three years before the commencement of this action.

1. The Savings Bank of San Diego was organized under the provisions of division 1, pt. 4, tit. 10, of the Civil Code. The corporation had a capital stock and stockholders. Under the by-laws term deposits were payable six months after demand, and ordinary deposits at longer or shorter periods of time after demand, dependent upon the amount to be withdrawn. The depositors received such interest as the board of directors might determine. After paying interest to depositors the remaining portion of the profits belonged to the stockholders. We need not discuss at length the broad differences which exist between a savings institution, such as the San Diego corporation, and a savings bank, in its original conception, where depositors shared proportionally in profits and losses, and where the managers of the funds were but the trustees and agents of the members. In the latter the relation of debtor and creditor does not exist between the corporation and its depositors. In the former it generally does. The question has received detailed consideration in the case of City of Los Angeles v. State Loan & Trust Co., 109 Cal. 396, 42 Pac. 149. It was there held, under a state of facts substantially the same as these here presented, that the relation of debtor and creditor arose upon deposits in such a savings bank. It is said: "It is, therefore, apparent that a deposit in a savings bank having a capital stock may be a debt against the corporation, and, indeed, must be, since the corporation is formed by the stockholders, and the depositor deals with the corporation, not as his agent, for whose mistakes or defalcations he is responsible, but as a principal, pledging its stock and assets for the security of the depositor. Not so, however, with the savings banks of the other class, which have no capital stock, and in which the depositors are members of the corporation." This statement however, should not be misunderstood. It is a holding that under the law, unmodified by special contract, the relation of debtor and creditor exists between such a savings institution and its depositors. It is not to be construed as a declaration that this relation may not be changed by agreement of the parties. It results, therefore, that the relation of debtor and creditor existed in the present case. From this follows, of necessity, the liability of the stockholder for his proportion of the debt, saving as that liability may have been modified or waived by contract of the parties. For that this may be done there can be no question. French v. Teschemacher, 24 Cal. 558; Sedg. St. & Const. Law, 111.

This brings us to the consideration of proposition 2. The waiver insisted upon is twofold: First, by the terms of the by-laws, assented to by the depositors; second, by positive agreement, signed by them. The by-law relied upon is not in strictness a by-law at all. By-laws are the body of rules laid down for the government of a corporation, its officers and stockholders, in the conduct of its affairs. This so-called by-law is merely a form of agreement couched in the first person, presumably to be assented to in some formal way by a depositor, though this is not made to appear. In and of itself it is not binding upon anybody. It reads as follows: "In consideration of the receipt by the Savings Bank of San Diego County of the deposits now made and hereafter to be made by me with it, I do hereby, for myself, my heirs, executors, a* ministrators, and assigns, covenant, promise, and agree to and with said Savings Bank of San Diego County to be governed in all respects in regard to all moneys which may be deposited by me with said corporation by the conditions above written and by its by-laws; and that all moneys now or hereafter to be deposited by me with said Savings Bank of San Diego County shall be reimbursable only out of the first disposable funds that shall come into the hands of said Savings Bank of San Diego County after the date of my demand for the reimbursement thereof, and after the payment of all sums for the reimbursement, of which demand shall have been made prior to the date of my demand, as provided for in the foregoing conditions; and, further, I waive any and all claim or claims, whether founded upon the statutes or upon the constitution of the state of California, which, without this stipulation, I might have to hold any individual corporator or corporators, officers, members, or stockholders of this corporation, or his, her, or their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, personally liable, jointly or severally, for any losses, and I consent to look for my security solely to the capital stock and the assets of the corporation." Had the depositors signed this, or in any other equally effective manner agreed to its terms, a different question would be presented. It was printed, it is true, with the by-laws in each depositor's book, and following it was a formal agreement to be signed, but this agreement was not, in fact, signed by any of plaintiff's assignors. Nor is the position of appellants bettered if the provision above quoted be treated as a by-law. It would then be a by-law asserting that the stockholders of this corporation were not held to their constitutional liability. But corporations may make only such by-laws as are consistent with the constitution and laws of the state. Civ. Code, § 301; Cook, Stock, Stockh. & Corp. Law, § 700a, and note. Such a by-law clearly contravenes them, and is therefore void. Being void, it carried no notice to, and had no binding force upon, depositors. Not that the corporation could not on behalf of its stockholders contract for a waiver of their liability. As has been said before, it could; but such a contract cannot find its sole expression in a void by-law. The second ground of waiver rests upon the following facts: Depositors were, as is usual, called upon to write their names in a book designated "Signature Book." At the top of each page of this book was printed matter, headed "Agreement." Below this printed matter were ruled lines extending across the entire page, and under these the page was spaced and divided by perpendicular lines. The top of each space bore appropriate and directing words, viz. "Number," "Date," "Name," "Signature," "Remarks." The printed matter, with other things, contained in its last line a release of the stockholders from liability. Upon this question it is enough to say that the court found, upon sufficient evidence, that the depositors, in writing their signatures upon the book, did not sign nor become bound by the printed agreement. There is thus presented, not the case of one who knowingly signs an agreement heedless of its contents. The finding of the court is that the plaintiff's assignors merely wrote their names in the signature book, and did not at all subscribe to the agreement.

3. Since the relation of debtor and creditor existed between the bank and its depositors, it follows that the debt was created and the liability incurred at the time of the acceptance of each deposit. At the expiration of three years the right to enforce the stockholders' liability was at an end. Code Civ. Proc. § 359; Hunt v. Ward, 99 Cal. 612, 34 Pac. 335; Bank of San Luis Obispo v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co., 103 Cal. 594, 37 Pac. 499. Whatever divergence of views may be found in the earlier adjudications, the cases above cited contain the last expressions of the court upon the question. It follows, therefore, that plaintiff's cause of action is barred as to all deposits made more than three years before the commencement of the action. The judgment is ordered modified to conform to these views, appellants to have their costs upon appeal.

TAGGART v. BOSCH. (L. A. 189.)

APPEAL—CROSS-EXAMINATION—PREJUDICIAL ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY OF EXCEPTIONS.

1. An order denying a new trial for insufficiency of the evidence will not be disturbed where there is a material conflict in the evidence.

2. On an issue as to the genuineness of the note in suit, plaintiff testified that it was made by defendant for part of the price on sale to him of an interest in a mine by plaintiff and his partner. Plaintiff's testimony in chief was confined to the execution, delivery, and nonpayment of the note. On cross-examination he testified that he did not tell his partner on the day of the sale of having taken the note, though they executed the deed together, but told him some time later; whether a week later or two or three months he could not say. Held, that further cross-examination as to how soon after the sale he saw his partner was erroneously excluded.

3. In such case, there was no direct testimony as to the genuineness of the note, except plaintiff's affirmance and defendant's denial thereof. Plaintiff's partner was ordinarily engaged at the mine, and plaintiff might not have seen him for some months after the sale. The partner testified that he heard of the note the next time after he saw plaintiff, but could not say when that was. Three and a half months after the sale of the mine, plaintiff bought defendant's interest in a liquor business in which they were partners, and, to make the cash payment, borrowed a large sum at the bank, exhibiting the note in suit, which was for $3,000, as one of the securities offered. In addition to the cash payment, plaintiff gave his own notes to defendant for $1,500, nothing being said about the note in suit. Plaintiff's explanation was that he did not want to do anything to interfere with the trade, and that one-half the note in suit belonged to his partner in the mining business. His explanation of not having told his partner of the note was that their relations were confidential, each doing about as he pleased. The consideration named in the deed of the mine to defendant was $500, and plaintiff testified that the actual consideration was $250 and the note. Plaintiff's partner testified that he understood the consideration to be $250 or $350. Two witnesses testified that defendant told them that it was $250. The expert testimony was equally divided as to the genuineness of the note in suit. Held, that the erroneous exclusion of the cross-examination of plaintiff as to when he next saw his partner after the sale of the mine was prejudicial.

4. It was error to exclude cross-examination of plaintiff as to whether he had private accounts between himself and defendant, and whether he told the bookkeeper in a liquor business in which they were partners about the note.

5. Alleged error in instructions given and in refusing other instructions cannot be considered in the absence of exceptions to the giving and refusal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Clark, Judge.

John S. Chapman and Del Valle & Munday, for appellant. Diehl & Chambers, R. H. F. Variel, and Goodrich & Garrison, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This action is upon a promissory note alleged to have been made and delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff on August 8, 1890, for the sum of $3,000, payable one year after date, with interest at 7 per cent. The answer denies that defendant made, signed, or delivered said note. The pleadings are verified. A jury trial was had, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, upon which judgment was entered. This appeal is from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The specifications upon which the motion for new trial was heard are: (1) Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; (2) errors in ruling upon questions of evidence; and (3) that the court erred in giving certain instructions to the jury, and in refusing to give other instructions requested by defendant.

1. The sole question at issue upon the pleadings was whether the defendant made the note sued upon, and upon that question the evidence was conflicting. The plaintiff testified that he saw the defendant sign the note, and that, immediately after it was signed, the defendant delivered it to him; that it was made and delivered in the private office of Taggart & Bosch, no one else being present; that it was made and delivered August 8, 1890, the day of its date; that it was given in part consideration for the sale of an undivided one-sixth interest in an antimony mine to the defendant, the whole consideration of which was $3,250, viz. the note in suit for $3,000, and $250 in money, paid a few days after the sale; and that one J. K. Patton was equally interested with him in the mine, and in the sale of said interest. The defendant testified as positively that he did not give the plaintiff said note; that he did not sign it; that the signature thereto is not his; that he first heard of said note some time in the fall of 1891, after this suit was commenced, while he was in Leipsic, in Germany, and first saw it after his return from Europe, some time in June, 1892. If we ended our recital of the evidence at this point, it would certainly appear that there was a material conflict. Experts were called by the plaintiff, who testified, from a comparison of the signature to the note with other signatures of the defendant which were admitted to be genuine, that, in their opinion, the signature to the note was the genuine signature of the defendant, and about an equal number were called for defendant, who testified that, in their opinion, the note was not signed by the defendant. It is evidently not necessary to review and discuss the testimony given by these witnesses, nor to rehearse the able arguments of counsel for appellant as to the weight which should be given to such evidence, for, whichever way we might conclude the preponderance to be, the conflict remains, not only as to such evidence, but to the direct evidence given by the parties as well. Other testimony was given by the parties and by other witnesses, which should be stated in connection with the second point made by appellant; but it may be said in advance that it does not remove the conflict so as to permit us, under the well-settled rules of decision long and uniformly adhered to in this state, to reverse the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, upon that ground, whatever may be our opinion as to the preponderance of the evidence.

2. Appellant contends that the court erred in certain rulings during the trial. Plaintiff and defendant were co-partners in the wine and liquor business from August, 1887, to November 25, 1890. On August 8th, defendant purchased said interest in said mine, and on that day the plaintiff and his co-owner of the mine, J. K. Patton, executed and acknowledged a deed to the defendant for said interest, both the grantors acknowledging its execution at the same time before the same notary in Los Angeles (where plaintiff and defendant had their place of business) on the same day said promissory note is claimed by the plaintiff to have been made by the defendant. Said mine is situated, as appears from the deed, in San Bernardino county; and Patton, who had been for some years associated with the plaintiff in mining enterprises, was the mining man, and attended to that part of the business, and was much of the time, perhaps usually, out of town. The execution and acknowledgment of the deed, however, showed that he was in town the day the note was made, if made at all, and the plaintiff testified that he and Patton went together to the notary, and acknowledged it, and that he did not then inform Patton that he had sold said interest for $3,250, or that he received or was to receive a note for $3,000. The consideration named in the deed was $500. The testimony of the plaintiff, in chief, was confined to the execution and delivery of the note, and that it had not been paid. Upon cross-examination, he testified that the note was given in part consideration for an interest in the "Blue Jay Mine." He was then asked: "Where is that Blue Jay mine situated?" An objection that the question was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and not proper cross-examination, was sustained, and an exception taken. The witness then testified that the consideration of the sale was the note in suit and $250 in cash, and that the sale was of an interest in a mine which he and Patton owned, and the sale was made by him and Patton, and that he did not know where Patton was at the time the note was delivered. Plaintiff was then asked by counsel for defendant: "How soon after this sale did you see him?" The same objection was made and sustained. Counsel for defendant then stated: "I want to show that Mr. Patton was in ignorance of the existence of this document; that he was a co-owner with Mr. Taggart of this mine; and that he knew nothing about the existence of the note for some months after that. We take an exception." Counsel then asked the witness: "When did you next see Mr. Patton?" The same objection and the same ruling were made, and an exception noted. "Q. Did you ever tell Mr. Patton about getting this note? A. Yes, sir. Q. When? A. Some time following. Q. How soon after? A. It may have been a week, or it may have been two or three months, I couldn't state now (it is four years ago) just exactly when I did tell him. I told him though. Q. Didn't you state to the court, upon the trial of this cause before, that it was in November? A. I may have said so; yes, sir." In reply to further questions, the witness said he did not tell Patton that he had received or was about to receive a note for $3,000 besides the $250 "that day" (the day the deed was executed), nor while the "transaction was going on," and that the bookkeeper of Taggart & Bosch was R. M. Sharp. "Q. Did you tell him about this note?" Same objection and same ruling. "Q. You had private accounts between yourself and Bosch?" Same objection and same ruling, and exceptions were taken.

These rulings may be considered together, as they all involve the same question of law, viz.: Were they proper questions to be put upon the cross-examination of the plaintiff? The issue of fact being tried was whether the defendant made the note which was the basis of the action. The plaintiff alleged in his complaint, and had testified in chief, that the defendant signed and delivered it. The answer denied specifically that he signed or delivered it. It did not allege new matter by way of defense, but challenged the plaintiff to prove the averments of his complaint. If he failed to prove that defendant signed and delivered the note, judgment would necessarily be for the defendant, without any evidence being offered on his part; and the only question before the jury was the truth or falsehood of plaintiff's allegation. It was held in Jackson v. Water Co., 14 Cal. 18, that a cross-examination cannot go beyond the subject-matter of the evidence in chief, but should be allowed a very free range within it; that, where the defendant on cross-examination simply aims to disprove by the witness the very cause the witness himself has made, the rule excluding such evidence until defendant opens his case has no application. See, also, Harper v. Lamping, 33 Cal. 647, 648; People v. Lee Ah Chuck, 66 Cal. 667, 6 Pac. 859; Wixom v. Goodcell, 90 Cal. 623, 27 Pac. 419; McFadden v. Railway Co., 87 Cal. 464, 25 Pac. 681. A witness may be asked any question upon cross-examination which tends to test his accuracy, veracity, or credibility, and the court should be especially liberal where the witness is a party to the suit. Neal v. Neal, 58 Cal. 287; Greenl. Ev. § 446. That the court erred in the above rulings is apparent; and it is equally well settled "that every error is prima facie an injury to the party against whom it is made, and it rests with the other party clearly to show, not that probably no hurt was done, but that none could have been or was done, by the error." Jackson v. Water Co., 14 Cal. 25; Carpentier v. Williamson, 25 Cal. 167; People v. Ybarra, 17 Cal. 167, 172; Rice v. Heath, 39 Cal. 609; Cleary v. Railroad Co., 76 Cal. 240, 18 Pac. 269.

The further question is therefore presented, viz.: Does it appear from the record that the defendant was not injured by the restrictions imposed upon the defendant in his cross-examination of the plaintiff? The case is peculiar, at least so far as the consideration of the evidence is concerned. But two persons, the plaintiff and defendant, know of their own personal knowledge whether the note in suit is genuine or is a forgery. It is one or the other. The plaintiff swears that it is genuine, that it was signed by the defendant in his presence, and was immediately delivered to him. The defendant as positively swears that it was not signed or delivered by him. No witnesses were called to testify to the reputation of either of the parties for honesty or veracity, yet the veracity of the two men who alone knew the truth must be determined by the jury before a verdict could be rendered. The burden of proof was upon the plaintiff, and, to enable him to recover, the evidence must preponderate in his favor. Under such circumstances, the conduct or declarations of the plaintiff, as to all matters or circumstances which tended to weaken or destroy his direct testimony that the defendant did execute and deliver the note, were competent and proper subjects upon which to cross-examine him, and a full and unrestricted cross-examination within the limits hereinbefore stated was, under the circumstances, of the utmost importance to the defendant.

It is contended, however, by the learned counsel for respondent, that the facts called for by the questions which were disallowed were subsequently disclosed in evidence, or were unimportant and immaterial and harmless, and that, therefore, the defendant was not prejudiced. The location of the Blue Jay mine was shown by the deed, but the questions, "How soon after this sale did you see him?" and, "When did you next see Mr. Patton?" were not answered, nor the facts called for disclosed. The plaintiff testified that Patton went with him to acknowledge the deed, but "couldn't say whether this was before or after the giving of the note. It was about the same day." He further testified that he did not tell Patton about the note that day, but did tell him some time after; that it might have been a week or two or three months; and that he may have testified before that it was in November. It also appeared that Patton was in charge of the mines out on the desert, and it might be that plaintiff did not see him until November, and that he told him the first time he saw him. But it might be the case that he saw him the next day or the next week after the date of the note, or every day or every week from that time until November. The jury may have inferred from the ruling of the court upon these questions that whether the plaintiff had frequent and early opportunities of informing his co-owner in the mine of the existence of the note did not affect the probability of its existence, and that, therefore, the fact that he did not tell him sooner, or the fact that he did not tell him at all, if that were so, would not affect plaintiff's credibility. The plaintiff, however, realized that some explanation of his conduct in this particular was necessary, and, upon his redirect examination, gave, as a reason for not telling Patton of the note, that their relations "were very confidential"; that Patton did as he pleased over on the desert, and he did the same at his end of the line, and that was why he didn't tell him; that "I never made any explanations to him or he to me." The witness could not have meant that he "never" explained his transactions in relation to their common property to his co-owner, else he would never know what plaintiff did; but in all this explanation of their "very confidential" relations he gave no intimation as to how soon he saw Patton after he received the note, nor when he next saw him. It certainly cannot be contended that the silence of plaintiff in regard to this note would not be more significant if he saw Patton immediately after the time he swears he received it, or saw him within a few days, or frequently between that and the time he did tell him.

But other facts disclosed in the testimony show still more clearly the materiality and importance of these questions. The plaintiff and defendant were partners in the liquor business at the time of this transaction, and had been for three years preceding. On November 25, 1890, about 3½ months after defendant bought said interest in the mine, defendant sold his interest in the firm of Taggart & Bosch to the plaintiff for $6,500, of which the plaintiff paid $5,000 in cash, and gave defendant his two several promissory notes,—one for $1,000, payable January 1, 1892, and the other for $500, due July 1, 1892. The cash payment was made by plaintiff's check on the First National Bank of Los Angeles. In order to make the cash payment, plaintiff borrowed $4,000 from said bank, and, when negotiating the loan, exhibited the note here in suit to the cashier as one of the securities he had on hand, and, so far as appears, said cashier, Mr. Shaffer, is the first person, aside from the parties to the note, who ever saw it. In buying out the interest of Mr. Bosch in the store, the plaintiff did not mention to him the existence of this note, though he showed it to Mr. Shaffer as part of his "securities," nor ask the defendant to accept it as part of the cash payment, nor even to accept a credit upon it to the extent of $1,500, for which sum he gave his own notes. Plaintiff gave as reasons for not mentioning this note to the defendant at the time he purchased his interest in the store that the relations of the parties had become strained; that their negotiations had culminated in a "give or take" proposition, made about five o'clock in the evening, and limited to 12 o'clock the next day; that it was important that the business should not be interrupted, and he did not want to call up anything that might interfere with his trading on the partnership business at that time, and, "besides, Patton equitably owned one-half of said note." Plaintiff had inserted in the deed the consideration of $500, which would make the value of the mine $3,000. He had testified that the real consideration was $3,250, which would make the value of the mine $19,500. He had taken the note in his own name, and had presented it to the bank as one of his securities, and as constituting, in part at least, the basis of his credit. He had borrowed $4,000 from the bank, to enable him to make a cash payment of $5,000 to the man whose note he held for $3,000, and, in addition, gave his own notes for $1,500, without mentioning defendant's note, because, as he testified, "I did not want to call up anything that might interfere with my trading on the partnership business at that time. Besides, James K. Patton equitably owned one-half of said note." The record gives no hint that at that or any other time there had been any dissatisfaction on the part of the defendant with his purchase of said interest in the mine. The defendant could not have forgotten that less than four months before he had given the plaintiff his note for $3,000, and no reason appears why a reference to this note should interfere with the purchase of defendant's interest in the store if the note was in fact made by the defendant. On the contrary, it is not reasonable to suppose that defendant would want to accept plaintiff's notes for $1,500, while the plaintiff held his note for $3,000, which might be transferred before maturity, and which he could be compelled to pay to the holder, though the contingencies of business might make the notes he held against the plaintiff wholly uncollectible. Nor does Patton's interest in the note present a satisfactory explanation of the problem. It had not prevented him from using it as his own in obtaining a loan from the bank, and, besides, his "confidential" relations with Patton were such that no "explanations" were ever required or made by either of them, and hence he was at liberty "to do as he pleased at his end of the line." But, if it were otherwise, there could be no reason why he should not, instead of making his own notes for $1,500, have surrendered defendant's note, and taken a new note from him, payable to Patton for $1,500; and thus have utilized his own interest in the note, and at the same time satisfied his conscience as to Patton's interest. If the circumstances surrounding and following the sale of said interest in the mine for the price and upon the terms claimed by the plaintiff, and his subsequent conduct, had been consistent with such claim, thus relieving him from involved and improbable explanations, these questions, which were excluded, as to how soon after the sale he saw Patton, and as to when he next saw him, would seem to be of trifling importance; and if from the whole of the evidence it would be clear that, however they might have been answered, the result of the case would not have been affected, the presumption of injury from the erroneous ruling would have been overcome; but when, as here, the answers to these questions might have increased the improbabilities of the transaction as testified to by the plaintiff, and compelled additional explanations, the difficulty of making which is usually increased with each recurring necessity, we cannot regard the error as harmless.

We need not enlarge upon the rulings made upon the questions put to the plaintiff as to whether he told the bookkeeper about the note, and whether private accounts were kept between plaintiff and defendant. They were neither so remote nor related to matters so improbable as to justify their exclusion. The general effect of these rulings was to improperly restrict the cross-examination of the plaintiff. We are not authorized to infer that, if these questions had been permitted, the cross-examination upon those lines would have stopped with the answers to them, but that it would have been pursued so long as the answers would indicate that it was proper or profitable. "The power of cross-examination has been justly said to be one of the principal, as it certainly is one of the most efficacious, tests which the law has devised for the discovery of truth. * * * It is not easy for a witness who is subjected to this test to impose on a court or jury; for, however artful the fabrication of falsehood may be, it cannot embrace all the circumstances to which a cross-examination may be extended." Greenl. Ev. § 446. And where it is evident, as it is in this case, that there is absolute and unqualified falsehood upon the one side or the other, no restriction upon a proper cross-examination of either of the parties who alone have personal knowledge of the fact in issue can be said to be harmless, unless shown to be so by other evidence, and that does not appear.

We have not space to discuss the remaining evidence in detail, but a brief reference to some of it must suffice. The deposition of Patton was taken and read by the defendant. He testified that he did not recollect what the price was. He was then asked: "Didn't you tell me the other day what he paid? A. Well, I told you, I think, it was $250, and Bosch told me $350, and I told him I forgot all about what it was. Q. When Bosch told you $350, he meant a hundred dollars that was sent for assessment work? A. It was all put back in the mine. It was all put in the mine, including the assessment money. Q. You are quite positive it was not over $350? A. As my understanding was, I don't, no." As to what the witness meant by his last answer we will not speculate. He further testified that he first heard of the note "the next time after I saw Mr. Taggart." He could not say how many months after, nor whether Mr. Bosch had gone to Europe, nor whether it was after Bosch had sold out to Taggart, nor whether it was five months or five days. Mrs. Bosch and T. R. Bennington testified in substance that plaintiff told each separately that he sold said interest in the mine to Bosch for $250, and Charles Kohler testified that plaintiff told him he had sold Bosch said interest for $250, and offered to sell him another one-sixth for $350. Plaintiff denied having told either of said witnesses that he sold said interest to Bosch for $250, and that he had no recollection of offering Kohler any interest in the mine for $350, or for any sum. Some circumstances were also shown upon the cross-examination of said witnesses tending to weaken their testimony; and as to defendant it appeared that in a deposition given by him he testified that the check for $250 which he gave plaintiff was given on August 8th, and postdated the 13th, and had so testified on a former trial, but, after seeing the stub, admitted that he had been mistaken, and that the check was not made until the 13th. It is not necessary to discuss the question as to what weight should be given to the expert testimony in this case, or the general question as to its weight, or the numerous authorities cited by appellant upon that subject, since both parties resorted to it, and with about equal success.

3. No exceptions appear to have been taken to the instructions given, nor to the refusal of the court to give those requested by the defendant, and they cannot therefore be considered. We advise that the order appealed from be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is reversed, and a new trial granted.

SANTA CRUZ ROCK PAVEMENT CO. v. LYONS et al. (No. 15,760.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 1, 1897.)

Street Improvement — Lien — Constitutional Law—Estoppel.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1191, providing that one who, at the request of the reputed owner of a lot, improves the same, or the street or sidewalk in front of it, has a lien on it for the work done and material furnished, is unconstitutional, in so far as it authorizes a lien by virtue of a contract with one who is only the reputed and not the actual owner.

2. The lien does not attach from the mere fact that the owner knew of the work while it was being performed, and neither made objection thereto nor gave notice that he would not be responsible therefor, which omissions, under section 1192, would give the right of lien on "every building or other improvement mentioned in section 1183," since section 1191, which alone provides for a lien on "a lot" for the work done in improving the street in front of such lot, contains no provision of that nature.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by the Santa Cruz Rock Pavement Company against Ellen Lyons and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Allen, McAllister & Frohman and John B. Carson, for appellants. Parker & Eells, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff seeks by this action to enforce a mechanic's lien on certain real property in San Francisco belonging to the defendant Ellen Lyons for work done by it in the improvement of the street in front of said property. The defendant Ellen is the wife of her co-defendant James M. Lyons, and the land is her separate property. The work done by the plaintiff was performed under a written contract, entered into between it and the defendant James, and after its completion the plaintiff filed a claim of lien with the county recorder, which it now seeks to enforce against the property. Section 1191, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "Any person who, at the request of the reputed owner of any lot in any incorporated city or town, grades, fills in, or otherwise improves the same, or the street or sidewalk in front of or adjoining the same, or constructs any areas, or vaults, or cellars, or rooms, under said sidewalks, or makes any improvements in connection therewith, has a lien upon said lot for his work done and materials furnished." Much of the argument herein has been directed to the question whether it appears from the record that the defendant James was the "reputed owner" of the land in question, but in the view taken by us of the foregoing section it is unnecessary to decide this question. The owner of real property may by his acts or conduct be estopped from questioning the acts of a reputed owner of such property, and may thereby be bound by the acts of such reputed owner; but, in the absence of the elements of an estoppel, he will not be bound by the unauthorized acts of one who is merely reputed to be the owner of the land. He cannot be deprived of his title to the land, nor can a lien be imposed thereon, against his will, by virtue of any agreement or contract on the part of one who is merely reputed to be the owner of such land, unless he has in some way held such person out as the reputed owner, with authority to do the act or make the agreement by which it is sought to create the lien. It is no more within the constitutional power of the legislature to authorize a reputed owner of a lot or parcel of land to create a lien thereon against the will of the real owner than it would be to authorize such reputed owner to transfer the title to said land; and we hold, therefore, that so far as the foregoing section of the Code purports to authorize the creation of a lien upon land by virtue of a contract for the improvement of the street adjacent thereto, entered into with one who is only the reputed owner of the land, or to affect the interest of the real owner therein, it is unconstitutional. There was no evidence before the court that the defendant Ellen gave to her husband any authority to enter into the contract for the improvement of the street; and the finding of the court that he entered into said contract as her ostensible agent, and in her behalf, is not sustained by the evidence. The plaintiff also offered evidence tending to show that the defendant Ellen knew of the work while it was being performed, and neither made objection thereto nor gave any notice to it that she would not be responsible therefor, and has argued that by reason thereof it is entitled to enforce the lien. Section 1192, Code Civ. Proc., however, limits the right of lien in such cases to "every building or other improvement mentioned in section 1183" in the Code; and section 1191, which alone provides for a lien upon a lot for the work done in improving the street in front of such lot, contains no provision of this nature. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS.

HAWLEY v. GRAY BROTHERS ARTIFICIAL STONE PAVING CO. (S. F. 610.) (Supreme Court of California. April 3, 1897.) Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge. Action by Laura L. Hawley against Gray Brothers Artificial Stone Paving Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed. Fisher Ames, for appellant. Warren, Olney & Olney, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action to recover rent alleged to be due by virtue of a written lease executed between the parties. Two similar actions by the plaintiff against the defendant for other portions of the rent, provided for in the same instrument of lease, have been before this court, upon appeal from the judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and affirmed by this court. 106 Cal. 337, 39 Pac. 609, and 42 Pac. 457. There is no material difference between the facts in the present case and those presented in the cases heretofore determined, and upon the authority of those cases the judgment and order are affirmed.

KELLY v. HEARST. (S. F. 584.) (Supreme Court of California. May 24, 1897.) Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William R. Daingerfield, Judge. Action by Martin Kelly against William R. Hearst, in which there was a verdict for defendant. From an order granting a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed. W. W. Foote and Julius Kahn, for appellant. J. C. Bates (A. A. Barnard and A. J. Morgernstern, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM. One of the grounds of the plaintiff's motion for a new trial was the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and the order granting the motion was general in terms. Without inquiring into the propriety of the ruling as to the other grounds, it is sufficient to say that, under the evidence, we should be clearly unwarranted in disturbing the order. Order affirmed.

Ex parte MARTEN. (Cr. 279.) (Supreme Court of California. March 29, 1897.) Department 2. Petition by Arthur Marten for a writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of obtaining a jury trial as to his insanity, and his discharge from the custody of an insane asylum to which he was committed. Writ granted. M. M. Foote, for petitioner. Wm. S. Barnes, Dist. Atty., and J. J. Dunne, Asst. Dist. Atty., for respondent.

PER CURIAM. It appearing that the petitioner is dissatisfied with the proceedings resulting in his commitment to an insane asylum, and has demanded a jury trial as provided in section 258 of the Civil Code, and the district attorney consenting thereto, it is ordered that the petitioner be remanded to the custody of the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, and that he be taken before the superior court of said county for a hearing and trial before a jury on the question of his insanity.

PEOPLE v. GEIGER. (Cr. 205.) (Supreme Court of California. April 7, 1897.) Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; E. D. Ham, Judge. Ernest Geiger was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals. Affirmed. Geo. E. Colwell, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Atty. Gen., and W. H. Anderson, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. In this case the defendant was convicted of grand larceny. There are no legal questions of any consequence presented by the record differing from those which have been considered in the opinion this day filed in the cause of the same title (Cr. 201; 48 Pac. 389), and upon grounds there stated the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

RANDALL v. RANDALL et al. (Sac. 177.) (Supreme Court of California. May 12, 1897.) Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county; E. A. Bridgford, Judge. Suit by Mary J. Randall against Nicholas W. Randall and others for partition. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants Randall and J. T. Davis appeal. Reversed. H. M. Albery, for appellants. C. W. Eastin and P. H. Griffin, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the opinion in the case of Davis v. Randall (Sac. 178; this day decided) 48 Pac. 906, the judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

REED v. CROSS. (L. A. 70.) (Supreme Court of California. April 7, 1897.) Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; J. W. McKinley, Judge. Action by F. C. Reed against John Cross. From that part of the judgment denying a recovery on a counterclaim, defendant appeals. Affirmed. W. H. Spencer, William J. Variel, and William H. Davis, for appellant. Hughes & Garrison and Anderson & Anderson, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The portion of the judgment in the above-entitled cause appealed from by defendant, Cross, is affirmed for the reasons given in Reed v. Cross (No. 53; this day decided) 48 Pac. 491.

RHOADS et al. v. GRAY. (Sac. 313.) (Supreme Court of California. May 13, 1897.) Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Kings county; Justin Jacobs, Judge. Action by one Rhoads and others against one Gray. From a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed. Horace L. Smith, for appellants. J. A. Hannah, M. L. Short, and Newman Jones, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The facts upon which the present appeal is to be considered are the same as those in Rhoads v. Gray (Sac. 312; this day decided) 48 Pac. 971, and upon the principles there stated the judgment is affirmed. The appeal from the order denying a new trial was dismissed at the hearing of the cause.

SWOPE v. SHERMAN et al. (L. A. 223.) (Supreme Court of California. March 3, 1897.) Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge. Action by John A. Swope against M. H. Sherman and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed. Bicknell & Trask, J. S. Chapman, and John D. Pope, for appellants. Wells, Monroe & Lee, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action is in its nature identical with that of Ferguson v. Sherman (L. A. 222; this day decided) 47 Pac. 1023, and the appeal presents the same questions as were in that case considered. For the reasons there given the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

VENTURA & O. V. RY. CO. v. COLLINS. (L. A. 232.) (Supreme Court of California. March 11, 1897.) In bank. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; B. T. Williams, Judge. Action by the Ventura & Ojai Valley Railway Company against one Collins to recover on a subscription to the capital stock of plaintiff corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed. Blackstock & Ewing, for appellant. Barnes & Selby, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Upon the authority of Railway Co. v. Hartman (L. A. 231; this day decided) 48 Pac. 65, the judgment entered herein is reversed, and the superior court is directed to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.
